On the evening of Tuesday, Sept. 4, a special meeting of the members and friends of the Christian Temperance Union was held in the British School-room, kindly lent for the occasion by the Rev. W. Forster, pastor of the Congregational Church. A goodly number of persons took tea together, after which the public meeting commenced. Mr. Griffiths, the secretary, having given out an appropriate hymn, the chair was taken by the VEN. ARCHDEACON JEFFREYS, recently returned from Bombay. He rejoiced, he said, to meet the friends of Temperance in England for the first time. Thirty-one years' experience in India had shown him the bad results of the use of strong drinks. He had had a large number of European soldiers and sailors under his care, and he found that he could do them no good but as he persuaded them to adopt the principle of total abstinence. As to the moderate use of strong drinks, either as a preventive or a remedy, it was altogether in vain. Indeed, to be moderate in the use of strong drink, they found to be impossible. He had found, from the experience of many years, that men could not be moderate, but that they could abstain. Almost all the crimes committed in the army—courts martial—soldiers sentenced to be shot, hung, or transported, proceeded from the use of strong drink. When they obtained liberty for a day, if they had a little money in their pockets, they generally went to some place where strong drinks were sold, and seldom left till they were drunk. Hence he (the Archdeacon) took the position of a teetotaler, which he had sustained for about ten years. He had enjoyed uninterrupted health for thirty-one years, and his health had rather improved than otherwise since he had been a teetotaler. But not only were many soldiers and sailors injured by strong drinks, but through its use the cross of Christ was despised, his name was blasphemed, and the preaching of his blessed truth was rendered of none effect. A large portion of native Christians were spread over Madras; and in consequence of the numerous cases of intemperance among them, the name of Christian was synonymous with that of drunkard; and when the Hindoos called a man a Christian, they, for the most part, meant that he was a drunkard. So among the converts of the Church Missionary Society and of the American Board of Missions, many had fallen through strong drink; for when once the natives broke caste and became Christians, they were no longer restrained from the use of strong drinks, and they became far worse than if they had never embraced Christianity. For one really converted Christian as the fruit of missionary labour—for one person "born again of the Holy Spirit," and made "a new creature in Christ Jesus;"—for one such person, the drinking practices of the English had made one thousand drunkards! That was a sad thought; but it was the solemn truth. If the English were driven out of India to-morrow, the chief trace of their having ever been there would be the number of drunkards they left behind. Had he (the Archdeacon) not reason then to love the cause of teetotalism? If he could express only a thousandth part of what he felt, he was sure that he should rouse the feelings of those whom he addressed to the greatest energy and zeal. He knew that they had to toil against prejudices of long standing, against habits and customs adopted and practised from early infancy; and if it was found difficult to get money with which to carry on the operations of temperance societies, it was far more difficult to get a sufficient amount of self denial. He rejoiced to see so many females present. To them the teetotal cause should be very dear. What a poor, wretched creature was the wife of the drunkard! Her ears are assailed with the most horrid language, her children are cruelly used—perhaps half murdered before her eyes—and she dare not for her life interfere. See the tears trickle down her cheeks while her children cry for bread, and she has none to give them. Oh, it was enough to fill every feeling heart with anguish! If there was any woman present who knew what was the misery of having a drunken husband and a drunken parent, she would surely feel that it was her duty to espouse the teetotal cause with her whole heart and soul. He prayed earnestly that God would grant them all grace, that they might struggle successfully against selfishness and hard-heartedness, and that the cause might spread and grow till the foe intemperance was driven from the country.

The meeting was then addressed, with considerable effect, by Dr. Orley, Mr. King, and Mr. J. Cassell. A vote of thanks to the Rev. Chairman, and the Rev. W. Forster, for the use of the room, was moved by Mr. J. W. Green, and seconded by Mr. Griffiths; and the meeting was concluded by singing the Gloria Patri. Each of the speakers expressed the pleasure he felt in seeing the rev. archdeacon in the chair, and paid a tribute of respect to him for his unwearied and successful efforts to promote the temperance cause, both by his example and by his pen. Little did any one in that large and respectable audience imagine that before that day week their chairman would be in eternity! The foregoing impressive speech may be regarded as the dying testimony of a good man, to the evils of intemperance, and the value of total abstinence.

CITY OF WESTMINSTER CHRISTIAN TOTAL ABSTINENCE ASSOCIATION, AND JUVENILE BAND OF HOPE.

A public meeting was held on Friday, August 31, in the lecture room of the Working Man's Institute, Pear-street, Strutton Ground.

The Right Hon. LORD ASHLEY presided.

Mr. A. WALKER offered up an appropriate prayer, and his lordship, in a long and excellent speech, which was repeatedly cheered, warmly expressed his approbation of the temperance movement in its influence on the domestic, social, and moral character of the working classes, and its intimate connexion with the promotion of sanitary reform.

His lordship was followed by Mr. A. Hurst, Rev. J. Doxsey, Mr. Hart, Mr. Toomer, J. H. Esterbrooke, secretary, and Dr. Gourley, whose addresses were cordially received.

On the 7th September a "JUVENILE Temperance entertainment" was held. J. H. ESTERBROOKE took the chair. The place was densely crowded by parents and children. The greatest excitement prevailed during the evening. Children of the ragged-schools recited instructive pieces on the evils of drinking and the blessings of Teetotalism, and the girls sung some pieces of sacred melody very cleverly. The clean appearance and orderly behaviour of these poor children, reflected great credit on the benevolent friends and teachers of this large station; fifteen signed. There are upwards of 100 juveniles and 30 adult Teetotalers in this society.

On Friday, the 21st September, an "Evening with the sons of toil." Mr. J. W. GREEN presided, and delivered some important and excellent remarks to the humble classes, and urged them by every consideration to abandon the use of alcohol, and sign the pledge.

The following worthy men bore their honest testimony in behalf of the efficiency and practicability of total abstinence from strong drinks:—Mr. Edwards, omnibus conductor, Mr. —, gunsmith, Mr. Kelly, bricklayer's labourer, Mr. Gardner, stone mason. Some pledges were received at the close.

Although this Association has only been established four months, it has proved a blessing to many families and individuals who were pitted by angels, anathematised by the Church as unholy and lost, stood aloof from by pharisaical professors of godliness, but rescued and reclaimed by Teetotalers. To God be all the praise!

CHELSEA.

The twelfth anniversary of the Total Abstinence Society took place on Monday last, and was celebrated by a festival. After tea the chair was occupied by the Rev. R. Doxsey, secretary to the National Temperance Society, and the meeting was addressed by the following friends:—Mrs. Hardwick, Messrs. Verney, Wood, Mann, M'Curry, and others. Several signatures were added to the cause, and thus concluded a very interesting anniversary.

SHEPHERD'S BUSH.

A tea festival was held in the school-room, Providence-place, on the 19th ult. Nearly 100 persons partook of refreshments, after which the chair was taken by Dr. Odey, and the public meeting commenced. The chairman was ably supported by Messrs. Spriggs, Dexter, Williams, Wood, Davies, Murrell, Mann, and others; who all bore testimony to the benefits derived from their adoption of total abstinence, a principle which they strongly recommended to all present.

M. MURRELL.

MARYLEBONE AND PADDINGTON.

The anniversary of the Youths' and Young Men's Teetotal Society was celebrated in New Church-street Chape, on Monday, August 27th, by a tea festival. After which, a public meeting was held: the chair was taken by Dr. Burns.

The report stated that during the past year 44 public meetings had been held, 74 pledges taken, and temperance information, through the medium of the press, extensively circulated.—Mr. Crawford moved the adoption of the report. He had not been educated to drink, scarce knew its taste till the age of sixteen; but, tempted by friends, he fell, and was restored by teetotalism.—Mr. M'Curry seconded. He could say ditto to the last speaker. He was a monument of God's mercy; had often prayed and sworn never to get drunk, but all failed till he became a total abstainer.—Mr. Trillon urged the young to become teetotallers; before drinking habits, light at first, became too strong to be broken off.—Mr. Esterbrooke sketched the moral bearing of the question. Every drunkard, he said, was a man and a brother, and in this work of mercy all could assist.—Mr. G. C. Campbell remarked, that formerly many regarded teetotalism as a nine-days' wonder; now they opposed it because its advocates had proved wiser than they.—Mr. E. Woods thought the position of teetotalism would have been more cheering had the adults better supported the young. At the close six signed the pledge.

CHEDDAR, SOMERSET.

The annual temperance festival was held in this village on the 30th of August. Though the morning proved unfavourable, large parties of visitors began to arrive at an early hour. A tea party of nearly 400 persons was held at five o'clock, under a tent erected between the Cheddar Cliffs. After tea, the company took a stroll through the magnificent ravine of the "Cliffs," and then returned to attend the public meeting.

Mr. W. TANNER presided, and gave a sketch of the proceedings of the Cheddar Society during the thirteen years of its existence.

Mr. W. HALL, paper manufacturer, of Rickford, and JAMES QUIRE, a labouring man from Yatton, detailed the benefits they had derived from adopting the practice of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors.

Mr. PHELPS, the agent of the Bristol Society, followed; and his speech was listened to with marked attention.

Eleven persons signed the pledge of the society at the close, and twelve more at a tea which was given to the children of the village the following evening. A large number of the latter have enrolled themselves, during the past year, as members of the Sabbath School Union. The establishment of a lending library, and the encouragement given to the Temperance Deposit Club, have likewise proved of great service.

Huddersfield.

The accompanying memorial was got up by the Committee of the Huddersfield Temperance Society, and presented by the Rev. Rd. Skinner to the Bench of Magistrates, officiating at the Huddersfield Brewster Sessions, which took place on Thursday, the 26th August. It was signed by upwards of 370 individuals, including most of the Clergy, Dissenting Ministers, and very many of the most influential gentlemen of the town. It was well received and evidently produced a favourable impression upon the magistrates, for out of twenty-three new applications for licenses only three were granted. The committee would recommend other societies to use their influence in a similar manner, and thus prevent many of these nurseries of vice from having an existence:—

"To the Worshipful the Magistrates assembled for Licensing Public-houses.

"The humble Memorial of the undersigned Inhabitants of the Town and Neighbourhood of Huddersfield, "Sheweth,—That your Memorialists have been informed it is in contemplation to apply for Licenses to a number of additional Public-houses for the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors.

"Your Memorialists are of opinion that some of these places have been the occasion of a great amount of vice and immorality. They respectfully submit that the present number of Houses for the Sale of Intoxicating Drinks (being 79 Public-house and 93 Beer-houses, to a Population of about 30,000, or one to every 174 individuals), is more than sufficient; and that any increase must be productive of serious inconvenience and deplorable mischief. During the quarter ending 30th June last, 56 persons have been brought before your Worship for Drunkenness, 45 of whom were imprisoned; and 15 Complaints have been brought against Inn and Beer-house Keepers. The Police Reports also bear testimony to the benefits conferred by the operation of the New Law enforcing the closing of these Houses from 12 o'clock on Saturday evening to half-past 12 on Sunday noon.

"Your memorialists therefore respectfully request your worships to refuse to sanction any further increase to the present number of public houses and to take such measures as you may deem most efficient for keeping those at present licensed within the strictest limits of the law.

"And your memorialists will ever pray, &c."

CHORLTON-UPON-MEDLOCK (MANCHESTER) TEMPERANCE HALL AND MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.

About two thousand persons assembled to witness the ceremony of laying the corner-stone of a Temperance-hall and Mechanics' Institute to be erected in Grosvenor-street, Chorlton-upon-Medlock. The Stretford temperance band was in attendance, and played several popular pieces of music. Among the gentlemen within the enclosures were W. B. Hodgson, Esq., LL.D.; Rev. W. M'Kerrow; Messrs. J. E. Gegan, William Morris, David Morris, W. Brooks, D. Winstanley, T. Taylor, J. Johnson, &c.—Shortly after four o'clock the proceedings were commenced by singing a temperance hymn, after which the Rev. W. M'Kerrow offered a suitable prayer. Mr. M'Kerrow then said, for a considerable number of years he had been identified with the cause of total abstinence, and could not therefore fail to attend in order to testify his increasing attachment to such a cause. There was no circumstance in connection with his life upon which he could look back with greater pleasure and satisfaction than his becoming identified with the total-abstinence movement, and his being induced to take an humble part in the prosecution of that great and beneficent cause. It was most important that they should endeavour to train the young to habits of self-denial, of temperance, and of virtue, and, consequently, of religious emotion and religious activity. But they found that when they had rescued their fellow-creatures from degradation and intemperance, there was the greatest difficulty in keeping them true to their principles and their pledge, because they had had no education, and were accustomed to those enjoyments only which were merely of a sensual and animal nature. It was necessary, therefore, that there should be an institution which could present to reclaimed drunkards the means of obtaining instruction and pleasure; and hence the institution, of which Mr. Morris was about to lay the corner-stone, was just the one to rescue their fellow-creatures from those low and degrading indulgences which were productive of so much individual debasement, social misery, and positive injury and ruin to society at large. He trusted that those who were gathered around would resolve to aid the committee to the utmost of their power, by procuring those subscriptions necessary to enable them to complete their undertaking and to carry on their sacred and important work.—Mr. M'Kerrow then presented to Mr. W. Morris a beautiful silver trowel, bearing the following inscription:—

"Presented by the Rev. W. M'Kerrow, on behalf of the building committee, to William Morris, Esq., on the occasion of his laying the corner-stone of the Chorlton-upon-Medlock Temperance-hall and Mechanics' Institute, as a testimonial to his public services in the cause of temperance and education.—1st September, 1849."

He (Mr. M'Kerrow) felt that he could not place such a gift in worthier hands; for to Mr. Morris the cause of total abstinence in that locality was deeply indebted. He had been true to his principles, and earnest, zealous, and successful in their advocacy.—Mr. W. Morris read the inscription upon the plate to be deposited in the stone as follows:—

"This corner-stone of a Temperance-hall and Mechanics' Institute, erected by public subscription for the advancement of temperance and education, was laid by William Morris, Esq., on the 1st of September, 1849.—Thomas Toplis, architect; Clark and Jones, builders. Thomas Taylor, chairman; John Riley and David Morris, secretaries of the building committee."

Mr. Morris then deposited in the stone, coins ranging from the half-farthing to the new florin (it being the first occasion on which the latter coin has been used for a similar purpose in this neighbourhood), and remarked that the committee did not intend to deposit any of higher value, as they thought they could put them to a much better use by applying them towards the amount which was still required to defray the cost of the building. The ceremony of lowering and adjusting the stone having been gone through, Mr. Morris announced that the day for the ceremony had been specially chosen, because it was the birth-day of Mr. Thomas Taylor, chairman of the committee, who had been a teetotaler thirty-six years, and to whom that township was more indebted, in a temperate point of view, than to any other man. In the building which they were about to erect, there would be, first, a hall for lectures,—and he might remark that there was no such place at present existing in that township, in which people could meet and call it their own; they would also provide rooms for tea parties and public meetings, news rooms, reading rooms, a library and a museum, and class rooms for both sexes. In fact they would endeavour to present most of the features of a mechanics' institution within the walls of a temperance hall. At the conclusion of Mr. Morris's address the band played "There's a good time coming, boys," and other popular tunes, and shortly afterwards the crowd assembled round the spot separated; the committee and a large party of their friends, to the number of about 300, adjourning to the school-room under the Baptist Chapel, Grosvenor-street, where they partook of a substantial tea. After tea Mr. David Morris announced that a collection would be made, and in making the appeal said that it would be a gratification to the meeting to know that they had been assisted in their object by men of all ranks. He had in his collecting-book subscriptions ranging from £50 to 6d. The following persons amongst others had subscribed:—The Lord Bishop of Manchester, £5; the Mayor of Manchester, £5 5s.; the Mayor of Salford, £5 5s.; Sir B. Heywood, Bart., £5; James Heywood, Esq., M.P., £5; Oliver Heywood, Esq., £5; Alexander Henry, Esq., M.P., £50; James Kershaw, Esq., £5; Alderman Sir E. Armitage, £5; Mr. Alderman Mayson, £10; Mark Phillips, Esq., £5; Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., M.P., £2; Rev. William McKerrow, £5 5s.; Rev. J. G. Robberds, £2, with an annual subscription of £1; Messrs. W. R. Callender, £5; Joseph Leese, £10 10s.; James Simpson, of Foxhill Bank, the president of the Vegetarian Society, £5; R. Barnes, £5; S. D. Darbshire, £10; Binyons and Hunter, £10 10s.; Sharp, Brothers, and Co., £5; and Misses M. and S. Bridge, £10. The total amount of the subscriptions received was £720—a state of canvass such as no temperance society ever showed before in this neighbourhood. They still require about £480 for the completion and furnishing of the building. Mr. William Morris also appealed to the meeting to subscribe liberally. A collection was then made, and several animated addresses having been delivered, this interesting meeting separated.

NORTH MEOLS.

On August 21 a Temperance tea party and public meeting was held at North Meols. 340 sat down to tea, and upwards of 500 attended the meeting. Rev. C. Hesketh, rector, occupied the chair. Rev. G. W. Nevatt, Mr. Scott, of Manchester, and other gentlemen, addressed the meeting. It being our annual fair, many were collected from the surrounding villages; some joined our tea party, and several attended the meeting. We have three societies in our parish—the parent society, 400 members; Southport, 100; and Banks, 200—Rehabites, 72; juveniles, 98; women, 21. Our population is 8,500—so we have 1 in every 12, thank Heaven!

GLASGOW.

On Monday evening, in accordance with an announcement previously issued, an aggregate meeting of the Juvenile Abstainers at Glasgow, the Gorbals, Anderston, Partrick, Camachie, and Rutherglen took place in the City-hall, for the purpose of adopting an address to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. Many of the societies—all under adult direction—carried their small banners with them; and as they wound through the streets to the hall their feelings found vent in cheering from the heart out for his Royal Highness.

When all the elements of this demonstration were congregated one of the most exhilarating sights was displayed that could present itself to the eye or touch the heart of humanity. From three to four thousand children, of all ranks and of various ages—from sixteen down to six—dressed in their Sabbath costume, and decorated with sashes, ribbons, and abstinence medals, filled up the body of the hall, while the galleries at either end, spacious though they are, were crowded with male and female adult abstainers.

On the gentlemen who attended to countenance the movement making their appearance on the platform cheer followed cheer; and when Archibald Livingston, Esq., took the chair, the applause was renewed and protracted for several minutes.

Mr. BORLAND having offered up prayer,

The CHAIRMAN called on them to sing the first eight lines, and the last four lines, of the 23rd Psalm, which being done, he said: We have met, my young friends, to adopt an address to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and I rejoice to see such a vast multitude gathered together for this purpose (cheers). Two objects are contemplated by our present meeting, one to express our loyalty to the Prince, and the other to make him aware of the movement in which you are engaged, and desire to promote. It is not too early to be loyal. Let your loyalty then keep pace with the ardour for the cause you have espoused, and both go together, so that when you grow up to manhood it may be said of you, behold a loyal and a sober people! (loud cheers.) The association to which you belong has 6,870 members, and is daily increasing in numbers and usefulness; and the gross amount of Juvenile Abstainers throughout Scotland may be stated at thirty-six thousand, whose influence is now being felt and appreciated. The influence of the juveniles has now become considerable, as is evinced in the large accessions daily occurring in the ranks of the adult societies, and which can be distinctly traced to the agency of the young (loud cheers). I will not detain you longer, but introduce to you Master James Stewart, who is to move that the address to his Royal Highness—which he himself has prepared—will meet with your approval.

Master JAMES STEWART, an extremely intelligent and fine-looking boy of fourteen years old, then came forward, and after a few words said: I have drawn up an address which, with your permission, I will read to this meeting for their consideration. The following is the address:—

"TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES, ETC.

"May it please your Royal Highness—We, her Majesty's loyal and faithful subjects, the Juvenile Abstainers of Glasgow and neighbourhood, feel anxious to express our cordial welcome to your Royal Highness on your return to our native land and your own Highland home.

"We therefore avail ourselves of the present opportunity of presenting our sincere regard for your welfare, and our hope that your Royal Highness may be long spared and abundantly fitted for the high station which, in the providence of God, you may yet be called upon to occupy.

"The association with which we are connected has been instituted expressly for the purpose of opposing the drinking usages of our country, which, if allowed to continue their influence is at present, are certain to destroy the happiness, honour, and reputation of our highly-favoured land, and fill it with disease, misery, and crime.

"It would be difficult for us to say how far the Temperance movement has been successful in stemming the current of vice and immorality; but its past history bears evidence to the fact that not a few thousands of her Majesty's subjects, whose moral character had been destroyed by the use of alcoholic liquors have, by the blessing of God, through the medium of abstinence societies, been reclaimed, and are now classed among the useful and respectable inhabitants of our country; while many thousands more of the rising generation have been kept from acquiring habits in every way prejudicial to the interests of society.

"May it therefore please your Royal Highness to think favourably of our cause; and that the Most High may spare and lead you safely through the dangerous paths of youth; honour you at a future, and we trust distant, period with the crown of the British empire; and at last bestow upon you a diadem of glory, which will never decay, is the affectionate prayer of the Juvenile Abstainers of Glasgow and neighbourhood.

"Signed in the name and by appointment of a Meeting of the Juvenile Abstainers of Glasgow and neighbourhood, held in the City Hall, Glasgow, on Monday evening, the 10th September, 1849, by ARCHD. LIVINGSTON, Chairman."

I have now to move that this address be adopted by the meeting (loud and continued cheering).

Master ALEXANDER M'INNES seconded the motion.

The CHAIRMAN: It would be perfectly superfluous in me to ask you, after what you have witnessed, and after the enthusiasm you have shown, if you approve of this address. Presuming that it is carried, I will now call on you to sing one of your melodies, "We'll gain the victory." After this the Chairman mentioned that the Executive Committee of the Scottish Temperance League had arranged that a series of sermons were to be preached to them in this city and the neighbourhood, of which due notice would be given as to the time and place; but, said he, before we separate, I may say that if you were within a few miles of Balmoral, the sound of your voices would be conveyed to the ears of the Royal family, nearly as quickly as if you were to send your proceedings by electric telegraph. Now, we cannot do less, seeing the occasion on which we are met, and the feelings you all entertain, than give three cheers for her Majesty and Prince Albert.

The proposal was taken up with the greatest ardour, the cheers being prolonged again and again.

Mr. BROWN proposed a vote of thanks to Masters Stewart and M'Innes, and to their worthy Chairman and the gentlemen who had favoured the meeting with their presence that evening.

This proposal was hailed with great acclamation; after which Mr. BOGLE closed the proceedings with the benediction, and the assembly dispersed.

NATIONAL EVILS AND PRACTICAL REMEDIES. With the Plan of a Model Town. Illustrated by two Engravings. By JAMES S. BUCKINGHAM. London: P. Jackson, Angel-street, St. Martin's-le-Grand.

MR. BUCKINGHAM is certainly one of the most industrious, enterprising, courageous, consistent, and persevering reformers of the age. His plans of reform are numerous, and applicable to every evil, moral, social, and political, by which the human family is afflicted. These plans are at once benevolent, plausible, carefully detailed, and zealously urged. He calls them "practical remedies," and far be it from us to say that they are not also practicable remedies. In him the ingenuity of the theorist is united to the skill of the experimentalist: he exposes real evils—he suggests appropriate remedies; and the man who aspires to the character of a patriot or philanthropist will but partially comprehend either his duties or his obligations, if he neglects a careful reading and study of this important volume.

Mr. Buckingham's exposure of "National Evils" is fearless and straightforward. He especially notices Ignorance—Intemperance—Prejudice—Commercial Monopolies—War—Competition, instead of Co-operation—and the helpless condition of the unfortunate in every country in Europe. Having exposed these "Evils" at length, the second part of this large volume is devoted to a consideration of the "remedies." The chief of these is "a model town," and "associated community." Concerning this town, intended for about 10,000 inhabitants, and the ground plans, elevations, estimates, &c., of which are furnished, Mr. Buckingham says:—

"The greatest pains would be taken in this Model Town to carry refinement to its greatest extent. The noblest architecture, the finest sculpture, the most perfect painting, the sublimest music, the most elevated oratory, the most exalted poetry—every thing that could expand the mind and purify the heart, to make all parties more polished and more agreeable, as well as more virtuous and more happy, would come legitimately within the sphere of such a society as this. There would be, no doubt, an absence of bacchanalian riots—of demoralising masquerades—of horse-racing, cock-fighting, and every other form of gambling; but the places of these would be supplied by pleasures quite as exciting, and far more durable—leaving behind them no derangements of health, no remorse of conscience, but making the pleasures of memory as sweet as the pleasures of hope, and banishing those fearful regrets of irremediable errors, which form so heavy a drawback on the real pleasures of existence, in the very highest, as well as in the very lowest classes of mankind."

The conditions and advantages of membership in this town are fully detailed. Mr. Buckingham does not for a moment forget that he is a pledged teetotaler, nor does he fail to call upon his brethren, the teetotalers, to do their duty in reference to this, his great plan. He says:—

"In Britain alone there are computed to be at least 3,000,000 members of temperance societies—embracing men, women, and children, of all ranks and classes, from the humblest labourers to capitalists with incomes of many thousands per annum. If they desire to give to the world a proof of the excellence of those principles and practices, in the soundness and efficacy of which they believe, but which the world is slow to credit, viz., the great superiority of temperance in promoting the health, morality, and fortune of those who can be brought under its practical influence—here is an opportunity to test this important truth by an actual experiment, which, in its results, would convince the most obstinate, and remove all possibility of doubt or cavil, misrepresentation or perversion, to which the mixed statistics of mixed communities are unavoidably liable. Let the FRIENDS OF TEMPERANCE, therefore, hasten to secure the honour of being the first to enter upon this labour of love."

Whether this estimate of the numbers and capabilities of teetotalers in Great Britain be correct or not, it is certain that there are enough of them to aim at the accomplishment of some plan far more great and noble than has ever yet been achieved. Towards the conclusion of the volume, are essays on the following popular subjects:—True Principles of Taxation—Financial Reform—Emigration and Colonization—Purification of the Electoral System—and the Regeneration of Ireland.

We conclude our brief notice of this bulky and interesting volume with the important suggestion of a contemporary:—

"As Mr. Buckingham has offered to furnish copies of his work to Mechanics' Institutes and Temperance Societies, at trade-price—namely, 12s. (the published price being 15s.)—a very easy method of obtaining a copy would be for twelve members to subscribe a shilling each, and remit it in a post-office order on London, to Mr. Buckingham, under cover to his publisher, Peter Jackson, Angel-street, London, when the book would be sent through any country bookseller which the parties ordering it might name, so as to reach them carriage free. The subscribers might then draw lots for their turns in the order of reading it, and when it had been read by all they might again draw lots for the possession of it; so that while all would have the gratification of reading the work for a small sum, the fortunate possessor would have a handsome volume for his library at an insignificant cost."

THE FUGITIVE BLACKSMITH; or, Events in the History of JAMES W. C. PENNINGTON. London: C. Gilpin, 5, Bishopsgate Without.

The author of this deeply-interesting narrative was formerly a slave in the State of Maryland, United States; he is now the pastor of a Presbyterian Church in New York, and from the style in which this narrative is written, as well as from the sermons and addresses we have heard him deliver in this country and in France, we can readily believe that he discharges the duties of the pastoral office with intelligence, fidelity and success. His object in this narrative is not merely to furnish a detail of "events," in themselves interesting, but to demonstrate the SIN of slavery, and to show that "its sin lies in the chattel principle, or relation." Having done this, he says—"I beg our Anglo-Saxon brethren to accustom themselves to think that we need something more than mere kindness. We ask for justice, truth, and honour, as other men do?" He shows, too, that the system of slavery has "a most disastrous influence upon the families of the masters, physically, pecuniarily, and mentally." Mr. Pennington has also distinguished himself by his advocacy of total abstinence from strong drinks. Believing that by the purchase of this little book our readers will confer a benefit on the writer, at the same time that they become possessed of a narrative of deep interest, we give it our most cordial recommendation.

THE MORAL STATISTICS OF GLASGOW. By WILLIAM LOGAN. London: Houlston and Stoneman, Paternoster-row.

In this pamphlet Mr. Logan demonstrates from personal, minute, and persevering examination, the intimate connexion between intemperance and disease—mental derangement—pauperism—crime—female prostitution—juvenile delinquency—industrial and Sabbath-schools—Sabbath profanation—and missions; with the estimated cost of the drinking system. The drinking system certainly prevails to a very alarming extent in Glasgow; but as the same influences are operating most mischievously in every large town, the statistics here furnished should be carefully examined by every temperance advocate. Mr. Logan is a man whose statements may be depended upon, and they urge upon every true philanthropist the importance of making total abstinence from strong drinks one of his chief instrumentalities.

THE CONTRAST; OR, THE HISTORY OF WILLIAM SMITH AND RICHARD YOUNG. By J. RUSSOM. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

MR. RUSSOM states that his object in publishing this little book is "to encourage the good boy, and to reform the bad one." This is done in the form of a narrative, interesting in its details, and impressive in its inferences and reasonings. As it is certain to fix the attention of children, and to convey to them no mean portion of instruction and advice as to a practice of the highest importance to their welfare, we most cordially recommend it to such of our readers who are anxious to do much good amongst the rising generation at a cheap rate.

A WORD FOR TEETOTALISM: in Reply to "The Confessions of a Convert from Teetotalism to Temperance." Addressed to Mr. T. Smeeton. By T. MACHIN. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

THOUGH we think that the writer of this tract has bestowed more pains upon the "Convert from Teetotalism" than he is worth, we are nevertheless ready to commend him for the zeal he has manifested in defence of the truth. We fear that Mr. Smeeton will not have grace sufficient to prompt him to thank Mr. Machin for such remarks as the following: "You have established some claim upon the gratitude of your old friends, for the futility of your production displays the strength of their position; and if in that performance there be some eccentricities, and much that is ridiculous, their criticism will be softened by a recollection of the necessities to which a writer may be driven in an obviously desperate cause. It must be acceded, too, that if the growth of your abilities did not keep pace with the rapidly increasing intelligence of the teetotal auditor, you have manifested some sagacity, by retreating to a sanctuary where stupidity may be tolerated, even protected, by a successful simulation of piety. You have succeeded in adorning your name with a halo of notoriety, but its colours are not to be admired, and its character few will be found to emulate." Here Thomas Smeeton has "a Rowland for his Oliver." If we could, for a moment, fear anything from the circulation of the sixpenny "Confessions," we would most cordially recommend Mr. Machin's well-written penny tract as an effectual antidote.

TEMPERANCE CERTIFICATE. An engraved Pledge Card. London: B. L. Green, Paternoster-row.

A BEAUTIFULLY engraved wreath, combining the rose, thistle, and shamrock, interspersed with Temperance mottoes, and surmounted with the teetotaler's coat of arms. Within the wreath is a copy of the Teetotal Pledge, and a certificate, with blank spaces for the name of the person signing, and the name of the recording secretary. It is variously printed, according to the price charged. The lowest priced are very neat; the coloured one now before us is beautiful, and will, when framed, form a handsome and appropriate ornament for a teetotaler's best room.

1. ASIATIC CHOLERA, AND ITS TREATMENT. By H. MUDGE. Bodmin: Published by the Author.
2. THE CHOLERA: the Claims of the Poor upon the Rich. By THOMAS BEGGS. London: C. Gilpin, Bishopsgate-without.

THE first of these tracts refers to the medical treatment of malignant cholera. The writer condemns the principal portion of reputed remedies, and especially stimulants, which he contends ought on no account to be given. Alcohol, in all its forms, whether in fermented or distilled liquors, are to be scrupulously avoided. He strongly recommends saline remedies, which, he states, have been successfully administered in the following proportions:—

Chloride of Sodium (common salt) . . . 1 scruple
Sesqui-Carbonate of Soda . . . ½ drachm
Chlorate of Potass. . . . . 8 grains

In severe cases the chloride of sodium was increased to a drachm. Cold water should be drank plentifully.

This tract, which contains a considerable amount of matter, the result of careful study and experience, ought to be very extensively circulated, both for the prevention and cure of this fearful disorder.

The tract by Mr. BEGGS reveals the fact that thousands of our fellow-creatures are perishing, "victims to public neglect;" and insists that "a responsibility rests upon all who have influence or power—a responsibility which cannot be shaken off." A brief history of the present visitation of cholera and typhus is given, with the pecuniary loss, physical suffering, and moral evil resulting therefrom, and those who are in affluence and comfort are solemnly reminded of the duties of their station. This very seasonable and well-written address ought to be promptly and extensively circulated.

THE TEMPERANCE LOVEFEAST. By T. B. SMITHIES. Four-page Tract. London: Simpkin and Marshall, Stationers'-court.

THIS forms No. 139 of the Ipswich series of Temperance Tracts. It contains seventeen brief but pointed testimonies to the instrumentality of teetotalism, in bringing men of low and degrading habits to the practice of strict sobriety, and to the enjoyment of true religion. We recommend its circulation amongst professing Christians, and especially amongst Wesleyan Methodists, and, most of all, amongst those Wesleyan ministers who solemnly avow their determination to "do as they please" in the matter of strong drink.

THIS penny Almanack bears evident marks of its being the production of a teetotaler. It points out the duties of the people of England in reference to health, intelligence, industry, competence, providence as to the future, peace, temperance, morality, and religion, and civil, political, and religious freedom. The calendar is very full of chronological and historical matter. It has a list of fairs, weather-table, &c. &c., and is altogether a useful almanack.

THE BANEFUL EFFECTS OF STRONG DRINKS ON THE NERVES, ESPECIALLY ON THE FIVE SENSES AND VOLUNTARY MOTION.

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

HAVING, in four successive articles, shown the injuries which strong drinks inflict on the nerves and senses, and particularly on the sight, hearing, smelling, and tasting, we come now to consider the organ of TOUCH, or FEELING.

As all our senses impart unto us knowledge, protection, and pleasure or pain, by means of their sensibility, the term feeling seems applicable to them all. Take away this characteristic and they are useless; and yet we do not talk of feeling with the eye, the ear, or the nose. We see with the eye, hear with the ear, smell with the nose, taste with the tongue, and feel with the touch.

In the last phrase we perceive how use, which is the arbiter of language, appropriates terms which otherwise might have a much more extensive meaning. Feeling is the peculiarity of animal existence, for the sensitive plant among vegetables can hardly be said to be an exception. The five senses, therefore, are only modifications of feeling, or life. Some have compared them to the strings of a musical instrument, which give a certain sound; for as every chord has its own tone, so every nerve has its own sensation. Still the illustration is poor; for although the seven notes of the scale are capable of such an incalculable number of variations, yet these changes almost sink into insignificance when brought into comparison with the capabilities of our nerves. Here our one sense of hearing surpasses them all.

Probably it was intended by our indulgent Creator that the infinite number of perceptions and emotions that we owe to the fine organs of sensation should give us some idea of that unknown, and yet well-known thing, which we call life. What tongue can tell its capacity for pleasure or pain? One writer has said: "We need no greater hell than that our whole nervous power should be let loose to torment us." Add to these the horrors of a guilty conscience and the frown of the Eternal, and our misery is complete.

As the sense of "touch," or "feeling," was formerly supposed to be placed principally, though not exclusively, in the skin, we have a reason for the latter appellation. "Pellis" is the Latin word for "skin;" and hence we have "vellum," a skin for writing; "vell-monger," a dealer in skins; and "feel," and "feeling," to express the sensibility which, in a very remarkable manner, seems to reside in the cutaneous covering of our body. Not that it is here alone; for we find it also in the inmost recesses of our frame, and especially in our bones. What anguish a decayed tooth may produce! and they tell us that in the amputation of a limb, the severing of the bone is the most painful part of the operation. Physiologists say that there are many exercises of this sense which we scarcely observe. The digestive organs perform their functions by means of touch, and yet when all goes on well we are hardly conscious of this fact. Provided we eat without drinking, and well masticate our food, the moment that any morsel comes in contact with the stomach, the latter contracts, and cordially welcomes it by a gentle pressure, the design and effect of which is to impregnate these little masses with the gastric juice, that they may be digested. The reader must observe that this only takes place when we eat slowly, and without drinking, because by the former indiscretion we refuse the stomach time to do its honours to the strangers that enter its domain; and, in the latter, our digestive organs are too wise to pour out the gastric juice, and have it diluted or poisoned with the various liquors that custom or caprice may think proper to swallow. But still these high-minded functionaries will not have the natural laws of their empire violated with impunity, and therefore scourge us with all the miserable sensations arising from indigestion, as the just punishment of our folly. Among these, headaches, vertigo, nervousness, &c., are the most common.

Here we have a whole class of feelings, arising from contact or touch, and yet not at all connected with the skin; and these facts, and a thousand others that might be mentioned, show us how widely ramified is the sense of which we are writing. The eye, the ear, the smell, and the taste are local, and occupy only a small portion of the surface of the body, but touch or feeling has a much wider range. Almost every point of the body, external and internal, is telegraphed by this sense, and therefore its power to impart pleasure or torment us with pain is incalculable. Some of our most exquisite corporeal pleasures arise from touch or feeling; and, on the contrary, the most excruciating pain may be traced to the same source. Without this organ we should remain unconscious of the existence of our material frame, or the bodies with which we are surrounded. Without touch we should have no idea of hardness, softness, roughness, smoothness, &c. Heat and cold would be to us alike. We might be frost-bitten, or burnt to a cinder, and yet be insensible of any injury. The warmth and glow of spring, or the cool zephyr of the evening breeze, would be unknown. The rack, the scourge, the stake or the cross, would lose their terrors, if we were destitute of sensibility. We might expose ourselves to all kinds of injurious influences, and yet should be entirely unaware of danger. The body might be mauled or pierced without our perceiving it. In a word, we should run every moment into danger, and perhaps dash ourselves to pieces, and yet have no knowledge of what we were doing. So that it may be said of feeling, as of the other senses, that it is one of our guardian angels. In the Book of Job we have a beautiful passage on this subject: "Thou hast covered me with flesh and skin, and fenced me with bones and sinews." The word "sinews" includes the nerves; and as the patriarch intimates, with these we are "fenced," or defended. No shield of adamant or coat of mail, however impervious, could yield us such a perfect protection.

It is an old saying, that "a burnt child dreads the fire." One experiment here is generally sufficient for the whole life, though prolonged to the age of Methuselah; and our cautiousness in other particulars may be traced to the same origin. We rarely venture a second time on that which has given us severe pain; and thus, like the other organs we have attempted to describe, touch or feeling is the source of pleasure, pain, knowledge, and protection, or preservation. Many mechanics or artists are guided by this sense in completing their works. To finish a thing "ad unquem," or "to the nail," is an expression of classic antiquity. The workman drew the nail of his finger or thumb over the edge or surface, to ascertain the keenness of the razor, or the perfect smoothness of the marble; and thus touch, like the tongue, the ear, or the olfactory nerves, is a critic of most astounding sagacity.

It may be thought by some, that we shall have some difficulty in proving the injurious effects of "stimulants" on this sense; but a little reflection will show that there is no organ more susceptible of its baneful influence. In how many instances is its power almost entirely destroyed? Literally, what an unfeeling monster is a drunken man or woman! Both body and soul are deprived of sensation. Chloroform is hardly more effectual. You may beat or bruise the drunkard, and he remains callous to pain. Here a multiplication of facts would be useless, because every one has had ample testimony of what we are saying. How often, too, are limbs benumbed by paralysis, which has been induced not merely by drunkenness, but, more frequently, by moderate drinking! The hand that was once such a skilful artist, and the fingers that by their exquisite touch were such unerring judges, are now only parts of a useless limb, which "is dead while it liveth." Its owner, who was once the prop and support of his family, is now a dependent pauper; and, instead of being a useful citizen, is a burden and excrement to society.

In other cases, where paralysis is not the result of drinking, the most excruciating pains have to be endured. Need we enlarge on gout, rheumatism, tic doloureux, pains in the head, stomach, intestines, kidneys, &c. &c.? How many thousands are fidgety with morbid sensitiveness? They cannot sleep or sit still. What a catalogue of woes might here be enumerated! We need not the inquisition in these days. Thumb-screws and racks are not wanting to torture mankind. The distiller, the wine manufacturer, and the brewer, produce what can inflict greater and more lasting torments. And what is worse, men are so bent on plaguing themselves, that they even beggar themselves, and their dearest and nearest kin, to procure misery, anguish, and death! Their bodies know no rest, and their minds no repose. The medical attendant who told them to break their pledge, and drink poisons for health, is now one of Job's comforters, and "a physician of no value." The only consolation he has now to administer to those he has misled, is to inform them that health and ease are gone for ever!

What a bane is STRONG DRINK! Touch, or feeling, is one of our most watchful guardian angels; but alcohol can either slay it, or convert it into a tormenting demon. Pains at first are the benevolent alarm-bell which Nature rings to warn of approaching danger; but we heed not its voice, and therefore procure for ourselves days and nights of woe, and in the end a premature sepulchre. Language is poor to describe the excruciating anguish of body that alcoholic drinks have brought, not merely on drunkards, but on those who have boasted of moderation.

And how long shall this scourge remain? READER, have you any philanthropic feelings? Do you love yourself, or revere the "royal law," which commands you "to love your neighbour as yourself?" Then we again, in the name of self-love, humanity, and religion, earnestly entreat you to abstain—and give to us your example and talent—to aid us in banishing from the world one of its greatest foes, and most malignant tormentors.

INDEPENDENT ELECTORS.—Sobriety is closely connected with true independence. Those who drink are slaves: they are easily bought or sold. For a mug of beer, or a glass of spirits, they will sell their birthright, or become the tools of designing demagogues.—People's Almanack for 1850.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

GRAND TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION.

The first of a series of six aggregate meetings in advocacy of the principles of Temperance, took place at Exeter-hall on Monday evening, October 1st. Some time before the hour appointed for its commencement, the lobby of the hall was crowded with an intelligent and attentive audience.

At half-past six o'clock the chair was taken by JOHN CASSELL, Esq., who was supported by a formidable array of the advocates and friends of the cause of Temperance.

The proceedings were commenced by singing the 27th of the Temperance Hymns.

The CHAIRMAN, who was loudly cheered, said: You are doubtless aware that this is the first of a series of meetings intended to be held within these walls, for the purpose of presenting the temperance movement in those various aspects necessary to interest the different sections of the community. That the subject chosen for the first meeting should have especial reference to the working classes is to me a source of great gratification; for I may be permitted to say, that nothing affords me greater happiness than being associated with any movement which is calculated to promote the elevation of the people (cheers). And I flatter myself we have here this evening an audience who will sympathise and rejoice at the suggestion of any measures which are calculated to ameliorate the condition of the working classes. Allow me then at once to direct your attention to the topic announced for this evening—"The Temperance Reformation, as a means to promote their moral, social, and political well-being;" for I hesitate not to assert that it is my deep conviction—a conviction arrived at not from observation, as it were, from some elevated position, on the condition of the people, but from experience and observation in associating with the working classes—in fact, by being one of them—and the result of that conviction is, that nothing has a more powerful tendency to degrade the working classes than the drinking of intoxicating liquors (applause). That the drinking system has become a monstrous evil to the working classes none will deny. Its iron hoof has trodden upon their dearest rights and noblest privileges (hear, hear). Nothing has had a more powerful tendency to weaken and debase their minds, to paralyse every effort which has been made for their moral, social, and intellectual improvement. It has weakened the efficacy of the means intended to promote their benefit; it has cut them off from all sources of moral and intellectual enjoyment; and, in a great measure, has sunk them to that state of debasement which has brought upon them the appellation, so generally applied to them, of "the lower orders" (hear, hear). But we rejoice to see that a new era is dawning upon our country; that those who style themselves philanthropists are beginning to take the cause of the working classes into their serious consideration. Men who are struggling for their political emancipation now see that the temperance movement is more important, as far as the working classes are concerned, than any political or legislative enactment. I hold in my hand extracts of letters from two eminent individuals, who are labouring on behalf of the people, and who wish to see them politically elevated, which I will read. One is from Sir Joshua Walsley (loud cheers), who has contributed one guinea towards the holding of these meetings (cheers). He says:

"DEAR CASSELL.—In reply to your inquiry whether I feel any interest in the temperance movement, no man who has taken the trouble to inquire into its results can be indifferent to your efforts; indeed, so deeply am I impressed with the social, moral, and physical benefits it has conferred, and is capable of conferring on the people of this country, and the great effect it must have on the political condition of the masses, that it has my hearty concurrence; and did I think that by joining your ranks I could in any degree aid your objects, I should willingly do so."

I have an extract from the letter of another individual, who also has contributed his guinea towards the holding of these meetings. It is as follows:—

"Put my name down for a guinea to your excellent project. I don't know how it is that I have never made the plunge, and joined the teetotalers. Nobody has more faith than I in the truth of your doctrine, both in a physical and moral point of view. I have acted upon the principle that fermented and distilled drinks are useless for sustaining our strength; for the more work I have had to do, the more I have resorted to the pump and the teapot (laughter). As for the moral bearings of the question, it is scarcely an exaggeration to say that all other reforms together would fail to confer as great blessings upon the masses as that of weaning them from intoxicating drinks" (hear).

This is from a letter written to me by Richard Cobden (loud and long cheering). Hence you see the greatest politicians of the day are becoming impressed with the importance of this movement—a movement which has not been set on foot by the great and noble of the land, like many other institutions intended to benefit the working classes, but has been put in motion by the working classes themselves (cheers). It has been sustained by the working classes; and already thousands and thousands who were sunk in the lowest depths of misery and degradation, are blest in themselves and a blessing to their families (hear, hear). We think it necessary at this time, when the public attention is so much occupied with the condition of the working classes, that meetings like this should be held, for the purpose of showing to philanthropists how powerfully their efforts may be aided by this movement. Without it, their exertions resemble the running of stage-coaches on the old roads; but let them adopt the temperance movement as a railway, and place on it their moral engines, or, if you will, their express trains, and then the motive-power of 1,000 will be made to go as far as 10,000 would go without it, in promoting the religious, moral, and social welfare of the working classes (cheers). We have heard a great deal of late on the subject of financial reform—the extravagance of governments has been depicted in glowing terms. It has been asserted that no other nation on the face of the earth yields such an amount of revenue as Great Britain; and that there can be no hope for our country unless by disbanding a large number of soldiers, reducing public burdens, and equalising taxation. The amount raised as revenue is upwards of fifty-four millions sterling per annum; and to show the importance of the trading and working classes, it is stated that upwards of forty-seven millions out of the fifty-four are contributed by those classes (hear, hear). It is not my intention to make a speech on financial reform, but I wish to present to you another picture of the extravagance of this nation, not on the part of its government, but on the part of the people themselves (hear, hear). You complain that such an enormous revenue is raised from you; but how much do you think the people of England spend annually in intoxicating liquors? The quantities consumed in 1847 were as follows:—

20,639,365 gallons corn spirits, at 15s. ....	£15,479,523
3,329,940 gallons rum, at 14s. ....	2,330,958
1,537,762 gallons brandy, at 36s. ....	2,767,971
28,830 gallons Geneva, at 30s. ....	43,245
6,310,536 gallons wine, at 22s. 6d. ....	7,099,353
613,900,976 gallons beer ..... } at 1s. 6d. ...	46,447,573
5,400,000 gallons cider, &c. ....
Total .....	£74,168,623

Allowing for a little exaggeration in the statement, and taking the whole amount at but £60,000,000, this is a sum considerably exceeding the whole of the revenue. Talk no more of the extravagance of the government, but look at your own (hear, hear). You talk about a large standing army: look at your extravagance, which keeps up a standing army of 600,000—oh, that we could see them pass before us!—not of red-coats, but of ragged-coats, or no-coats-at-all (hear, hear). And there are not only the 600,000 drunkards, but their wives and children. What a picture of wretchedness and misery! Then there is also the large standing army of paupers and lunatics, of felons and convicts, kept up by this system (hear, hear). Look at the effect which this expenditure has upon the people. In the first place, it is not only the money actually spent upon these liquors, but there is the loss of time involved in spending the money. Men don't drink and work; they generally lose time in drinking; and working men who thus spend their money, when they are out of employ, or work falls short, become a burden to the parish. Consequently they make taxation more oppressive than it would have been but for the drinking system. That system tends to swell up the poor-rates, and the county-rates too. You recently had to erect another county lunatic asylum; and you may thank the drinking system for it. You are about to erect another large gaol in the neighbourhood of Holloway, for which you may thank the drinking system. This system not only tends to render the burdens of the people more oppressive, but to deprive them of the means of supporting them. Look at its effect on the trade and industry of the country. The drunkard gives no employment to the tailor or the cloth manufacturer. Go to the drunkard's dwelling: there is a picture of misery and wretchedness! Does he bring the anvils and forges of Birmingham into requisition? Nothing of the kind. With the sixty or seventy millions now spent upon intoxicating drinks, what an impetus might be given to the trade and industry of the country, if these men would become sober! The amount thus saved and applied to the stimulus of industry would be greater than the whole of our present export trade put together. Why, every anvil would be put into requisition; we should hear the shuttle flying in every direction; all would be employed, and would receive good wages for it (cheers). We talk much of the moral condition of the people; but see how this is affected by the drinking system. The tendency of drink is to enlure the moral and intellectual faculties. The drunkard never thinks of going to a mechanics' institute to hear a lecture; he has no time (hear). Would the working men but devote as much time to the cultivation of their intellectual and moral faculties as they do to drinking, how different would be the moral and intellectual condition of our country! Then, again, conceive the effects produced by the drunkard's conduct on his family. If children inherit the organization of their parents, what must be the condition of those families? Are they educated? Nothing of the kind. They are sent to labour at an early age; and, when at home, become accustomed to the oaths and imprecations of their drunken parents. They constantly see their mother ill-used; their consciences become seared and habituated to the contemplation of sin; their moral and intellectual faculties are in a state of inactivity; no stimulus is given to their cultivation; and the probability is that they grow up drunkards, like their fathers, and prematurely come to a drunkard's grave. On the other hand, I would ask you to contemplate what would be the effect, and what has been already produced, in thousands of households by the adoption of our principles. Look at the men once wretched and degraded, whose very homes were hells upon earth, whose children dreaded the approach of their parent; what a contrast is produced by the adoption of our principles! Now you see the reformed drunkard returning from his labour, in coarse clothing, mayhap, but with intelligence beaming from his countenance; for reason has resumed her seat, and religion has taken possession of his soul. As he approaches his dwelling, his children, instead of fleeing his presence with dread, listen for his footsteps, run to meet him, and cling around his knees (cheers). Within, a good supper is provided for him; there is a glowing fire in the grate, and all appears comfortable and happy (cheers). He sits down, takes his chubby little boy on his knee, and hears him repeat a hymn, learned at the Sabbath-school, and for which he will have a ticket on the next Sunday (applause). Instead of assailing the household with imprecations, he takes down the Bible and reads its sacred truths to his children, then kneels down in prayer, the little ones blending their sweet voices, and adding to the prayer of their father their innocent amen (applause). I ask, then, if temperance is calculated so to benefit the working classes, shall we not be encouraged to go forward, and may we not exclaim, "Success to total abstinence!" Let us be more determined than ever to press forward in this glorious cause. We have now commenced the winter's campaign; it is our determination to hold six of these meetings within these walls, and we hope to have a concluding one in Drury-lane Theatre (cheers). But that cannot be accomplished unless we can raise sufficient funds. A number of friends have come forward liberally to aid us in convening this meeting, and I trust the teetotalers of the metropolis at large will come forward with their sixpences, shillings, and half-crowns, and be determined that we shall have not only the six meetings, but a meeting in "Old Drury" (applause). I trust the result of this meeting may be that we shall all receive a little fresh oil into our lamps, and that our zeal may burn the brighter in consequence (cheers).

The Rev. BENJAMIN PARSONS, of Stroud, was very cordially received. His theme was—"The importance of the working classes, and the duty of promoting their welfare." Ever since he had devoted himself to the study of man and his interests, and of the social, political, and religious relations of society, which as a minister he felt it his duty to study, no truth had impressed itself more on his mind than that on which he was to speak—the importance of the working classes (hear, hear). What could we do without them? Take the working classes out of England, or France, or the world, and what would become of all other classes? (cheers.) Many boasted of their ancestry; but where would squires, nobles, princes, and kings find their ancestry but among the working classes (hear, hear). All ranks had sprung from the labouring population. The kings of antiquity were labourers, and mill-girls were the princesses, for they did the weaving and spinning, and attended to household affairs besides (cheers, and laughter). He disliked the term "lower orders," except it was used to imply that they were the foundation and support of all orders—the basis of the national pyramid, without which the whole structure must fall (applause). Historians ascribed great influence to the old ballads of this country in promoting its liberties, and he thought the two following lines had done much to raise the spirit of liberty among the working classes:—

"When Adam delved, and Eve span,
Where was then the gentleman?"

(Cheers.) Let the masses be morally right, and then all else would be right; but this would never be so long as they were duped and muddled and destroyed by strong drink (applause). Many misapprehended the nature of national wealth. Let a country possess the richest mines in the world, the most productive soil, and the most genial climate—if it were inhabited only by lords and ladies, who knew not how to use a spade or pickaxe, or to drive a shuttle, all the natural wealth of the country would be useless (hear, hear). The ancients had wasted much time in trying to discover the philosopher's stone, supposing it would turn everything that it touched into gold: had they looked around they might have found the true philosopher's stone in the hard hand of the labourer, for everything he touched he left more valuable for the touch (cheers). What were fields of cotton or bales of silk, till the labourer had been at work upon them? Of what use were mines without men to sink the shafts, bring up the metal, take it to the various furnaces, smelt the ore, and then work it up into the various articles which ministered to the wants of man? Of what use were fields without hedges and ditches, and men who would plough and sow, and reap and mow, and grind corn, and afterwards make it up into bread, and carry it about from place to place to sell? These were the persons who were of importance to a country (cheers). He had no word to say against the higher classes, no word against capitalists. It was important to the prosperity of a nation that there should be persons able to live on their fortunes, and to give employment to labour. But he looked forward to the time when not only a few tradesmen here and there should be able to make their fortunes, and retire on an independence in their old age, but when every labourer should be able, by his honest toil, to provide for his old age, and not be compelled to work, but be simply a consumer of what was produced by others, thus aiding the trade and prosperity of the country even in his honourable retirement from the field of labour (cheers). When the teetotal movement arose, he had hailed it as the dawn of the light about to shine on the people in all its glory and blessing. They were now met for the purpose of hastening that period when the working men of the country should not merely minister to the wants of others, but to their own, and thus place themselves far above the frowns of overseers or parish officials, defend themselves from a gaol, and make themselves independent of charity (cheers). When astonishment and admiration were excited by the grandeur of the buildings in the metropolis, and when they gazed on the stocks of the different shopkeepers, it should be remembered that they were all the work of the labouring classes (hear, hear). This was well expressed in some lines he remembered to have read in a metrical description of the cries of London:—

"For birds, beasts, fishes, the worm and the whale,
The elephant's tooth, and the ostrich's tail,—
And even a thousand poor people must join,
Before any lady can make herself fine."

(Loud cheers.) In accordance with that sentiment were the lines of one of our distinguished bards, who, had he been a teetotaler, would not have been so perpetually pestered with the poverty that tormented him. He had said:—

"Princes and peers may flourish or may fade;
A breath can make them, as a breath can make;
But a bold peasantry—their country's pride—
If once destroyed, can never be supplied."

(Cheers.) In speaking of the people, we generally thought of men only—the women were often overlooked; but could the best arithmetician tell the value of women—of working women—to the comfort of this civilized nation? (cheers.) Why should not they be raised to the highest degree of civilization and comfort? (hear, hear.) In his neighbourhood the girls received the same education as the boys. They had no idea that a man, when married, should have to run off to the Mechanics' Institute or Temperance Coffee-house to find an intellectual companion. Their impression was, he should never marry till persuaded that the most interesting and intellectual companion in the world was the lovely creature he was taking for better or for worse (cheers). There was no reason at all, because people worked, that they should be rude, vulgar, or ignorant—no necessity for it in the nature of things. Why should not the people be thus educated? and with the temperance principle prevailing such would be the case (hear, hear). "The duty of promoting their welfare" was the second part of this subject. What did this include? They ought to be well fed, well clothed, well housed, to have a good education, and to enjoy all their political rights (loud cheers). An excellent writer had said that taxation without representation was robbery, and to tax people without their consent was certainly political robbery (cheers). But the argument constantly urged against extending the franchise to the working classes was, that their intemperance rendered them unfit for its exercise. Let but that desolating and corrupting demon, strong drink, be driven from the land, and the working classes would then become the finest patriots the world had ever seen, for they would be Christian patriots (cheers). The people ought to be made religious; and it was in the power of the temperance movement to make them so. A man without religion was a man without character—of all creatures on the earth the most worthless (hear, hear). For this reason, laying in the working classes the most important part of the population, they were bound to see that they were well fed, well clad, well housed, well educated, and well instructed in religion. Nothing would so much increase the trade of the country, and consequently give labour to the people, and ample remuneration for that labour, as the adoption of total abstinence (cheers); so that all their duties to the working classes might be best performed by attending to this one. Let them sign the pledge, and the people would have work, wages, homes, food, clothing, schooling, and would be on the road to heaven (cheers). Without this they could not help the people. Give the drunkard the crown of Queen Victoria, and it would be pawned before next morning (cheers and laughter). Dress his wife and him in the robes of the Queen and Prince Albert, and his children like the Prince of Wales, and where would it all be before the next night? Swallowed in drink (cheers). Make him the master of an empire, give him a California, or a thousand Californias, and he would barter them all for strong drink (cheers). The people could only be benefited by setting them an example of detestation of strong drink (cheers).

Mr. THOMAS BRIGGS was loudly cheered on rising, to speak on the sentiment, "The drinking usages of the working classes destructive of their social comfort." He said he intimately knew the working classes, had been brought up amongst them, and had long laboured for their welfare. No one desired more than himself to see them occupy the position to which they were entitled. Why did they not do so? It was his honest conviction that this was attributable, not to this or that government, but to the defects and vices of the working classes themselves. Their elevation could not be produced by governments, but must be wrought out by themselves (cheers). If any one went through the cholera districts, and asked why the people living in those beclouded regions were so wretched, and why we have so large an army of paupers, criminals, and vagrants, living upon the fruits of honest industry, the answer was written on our whole social system, in unmistakable characters. That answer was, the people spent sixty-five millions annually in intoxicating drinks (hear, hear). Allusion had been made to the financial reform movement, but Mr. Robertson Gladstone and the other gentlemen who originated that movement ought to have been here; for the temperance movement was the greatest auxiliary of financial reform (hear, hear). No doubt the taxes were too heavy, but in advocating their reduction he was ashamed to reflect that by far the largest items were contributed out of the vices and immorality of the people. If their Chairman, or any other financial reformer, waited on government, to ask for a reduction of taxation, Lord John Russell might fairly meet them with the answer, that the government only took fifty-four millions from the people, while they spent sixty-five millions in intoxicating drinks (hear, hear). He might also add, that to reduce the taxation would be of no benefit, as it would only give the people more to spend in strong drinks—additional means of making paupers and criminals (hear, hear). It was monstrous to know that, in addition to the millions paid as duty on spirits and wine, nearly five millions were raised by the duty on tobacco—actually paid for smoke—a stinking and intolerable nuisance, which ought to be put down (cheers). Temperance was absolutely essential to the financial movement; and he trusted to see Mr. Cobden in the chair at some of these meetings (hear, hear). While our exports amounted to not much more than fifty millions per annum, the people had it in their power to create a much larger trade, by abandoning strong drinks. Some years ago, when great distress prevailed in Nottingham, and the poor stocking weavers were driven to the utmost necessity, it was calculated that, were each individual in the country to wear one pair of stockings more in a year, it would more than employ all the stocking-weavers that could be found (hear). Political rights could not be obtained without temperance; and he had the utmost contempt for the men who clamoured for the franchise with a pint pot in one hand and a pipe in the other (cheers). He found that in Ashton-under-Lyne, while £26,000 was spent by the inhabitants in clothing, &c., and £2,000 in education, £14,000 was spent in drink, and the deposits in the savings' banks were about £2,000 (hear, hear). In one manufactory near that town, it had been calculated that upwards of a hundred men spent, on an average, £11 each per annum in intoxicating drink (hear). But the temperance movement was also an educational movement. The inhabitants of the metropolis spent as much every year in drink as would establish ten thousand industrial schools. It was the custom to collect subscriptions for new churches and schools; let them rather seek, by promoting temperance, to fill those already built. In a sanitary point of view, the temperance principle was most valuable. There were in London seventy thousand houses unsupplied with water; the sixty-five millions spent in strong drinks would furnish £10 per annum to each head of a family throughout the whole kingdom, and might be applied to many useful purposes—sanitary and otherwise (hear, hear). The glory of a people consisted not in its public buildings or national monuments, but in the peace, industry, and content which prevailed in its cottages (cheers). It was in the power of the working classes to secure this glory for our country; but to do so there must be no debauchee rolling about our streets (hear, hear). There were many cheering signs in the horizon for the progress of this and kindred causes; but to ensure their success, each individual must put these principles in practice, and strive to impress them upon their fellows (cheers).

The CHAIRMAN here announced that for the holding of these meetings considerable funds were necessary. A number of active and zealous friends of temperance in the metropolis were determined not to be apathetic in the cause, and he hoped they would be supported by the public generally. For this purpose a collection would be made.

Mr. J. W. GREEN then read a long list of subscriptions. The collection having been made, and a hymn sung,

Mr. ROBERT LOWERY addressed the meeting on the sentiment, "Strict sobriety essential to the moral and political elevation of the working classes." This, he observed, was a self-evident truth to every thinking soul, but unfortunately all had not learned to think. Strict sobriety was the lever by which, in great part, the elevation of the working classes was to be accomplished. The degraded and vicious were a drag-chain on the moral and industrious, who, when seeking to be treated as men, received a refusal which only applied to the former class (hear, hear). To elevate the working classes the help of those above them was needed. All who possessed good moral qualities ought to feel it their duty to become instructors of the ignorant; for the blind could not lead the blind, or both must fall into the ditch. If knowledge was power, and moral character wealth, and likely to become still more and more important, how could the working men acquire these but by strict sobriety? What was there in their drinking customs calculated to elevate or lift their souls above the petty meannesses of life? All who had distinguished themselves among the working classes and become their worthy mouth-pieces, had eschewed intemperance, and devoted their leisure hours to conning the immortal pages of wisdom and literature (hear, hear). On the other hand, how many, after giving promise of a glorious harvest of truth, had become entrapped in drinking customs, which had proved an insurmountable barrier to their progress in knowledge and enlightenment? (hear, hear.) Intemperance had not only prevented the development of mind, but destroyed it after it was developed. If intellect were ever found in the tap-room, it was in an unwholesome atmosphere, and must sicken and fade. In this cause the great want was of men to do, not to talk—men who exemplified the great realities of character. Their mission was to make the world better than they found it, and none, however humble, but might, by the aid of determination and perseverance, effect inconceivable good (hear, hear). The working classes must be of immense importance, either for good or evil; to make them the former they must be elevated and trained to moral principles. This was a necessary step to their attaining their political rights. Mere money could not work this change (hear, hear). It was true that a great many millions were absorbed in taxation; but was that any reason why the people should spend still more millions in strong drink? He was an advocate of a fair day's wages for a fair day's labour (hear, hear); but it was more important still to take care of what was done with the wages (cheers). He had known men whose average wages were £2 to £3 per week; he had seen the law evaded by the establishment of truck-shops close to the works, and in some cases this had been done at the solicitation of the hands themselves, who said they should starve if this were not done, though their wages were so good. What degradation! (hear, hear.) Let them arise and work out their own elevation, as had been done by the Birmingham freeholders, 900 out of 1,000 of whom were teetotalers (cheers). In numerous instances temperance had led to domestic comfort, furniture, building societies, and small freeholds. The working classes alone spent twenty-six millions annually in drink: what a number of freeholds this amount would purchase! Some asked what the people could do for themselves? In God's name they could do everything. The world was as men made it (cheers). Thanks were due to all who aided the working men; but let them not be made to move through the world like cripples on crutches. Let them become kings in their own households—priests by their own firesides—instructors of their own families (cheers). Men, properly instructed, would deem themselves men, and demand to be treated as such. Vicious and ignorant men could not aid in the obtaining of any privilege, social or political: the reason was, they would not be trusted, for they dared not trust themselves (hear, hear). Skill, science, mind, must be linked with the hand's work, to produce any great effect. While ignorance was baffled or appalled by nature's works, or was only fit for mechanical employment, science and mind threw a light over all—linked noble ends with physical toil—and therein was the great excellence of labour (cheers). Mind had levelled the mountains, snatched the lightnings from the clouds, and moulded the elements to its wish; surely, then, it could overcome the obstacles which opposed the moral progress of the people. Let the working classes show themselves inferior to no class in manners, intelligence, or in wealth—possessing their own; let them remember that a people at once political and wise never could be kept in bondage (cheers).

Mr. T. A. SMITH spoke on "The popular delusions as to the real properties of strong drinks, and the great hindrance to the progress of the temperance reform amongst the working classes." Mankind generally might be divided into the alcoholised and the non-alcoholised portions. Those who were addicted to stimulants, whether in the shape of ardent spirits, of narcotics, as tobacco, or snuff, were greatly to be pitied. Nature at first revolted from these stimulants; then submitted to them; then loved them. A child would not take beer without persuasion; the taste was clearly artificial; but once acquired, the parties subject to it could not understand the arguments of teetotalers. They felt poorly, and could not believe that intoxicating liquors made them worse instead of better (hear, hear). The temperance movement had done infinite service by causing an inquiry into the precise effects of stimulating liquors, which were never known before, and were still unknown to very many (hear, hear). Malt liquor, the so-called national beverage, praised by poets, philosophers, and medical men, was supposed by all to be a good thing, not because they had ## TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATIONS.

WE direct the particular attention of our readers to the report of the recent meeting at EXETER-HALL, which will be found in another column. This is important not only on account of the facts and reasonings it contains, but as it is a plain indication of the interest felt in the Temperance Movement, both by Teetotalers and by general philanthropists. The testimonies borne to the utility of the movement by two eminent Financial Reformers, Mr. RICHARD COBDEN and Sir JOSHUA WALMSLEY, ought to be deeply weighed by persons of the latter class: it is high time they saw and felt "that all other reforms, if put together, would fail to confer as great blessings on the masses, as that of weaning them from intoxicating drinks." We could furnish the names of other gentlemen, intimately connected with popular movements, who entertain similar opinions, and who, we have good reason to believe, will, before long, connect the recommendation of strict sobriety with their other instrumentalities. Sanitary reformers—political economists—the promoters of education—and ministers of religion—now begin to perceive that formidable obstacles are presented to all their exertions by the drinking habits of the people; and, also, that the total abstinence principle has power to remove those obstacles, and to render their exertions easy and prosperous.

We augur much success from these large gatherings. They are not "got up" without much trouble and expense; but, considering the numbers that are thus collected, and the telling character of the addresses delivered, we believe this will prove the most efficient and the most economical plan that has yet been devised for Temperance advocacy.

The SECOND Meeting was announced for October the 29th. The subject—"The influence of the Temperance Reformation on the extension of religion at home and abroad, and the moral obligation of professing Christians to promote it." The speakers—the Rev. John Kirk, of Edinburgh; the Rev. Samuel Dunn, of Nottingham (late member of the Wesleyan Conference); and Mr. D. G. Paine, of Deptford. As this number will be put to press before that meeting takes place, of course no report of it can now be given.

The THIRD Meeting is intended to take place on Monday, December 3; the subject then to be considered is one of deep interest and importance, namely, "The claims of the Temperance Movement upon the teachers and friends of Sabbath-schools." This will, no doubt, secure a very crowded meeting, especially as it is understood that Dr. BURNS, the Rev. JAMES SHERMAN, and other eminent ministers and superintendents of Sabbath-schools, will be among the speakers. Our readers are particularly requested to make this known to all the secretaries, superintendents, or teachers of Sabbath-schools, to whom they have access, as well as to those gentleman and ladies who patronise those institutions.

THE next meeting of the MONTHLY TEETOTAL CONFERENCE will be held at Mrs. Watts's Temperance Hotel, Catherine-street, Strand, on Wednesday evening, November 7th, at half-past seven o'clock.

TEETOTALISM AND RELIGIOUS BODIES.

RESPECTFUL, but decided appeals, have recently been made to the ANNUAL ASSEMBLIES of various religious denominations, in behalf of the Temperance Movement. Patriotic, benevolent, Christian men, who have for some years past devoted a considerable portion of their time and attention to the causes and cure of great and prevalent evils, have seen that the drinking customs of the British community inflict very serious injuries on the physical, social, and moral condition of thousands. They have seen, too, that, in proportion as men are brought to abandon these customs, and to abstain altogether from intoxicating liquors, in such proportion they have been benefited physically, socially, and morally. Hence these reformers very naturally desire to perpetuate and extend the blessings of total abstinence. They find, however, that the practice of moderate drinking on the part of the great majority of religious professors, presents a most formidable obstacle to their success; and, well knowing the influence which ministers of religion are capable of exerting over their flocks, they have, year after year, set before these ministers at their annual conferences, assemblies, associations, or unions, such facts and reasonings as to the necessity and importance of the Temperance Movement, as were, in their judgment, most likely to secure the co-operation of men who profess to be very zealous for the good of men and the glory of God. Several such appeals have, as we have said, been presented this year to various bodies of Christian ministers. Judging from the specimens we have seen, we believe that these appeals, though urgent in their tone, have yet been courteous and respectful. Let us see how they have been received.

We take, first, the WESLEYAN METHODIST CONFERENCE—the preachers meeting in the annual assembly founded by the Rev. John Wesley, whose fiery denunciations of intoxicating liquors so frequently rang in the ears of all who made, or sold, or used them. Two or three circumstances occurred at the late memorable meeting of this body at Manchester, which are well worthy of note, in connection with the matter of strong drink.

First, the proceedings in the Missionary Committee of Review, when the affair of the intoxicating freight of the John Wesley missionary ship was again brought under notice. An attempt was made to qua-lily, or rather to mystify, that affair, but the attempt proved wholly abortive. The statements made by us, and by other competent witnesses, were more than confirmed, and this frightful fact was brought out in addition, namely, that the missionary ship was converted into a spirit-store, and some of the missionaries or passengers into spirit-merchants, and that a portion of the fiery poison was carried to Auckland and sold! In this committee, further, Mr. Heald, M.P., a missionary advocate, stated that he took wine at missionary meetings, and thought it hard that any complaint should be made against him for so doing. And, finally, the renowned George Osborn made the not-to-be-forgotten declaration that "he would not be dealt with as a baby," that "he meant to do as he pleased in all matters of that kind," and that "he would take a glass of wine whenever he thought proper!"

It could hardly be expected that such an assembly would receive very graciously any memorial urging the support of the total abstinence movement. One circumstance, however, occurred which seemed to warrant such a hope. The extreme penalty of Wesleyan Conference law was pronounced upon one of its members, who had been guilty of various acts of profligacy and excess. In pronouncing this sentence, the President referred to the jocular and drinking habits of the rev. offender, and solemnly cautioned the preachers present, and especially the juniors, against the use of ardent spirits; observing that "the appetite for them might be easily formed, but could not be easily broken." This was somewhat cheering to the teetotal memorialists. Subsequent movements have, however, led to the belief that this Wesleyan Momus would not have been expelled for his drinking habits, if he had not added to his profligacy and excess the unpardonable sin of tampering with large portions of the Connexional funds! Then came that encouraging paragraph in the address of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States to the British Conference, as follows:—

"We have been gratified to observe that the cause of Temperance, on the principle of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors, is attracting attention in England; and we respectfully ask your attention to it, and your kind consideration of it, as intimately connected with the best interests of society in general, and greatly conducive to the success of the Gospel. Such is our experience in America, particularly where the Church enters heartily into the cause."

At length came memorials and addresses from various teetotal societies. Their arrival was announced by the president and secretary, and it was resolved that the receipt of them should be "respectfully acknowledged, and the memorialists informed that the subject should be duly considered." The receipt of them has been "respectfully acknowledged," it remains, we suppose, for them to be "duly considered," as we do not find that they were read to the meeting, and no record of them whatever appears upon the "Minutes of Conference," since published. Such is the infatuated conduct of this assembly of ministers of religion, and such we fear will continue to be their conduct, though one after another of their officials is brought into disgrace through the love of strong drink!

Memorials on the subject of Temperance were presented also to the CONGREGATIONAL UNION, at their Autumnal Meeting, recently held in the town of Sheffield. The Rev. A. WELLS suggested "that they should be read, and a resolution adopted, stating that though the Union was not prepared to adopt the principle, it rejoiced in the success of all labours to diminish the vice of intemperance." Several ministers "urged the inconvenience of having the business of the meeting interrupted by memorials from any other body, and and objected, on principle, to reading what they could not stop to discuss."—"The Rev. NEWMAN HALL," a zealous and intelligent advocate of Teetotalism, "urged that these memorials should be read, and then a rule laid down for the future." He added that "not to read them would have a very evil effect."—The President, the Rev. JAMES PARSONS, put the matter to the meeting, and it was decided "that the memorials should not be read; but it was suggested that the receipt of them should be respectfully acknowledged." The Rev. Dr. CAMPBELL said: "Considering the assistance which the Temperance advocates had from the publications of the Union, they had no right to complain that the meeting could not hear and discuss their memorials. He undertook that they should be published." And so the matter ended.

Now we cannot, for the life of us, understand how the presentation of a respectful address or two, urging the adoption of an important instrumentality for the accomplishment of the grand purposes for which the Congregational Union, ostensibly, was formed, could be regarded as "an intrusion" or "an inconvenience." Whether the object of the Union be the political or spiritual emancipation and elevation of the community, its members must surely see and feel that intemperance presents fearful hindrances to their success. And if they had but patiently listened for about a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes, while the memorials were read, they would have learnt that the practice of total abstinence is the most appropriate and efficient instrumentality that can possibly be employed for the removal of those hindrances. The members of the Congregational Union profess to be feelingly alive to the condition of the working classes; and they have issued powerful addresses to their churches upon this subject. At their recent meeting they stopped to discuss, at considerable length, a certain meditated desecration of the Sabbath, and showed a proper determination to go the whole length on that question. But surely they cannot be ignorant of the intimate connexion subsisting between drinking usages and the desecration of the Sabbath, and the debased and degraded condition of the humbler classes. We cannot, therefore, admit that the time of this assembly would have been unsuitably or unprofitably employed, if the memorials in question had been deliberately and seriously discussed. We are glad to find that Dr. CAMPBELL has not lost sight of the magnitude and importance of the total abstinence movement, and that he occasionally gives it the aid of his powerful pen; but we conceive that the obligation is mutual; that if he has anything to record, it is because Teetotalers are not idle nor unsuccessful; and that, as a Temperance advocate lately observed, "the Congregationalists ought to be grateful to the Teetotalers for the numerous additions they have been the instruments of making to various Christian churches."

We think we have just reason to complain of this apathy and indifference, on the part of these large and influential bodies. Their cold "respect" and "due consideration" of such a subject amount to little short of opposition. Why are they so slow to learn, so unwilling to acknowledge that our success and theirs are identical? When will the British churches, of all denominations, awake to a due sense of their awful responsibility in this matter? They complain that we so often indulge in harsh language—their conduct and condition provokes it. How long shall Bacchus triumph over CHRIST? How long shall sums be annually wasted—worse than wasted—which, if properly employed, would banish ignorance, sin, and misery far, far away? Was that an extravagant computation, made by Dr. BURNS the other evening, namely, “that there are, in Great Britain, at least three millions of professing Christians who expend not less than one pound sterling, per annum, in strong drink? Ought not this sentence to be printed in large characters of flame, and placed in every pew? THAT THE PROFESSING CHRISTIANS OF GREAT BRITAIN ANNUALLY EXPEND THREE MILLION STERLING UPON DRINKS WHICH DO THEM PERSONAL INJURY, AND THEIR USE OF WHICH PERPETUATES CUSTOMS AND HABITS WHICH ARE DESTRUCTIVE OF THE SOULS AND BODIES OF THOUSANDS!

While financial and political reformers are fully alive to the importance of this question, in reference to their movements, it surely does not become Christian philanthropists and patriots to complain of its introduction as an intrusion and annoyance.

The question meets with very different treatment in America; and in our own country we are able to record at least one pleasing exception. It was more kindly entertained by “the ministers and laymen composing the Annual Assembly of the Wesleyan Methodist Association. On an address being presented to them from the “British Association for the Promotion of Temperance,” calling upon them to give the Temperance Movement their emphatic support, the following resolution was adopted, and has since been published, together with the address, in their Minutes:—

“That this assembly, believing that intemperance is a great curse to mankind—being a most prolific source of nearly all the other moral and physical evils which afflict the human family—and being also painfully aware that intemperance exerts a most injurious influence upon the interests of religion, this assembly regards with much interest and approval the spread of the principles of Temperance, and most earnestly recommends all its preachers and members to give their countenance and support to all prudent means employed for the suppression of intemperance. It would also earnestly and affectionately entreat all the friends and advocates of the cause of Temperance carefully to endeavour to avoid giving unnecessary offence, and especially guard against causing dissensions in churches, as dissensions, wherever they exist, are likely to prove injurious both to the cause of Temperance and the interests of religion.”

Till resolutions like this are adopted and carried out in all the Christian churches of the land, we have little hope of a permanent or extensive revival of religion.

Since the above article was in type we have seen the British Banner, in which the Editor explains at length the circumstances in connection with the presentation of Memorials at the recent meeting in Sheffield. We take the explanation in good part, as far as it goes; but would suggest a ready way of getting rid of the annoyance or inconvenience—namely, making the question of total abstinence an integral part of the proceedings of the Union. In the mean time we rejoice exceedingly in the renewed assurance given us by the rev. Editor, that our cause shall still have the aid of his eloquent tongue—of his powerful pen.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

inquired into the matter, but because they were under the law of stimulation. Most people thought beer nutritious, or feeding; but a pint of ale or porter, weighing a little more than twenty ounces, contained eighteen ounces of water, so that in ten pints of ale there were nine pints of water (hear, hear). Brewers were insulted if asked what their ale was composed of, and answered indignantly, “Good malt and hops, Sir.” They never mentioned water by its name, but called it liquor (laughter). The case was the same with the publican and the beer-drinker, who never spoke of anything but good malt and hops. Water, though absolutely necessary to our support, could not be called nourishing, and we need not go to the brewer for it. Beyond the water, beer contained a little less than an ounce of alcohol, and a little more than an ounce of extracted matter, which was a mixture of gum and sugar, and in addition there was a little carbonic acid gas—that gas which poisoned people at the bottom of wells and mines (hear, hear). Food was necessary not only to build up and repair the waste of the body, but to keep up the animal heat; the latter purpose was the only one subserved by the gum and sugar, or any other such substance. The popular belief was that strong drinks were strengthening; but that they were not so, the best physiologists agreed. A man’s strength depended on the bone and power of muscle; this strength was impaired by waste, and required to be renewed; but those who went to the brewer for that purpose were bamboozled and robbed (cheers). Were this not so, a man ought not to be called drunk, when laid in the street, but simply “over-nourished” (laughter). Brewers men were often pointed out as stout, powerful men. They certainly had large limbs and heads, but not great activity in moving them; neither could they endure so much as many spare men (hear, hear). Ale certainly made men fat, but that was not strength; it only served to tire men the sooner, whether working or walking. Another effect was to deaden the intellectual faculties. In all the great movements, philanthropic, social, or political, how many licensed victuallers were taking part? (hear, hear.) Whoever heard of a scientific brewer’s drayman, or an intellectual pot-boy? (cheers and laughter.) Men would gain nothing by being fat; but drinking beer alone would not even produce that: brewers’ men were fat, because they ate a good deal not because they drank beer. Intoxicating liquors were required neither for health nor strength. Even on board ship, when the rum was run out, they could live very well on beef, bread, and lemon-juice; but without water they could not live at all (hear, hear). Alcohol was not food; and those who went to the brewhouse for their dinners went to the wrong place. The friends of temperance wanted to see the people well clothed, fed, and instructed; and this could only be accomplished by the prevalence of temperance principles.

The Rev. J. W. C. PENNINGTON, of New York, an escaped slave, said that the temperance reform in the United States had called forth as large an amount of talent and influence as any other movement. Some years ago, it was found that a great amount of capital was vested in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks; they saw that success depended on their attacking this point; and they succeeded in drawing off a large amount of capital from the trade, and turning it into other channels. The result had been to render the spirit trade one of less importance and character. The licensing law was next attacked; and then the teetotal pledge was introduced, which had been attended with the best effects.

The assembly broke up a little after ten o’clock, and at the close a number of individuals signed the pledge.

WATERLOO-ROAD.

On Friday evening, October 19th, the first temperance meeting for the season was held in the new building, Hawkston-hall, so named in consequence of its being under the patronage of the friends at Surrey Chapel, whose founder, the late Rev. Rowland Hill, was born at Hawkston. The Rev. JAMES SHERMAN, the President of the South London Temperance Society, occupied the chair. The new hall was crowded to overflowing at a very early period, and the overflow was taken to a large room on the grand-floor and addressed by Mr. W. SPRIGGS, and others. After a hymn had been given out by Mr. J. W. Green, the Rev. J. SHERMAN read the 67th Psalm, and then proceeded to congratulate the audience on meeting in a hall so commodious, so pleasantly situated, and presenting such an appearance of cleanliness and comfort. Drunkards were always uncleanly, both in their persons and in their houses. One of the greatest reforms effected by total abstinence, next to that of personal reform, was the improvement of houses, of clothing, and of furniture; he was glad that the committee had determined to hold a meeting in that hall once in every week, by which that reform might be promoted and extended. As to himself, he could state that for nearly fifteen years he had not taken any drink stronger than water, and he had experienced much benefit thereby. It was true that he was not always free from complaint; but he could testify that he was able to perform his labours, which were arduous, as easily and as comfortably as most men. As to the benefits resulting from the teetotal practice to labouring men, there could be no question; in every respect it was better for them. And if they were healthy and as comfortable without strong drink, he was quite sure their wives and children would say they were better too. Let all adopt the principle conscientiously, and they would find that what it had done for him and for thousands, it would do for them also.

The Rev. J. W. C. PENNINGTON, of New York, was then introduced by the chairman, who observed that the flag of America was ornamented with stars and stripes—the stars were for the white men, the stripes for the blacks; his brother Pennington was one of the latter.

Mr. PENNINGTON then furnished a brief account of the rise and progress of the Temperance cause in the United States of America, and concluded by declaring his belief, and that of Temperance men generally, that there was no cause upon which they could reckon so confidently as a means of elevating the masses and blessing them with happiness and peace, as that of entire abstinence from strong drink.

The Rev. JAREZ BURNS, DD., was glad to find that hall again occupied by a large, intelligent, and respectable audience. Two years ago, when in New York, he listened with delight to a person who stated that, while an intemperate man, he had strolled into that hall while Dr. Burns was speaking, that he had become a teetotaler, and was now settled in New York in circumstances of prosperity. As the old hall had not been opened in vain, he trusted the new hall would be yet more eminently useful. As to himself, he had been a teetotaler for about fourteen years; his labours had been abundant; he had travelled many thousand miles by sea and by land in all sorts of weather, and under a great variety of circumstances, and he found teetotalism to be a very good thing for him. His family also found it good for them. It was good for his congregation, about half of whom were teetotalers. Wine had long been banished from his vestry. In his Sunday school many of the children are teetotalers. Much had been done, but there remained very much to do. It was lamentable to behold so much misery and degradation, the result of the use of intoxicating drinks. It was especially lamentable to see this in a Christian country—a country in which there was so much benevolence—so many endeavours to benefit the population. Upwards of one million sterling per week was devoted to the purchase of strong drink, while there were crowded districts, abounding with persons out of work, ragged children, and paupers? A nation called Christian ought to promote the glory of God and the good of men; yet it spent more than fifty millions sterling every year upon drinks, by the use of which God was dishonoured and souls destroyed! Better throw the money into the depths of the sea than so apply it. Would that the religious portion of the public, at least, could be induced to adopt the total abstinence principle! He supposed, on a very moderate calculation, that there were three million persons, religious professors, who used strong drinks in moderation; and he supposed, further, on a very moderate calculation, that each of these persons spent one pound a year upon such drinks; that amounted to three millions sterling per annum—THREE MILLIONS YEARLY LAID ON THE ALTAR OF BACCHUS! Oh, if that religious world would but pass a bill of divorce as to strong drink—if they would leave it to be drunk only by people of the world—if they would but devote those three millions per annum to the cause of religion and benevolence, most of the ignorance and misery which now prevailed would soon be banished from this country. Dr. Burns here read a list of important institutions, for the instruction of the ignorant and relief of the distressed, all of which might be amply supported, were the funds, now worse than wasted on strong drinks, but properly applied; and concluded by expressing his confident hope that great good would result from the re-opening of that hall.

The Rev. I. DOXSEY observed that the re-opening of that hall with its numerous improvements, demonstrated teetotalism to be a living principle, and it lived because it had truth for its foundation. He lamented the apathy of professing Christians in reference to the temperance movement, and wished that they were forced to stand in some of the gin-shops and beer-houses of the metropolis, and witness the squalidness and misery of those who came for the destructive liquids; and that he could take them to the homes of these wretched beings, and mark the poverty and misery of their wives and children. Surely they would then become teetotalers, or find a better plan for the reclamation of drunkards! Some public Christian professors said that teetotalers ought to be content with occasional praise or notice in magazines and newspapers; but as the success of religious societies was so intimately connected with the success of the total abstinence cause, surely faint or occasional praise was not sufficient. Mr. Doxsey pointed out the pleasing results which would be sure to follow consistent and persevering exertions, and encouraged all present to make such exertions.

JOHN CASSELL, Esq., dwelt with much energy on the benefits which he had known result to the working classes from the adoption of teetotalism—a system which, he was bold to say, would do more to elevate them physically, politically, socially, and morally than any other system which had been devised. He lamented that so few ministers of religion had assisted in the movement; till they took up the cause, and proved plainly that they sympathised with the working classes, the cause would not greatly prosper, nor would the ranks of Christian professors be very greatly enlarged. He often wondered how some ministers could stand up in their pulpits and express the grief with which they beheld the multitudes going on in a course of ignorance, sin, and misery, while, at the same time, they neglected to employ this most important instrumentality. Did they not know that by the use of strong drink men were destroying their own bodies and souls, and inflicting want and misery upon their wives and children? He appealed also to patriots and philanthropists. Did they pity factory children? Would they lessen female labour? Then let them urge the practice of teetotalism upon the husbands and fathers; for it was because they spent their wages, or so large a portion of them, upon strong drink, that the wives were compelled to labour, and the children deprived of education. Let Lord Ashley and his worthy coadjutors exert themselves to put down intemperance, and their factory and sanitary labours would be light indeed. Political reformers, too, should avail themselves of the instrumentality of teetotalism; for nothing tended so much to debase men, and to deprive them of their political privileges, as the passion for strong drink. There could be no true liberty, no real elevation, without sobriety. Men complained of despotism, and of being ground down with taxation, while they played the despot in their own families, and taxed themselves far more heavily than the most despotic government would think of taxing them. Mr. Cassell concluded with a brief recital of his own history, for the purpose of encouraging the working men present to become sober and industrious.

The CHAIRMAN expressed the pleasure with which he had listened to his friend Cassell's address. He honoured alike the principle which had conducted such a man to his present elevation, and the grace which enabled him to come forward in public to make the acknowledgment.

Mr. G. C. CAMPBELL moved, and Mr. J. W. GREEN seconded, a resolution of thanks to the chairman, which was most cordially adopted and suitably acknowledged. The proceedings were marked with much spirit, and the respective speakers were much cheered. At the close several persons signed the total abstinence pledge.

Huddersfield.

The sixteenth anniversary of the Huddersfield Temperance Society commenced its celebration on Sunday evening, September 23rd, with a public prayer-meeting in the Philosophical-hall. On Monday evening, a Washingtonian, or reformed drunkard's, meeting was held, on which occasion addresses were delivered by Messrs. Jessop (chairman), Matthewman, Whiteley, senior, Baker, and Gladhill.

It was delightful to see the effects of teetotalism in bringing a number of individuals on the platform of sobriety, who once were degraded below their fellows, but now clothed and in their right mind. On Tuesday the chair was occupied by Mr. John Andrew, junior, of Leeds, and the meeting addressed by Messrs. Bormond and Glover. On Wednesday Frank Crossley, Esq., of Halifax, presided, and speeches made by Messrs. Jabez Inwards, Glover, and Bormond. On Thursday afternoon a public tea-party took place, at which a goodly number of ladies and gentlemen patronised the bountiful repast, gratuitously provided by ladies zealous for the temperance and well-being of mankind. The Hornfirth temperance brass band enlivened the tea-party at intervals with their musical strains. After tea the annual meeting of the society was held, Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., M.P., in the chair. After some excellent remarks from the chairman, Mr. Dawson read the report of the society; Mr. Inwards moved, and Mr. Stott seconded, the adoption, printing, and circulation of the report. Mr. Glover moved, and Mr. Firth seconded, the 2nd resolution:—"That the thanks of this meeting be presented to those ladies who have kindly provided trays and otherwise contributed towards this evening tea-party; and, considering the importance of female training in the formation of character, and the untiring labours of the ladies in this and other important movements, this meeting is of opinion that the organisation of a female committee, for the purpose of forming a Youth's Band of Hope, is most desirable, and pledges itself to co-operate with the general committee in effecting this important object." At this stage of the proceedings the chairman was obliged to leave, to go by train. F. Schwann, Esq., was unanimously called to the chair. The Rev. W. Pattison, of Northwich, moved, and Mr. S. Glendinning seconded, the 3rd resolution, to the effect:—"That, looking to the results of medical science, the living testimony of thousands, and the experience of the United Kingdom Temperance and General Provident Institution, in which the deaths have been less than half the number of those in other assurance offices, this meeting is of opinion that the moderate use of intoxicating drinks is a violation of the laws of Nature, and therefore pledges itself to urge total abstinence upon all classes of the community as an important step towards the physical, moral, and intellectual improvement of mankind." Mr. Mellor moved, and Mr. Burnett seconded, the 4th resolution:—"That, considering the important fact, that an immense loss of life, a large amount of crime and pauperism, are directly traceable to the drinking customs, and the deplorable influence but too commonly exercised by British seamen in countries in other respects less civilized than our own, this meeting is of opinion that the entire abandonment of the use of inebriating beverages would be such a boon that it becomes the duty of all who desire the weal of mankind, to remove the cause of so much evil by this simple but efficient remedy." After a few complimentary resolutions the meeting separated, highly pleased with the celebration of the sixteenth anniversary, the result of which is an increase to the society's numbers.

In conformity with a resolution passed at the Conference of the British Association, to hold simultaneous meetings during the 1st week in October, two meetings were held in the Philosophical-hall, on Monday and Tuesday, October 1st and 2nd. The first was presided over by Mr. W. Dawson, junior, president of the society; the meeting was afterwards addressed by the Rev. John Stock, of Longwood, and Mr. Thomas Whittaker, of Scarborough. The second was presided over by the Rev. J. Cummins, of Kirkenton, and addresses given by Messrs. J. C. Booth, of Bradford, and Thomas Whittaker.

MACCLESFIELD.

On Monday evening, October 1st, the members and friends of the Band of Hope Temperance Society held their usual quarterly evening party in their Meeting-room, Duke-street. The room was tastefully decorated with temperance mottos. The entertainments consisted of recitation, singing, &c. The room was crowded, several being unable to obtain admission. Suitable refreshments were provided.

THOMAS OLDHAM, Secretary.

COVENTRY.

On Monday, October 15, the annual festival of the Temperance Society was held in St. Mary's Hall. After tea the chair was taken by George Cruikshank, Esq., who, in the course of his introductory address related his experience as follows:—"I am ashamed to say that for many years I went on following the ordinary custom of drinking, till I fell into pecuniary difficulties. I had some money at a banker's; he fell into difficulties, took to drinking brandy-and-water, and ended by blowing out his brains. I lost my money, and in my distress applied to friends who aided me for a time, but themselves fell into difficulties, and I was forced to extricate myself by the most extraordinary exertions. In this straight I thought 'the best thing I can do is to take to water,' but still I went on for some time before I quite weaned myself from my old drinking habits. I went to take luncheon with my friend Dickens (who I am sorry to say is not a teetotaler); he asked me to take wine, but I told him I had taken to water, for, in my opinion, a man had better take a glass of prussic acid than fall into the other habit of taking brandy-and-water; and I am happy to say that Charles Dickens quite agreed with me, that a man had better wipe himself out at once than extinguish himself by degrees, by the use of that soul-degrading and body-destroying enemy (cheers). However, I happily escaped myself; I left off drinking wine altogether, and became a total abstainer—became a healthier and stronger man, more capable of meeting the heavy responsibilities that were upon me, and for the following two years I had my life renewed, and all the elasticity of my schoolboy's days came back to me. Domestic afflictions then came upon me, ending in death, and my spirits and health were crushed down. In this extremity I applied to my medical adviser. He said, 'Medicine is of no use to you; you must drink wine again.' I refused, and my medical friend called in some others of his profession; he told me they had had a consultation, and the result was, that all of them agreed it was necessary I should drink wine to restore my sinking constitution. I replied, 'Doctor, I'll take your physic, but not your wine. Let me try everything else first, and only when there is no other chance give me wine, because I feel there is a great principle at stake in this matter.' I have said, and I believe that wine is unnecessary even as a medicine, and I do not wish to do a single act which would tend to weaken or destroy the weight and force of that conviction. And here I stand; I have not tasted the vile and destroying enemy, and I am almost restored to health, without having risked the violation of my principles (cheers). I call this a triumph; and I stand here as an evidence that wine is totally unnecessary, even as a medicine' (cheers).

Mr. T. A. SMITH delivered a powerful address, containing an outline of the physiological portion of the Temperance question, with numerous pertinent illustrations.

Mr. J. REED showed how much required to be done to raise the habits and prospects of the people, and the need there was of laborious exertion in the cause.

The Rev. L. PANTING spoke of the contempt in which he had formerly held the Temperance Society, but observation in his position as minister had convinced him that intemperance was the greatest evil against which he had to contend. He asserted that God's laws were consistent in his works and his word—that his dispensations were merciful and good—that that which produced so much misery and sin could not be called a good creature of God, but simply a perversion of God's best gifts. He then quoted the opinions of Dr. Carpenter and Dr. John Forbes in favour of total abstinence, and the reasons for so many medical men persisting in recommending wines, &c.

Mr. J. SEBREE, M.A., looked forward to the time when all, artist and minister, would join the Society, and think their talents well employed in striving to save the drunkard. He referred to the history of the Society in the past year, and the formation of the Juvenile Association, and expressed his desire that the future efforts of the Society might be directed towards providing amusements for the people, as a substitute for the degrading attractions of the public-house.

After a few words from the Rev. F. FRANKLIN,

The CHAIRMAN, who was received with great applause, said, that though some men had not expected anything very serious from him as a humourist, yet, while he had been sitting alone for hours in his study, serious thoughts had forced themselves upon him; he had reflected that every instant a crime was being committed through strong drink, and though at times he had thought it was as easy to stay the torrent of crime by his efforts as to stop the violence of the wave by the pebbles he had thrown upon the beach; yet he was convinced that this Society had truth on its side—that it was a cause much greater than the world thinks of—and though his efforts were humble, he felt that he was called by duty to serve it in the best way he could.

The proceedings of the evening were enlivened by several pieces sung by the Temperance Choir in a highly creditable manner.

THE CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHER TRIUMPHING OVER DEATH. A narrative of the closing scenes of the life of the late William Gordon, M.D., F.L.S., of Kingston-upon-Hull. By NEWMAN HALL, B.A. London: J. Snow.

We have read this volume with intense interest. Its contents have at once reproved, instructed, and encouraged us. Dr. Gordon was no ordinary man; and his family, and the circle in which he moved and which he was permitted for a season to adorn, have sustained no ordinary loss. Dr. Gordon was born in August, 1801. When sent to school, he distinguished himself by the proficiency he made in various studies, as he did afterwards at college. After some time spent in successful professional practice, in 1841 he took his degree as M.D. He continued to "intermeddle with all wisdom," allowing no topic of public interest to escape his investigation.

"He was soon known as a public man; was elected a councillor for the Borough; and in various political movements took a prominent part, always promoting what he thought to be the cause of popular progress. Freedom in trade, education and religion, parliamentary and financial reform, extension of the suffrage, peace, and other kindred questions, found in him an earnest advocate. To the cause of Temperance he devoted much of his time and energies. He saw how great were the evils entailed on his country, and especially on the working classes, by intemperance. To this baneful source he traced most of the poverty, wretchedness, disease, and crime, which prevail among us to such an alarming extent. His benevolent disposition prompted him to do all in his power to check this great evil. The total abstinence movement could not escape his notice; he studied it with impartiality, and becoming convinced of its truth on physiological as well as moral grounds, he at once adopted and advocated it.

"In 1845 he was chosen the president of the Hull Christian Temperance Society. In connexion with this Association he laboured most indefatigably to promote the physical, intellectual, and moral welfare of the working classes. He delivered courses of lectures on various subjects, devoting much time to their preparation; but always delivering the results of his investigations in terms so simple, and a style so lucid, that the most unlettered could understand him." "He delivered, during several years, a succession of temperance addresses, in which all the stores of his highly-gifted and richly-furnished mind were laid under tribute, and illustrations were drawn from every branch of learning, as well as from the objects of nature, and the occurrences of daily life, to give interest to the theme.

"As a speaker, Dr. Gordon was distinguished for the clearness of his statements, the force of his reasoning, the chasteness and vigour of his language, and the manly elegance of his delivery.

"Though he was abundant in his acts of private benevolence, yet he saw that far more good would be done by enabling the poor to help themselves, than by any act of individual charity, and therefore he laboured to elevate their condition intellectually and morally. In this important work he spared no pains, grudged no time, and shrunk from no sacrifice. Night after night he attended crowded meetings of the labouring classes, at which, till a late hour, he toiled in imparting information, and cultivating a relish for intellectual enjoyments in preference to the degrading pleasures of the dram-shop; in instilling those ennobling principles of freedom and independence, which might make them industrious, prudent, and self-denying, and in cherishing that love of virtue and benevolence which might preserve them from the evil influence of vice, rendering them happy in themselves, and the promoters of happiness in others."

Mr. Newman bears a high testimony to the loveliness of Dr. Gordon's character at home, and amongst his intimate friends. The principal portion of the volume, however, is occupied with particulars as to his illness and death. Here are passages of touching interest. In the spring of 1848 the first symptoms of disease made their appearance, and, after much severe suffering, he died, triumphing over death, February 7, 1849.

Notwithstanding his acute sufferings, the good of the poor was the frequent theme of conversation. Nor was the total abstinence cause forgotten. His faith in the principle remained unshaken. To Mr. Smithard, a devoted temperance missionary, he said,

"I took wine for a few days, as it was urged upon me. I complied for the satisfaction of my friends. I wished to perform my duty. But it did me great injury—my testimony is against it—it always was—but my friends would not have been contented, and now I feel more satisfaction myself. I am perfectly happy—anxious to go to that blessed country."

Limited as is our space, we cannot omit his dying testimony to the truth and importance of vital religion, which he most solemnly and emphatically delivered:—

"All human learning is of no avail. Reason must be put out of the question. I reasoned, and debated, and investigated, but I found no peace till I came to the Gospel as a little child, till I received it as a babe. Then such a light was shed abroad in my heart, that I saw the whole scheme at once, and I found pleasure the most indescribable. I saw there was no good deed in myself. Though I had spent hours in examining my conduct, I found nothing I had done would give me real satisfaction. It was always mixed up with something selfish. But when I came to the Gospel as a child, the Holy Spirit seemed to fill my heart. I then saw my selfishness in all its vivid deformity, and I found there was no acceptance with God, and no happiness, except through the blessed Redeemer. I stripped off all my own deeds—threw them aside—went to him naked—he received me as he promised he would, and presented me to the Father—then I felt joy unspeakable, and all fear of death at once vanished."

Mr. Newman, son-in-law of the deceased, and a distinguished advocate of the "Scriptural Claims of Teetotalism," has executed a very delicate task with great ability. His "Narrative" deserves a place among the most select records of the wise and good. We hope it will find its way into every Temperance Library and Reading-room, and into many Temperance families. It will tend greatly to confirm Teetotalers in their practice, spite of the misjudged advice of medical friends; and it will also, we trust, instruct them as to the supreme importance of the religion of the Gospel to fit for usefulness in life, and to secure happiness and triumph in death.

THIS little brochure advocates Vegetable Diet in preference to flesh diet—abstinence from stimulating liquors—industry—healthful exercise—and plenty of cold water, applied internally and externally—as the best means of preventing diseases, and of preserving and restoring health. We do not subscribe to the writer's opinions as to Vegetable Diet, and we greatly question the truth of his position, that "gluttony has killed more than alcohol, the pestilence, and the sword." At the same time we approve of his directions as to simplicity in diet, dress, and general habits. As to the possibility of curing Consumption and Diseases of the Chest by the Hydropathic process, we are not sufficiently skilled in physiology or pathology to express a decided opinion. Many of the author's directions, if followed, would, no doubt, secure large portions of health and strength.

THE MECHANIC'S ORGAN, or Journal for Young Men and Women. Vol. II. London: B. L. Green, Paternoster-row.

THERE is much in this cheap volume calculated to promote the interests of the working classes. But considering how essential strict sobriety is to their individual and social comfort, and to their attainment of an honest independence, we are surprised to find so little said in favour of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors. There is, however, a powerful tale which illustrates the fearful consequences of indulging even in a moderate glass, and the power of total abstinence to reclaim and render respectable a man once wretched, outcast, and, well nigh, a murderer and a suicide.

THE CHRISTIAN PHILANTHROPIST. No. 1. London: C. Gilpin, Bishopsgate-without.

THIS is a new monthly magazine, published at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and to be devoted to the advocacy of Evangelical Religion, Temperance, Peace, Sabbath-schools, and General Education; all of them subjects of deep interest, the progress of which must be dear to every "Christian Philanthropist." We wish the projectors much success.

THE CHOLERA: The Duties and Interests of the Working Classes as to Cleanliness and Temperance; with Hints on the choice of a Home, and how to improve it. By THOMAS BEGGS. London: C. Gilpin.

MR. BEGGS was for some time Secretary of the Health of Towns' Association; and this, together with his other researches and inquiries, has qualified him to give excellent practical "Hints" on all subjects connected with the elevation of the working classes. As his former tract, noticed in our last, admonished the rich as to the responsibilities of their station, this teaches the humbler classes that it is their duty, as it will be to their interest, to do all that they are able to do to promote their own health and happiness. There is so much sound sense and practical utility in the hints contained in this tract, that we could wish a copy of it put into the hands of every working man, and of every working man's wife, in the kingdom.

TEETOTALISM AND REVIVALS OF RELIGION.

IN the course of the last month some special "revival services" were held at Netheringham, near Lincoln, during which a great number of persons were added to the Wesleyan Methodist Society. In the course of the week the preacher persuaded several drinkers who had obtained mercy, to bid good-bye to their besetting sin of drinking, by signing the temperance pledge. He also assisted in holding a temperance meeting in Netheringham. The room was excessively crowded, besides a large number who could not get near the door. The lecturer said, "If souls get converted through my instrumentality, they shall never backslide through my drinking example. I am a confirmed teetotaler. I can serve God and be useful without alcohol, and so can you." He then asked, "Will you religious people sign the pledge? Drinking is the sin of the church—will you give it up? Will you people who have given your hearts to God this week at Dunston, give up your drink?" The point was gained, and before the meeting broke up fifty-five signatures were obtained. "Keep your pledge," exhorted the preacher, "not merely for the sake of being teetotalers, but because it will save you from many temptations, help you in your religion, and make you worthy examples for others to follow."—Wesleyan Times.

STRONG DRINK AND IGNORANCE.—North Carolina reports 2,802 distilleries, and over 56,000 persons who cannot read or write in a population of 750,000. Massachusetts contains 37 distilleries, and of nearly a million of people there are no less than 5,000 who cannot read or write. When we see the fires of the still put out we may hope to find education universally prevalent.

HORRIBLE!—A single case has just come to our knowledge in the town of Lisle, New York, where a miserable father, who lay drunk in the furrow, had his head severed from the body with an axe by his little boy; the boy assigning the reason, that, the day before, his father, the drunken wretch, as he called him, had chastised, and compelled him to drink rum. This rum was sold by a man "licensed by law" to do it, and that man in good standing in a Christian church.—Journal American Temperance Union.

HYDROPATHIC ESTABLISHMENT FOR THE MILLION.

To the Editor of the Teetotal Times.

SIR,—I am a cold-water-man, inside and out. I have abstained from all intoxicating drinks nineteen years, and the advantages to me, individually and domestically, have been incalculable. For nearly six years, I have washed all over every morning; and to this I attribute, exclusively, the great amount of labour I have been able to perform, and the renewed health which I now experience. I have had during that time the privilege of visiting several hydro-pathic establishments, and have myself enjoyed the pleasure and comforts of the cold water treatment. It is a blessed discovery for sickly, suffering humanity. There is this great drawback, however, which connects with its present mode of being administered, that the poor, and even those a little above the poor, are almost excluded its benefits. This is greatly to be lamented. Very few, comparatively, can afford to pay three guineas a week, or half that sum, and hence the masses cannot, if they wished, get the benefit of this invaluable treatment. It is true there are charity patients, and there is also a species of treatment sometimes adopted with persons living in their own lodgings. But these, in my opinion, do not come nearly up to the advantages of being together in an establishment.

Now, keeping utility alone in view, I could never see a reason why an Hydropathic Establishment could not be erected on a cheap principle; so cheap, indeed, as to admit all classes. A plain building, in an airy, mountainous situation, well supplied with good water, and in a neighbourhood admitting of extensive license for pedestrian exercise, are what are principally required; and as for the food of the patients, it cannot be too plain and too wholesome. An establishment of this character could be raised, I conceive, for a very moderate amount; and if taken in shares would, I think, not only extend the blessing of the water-cure to thousands, and act as an auxiliary to the Teetotal Cause, but would return to the proprietors good interest for their money.

I am most anxious to see what I may call, A Working Man's Water Establishment, where all could afford to come to wash away their complaints. I have been for some time making inquiry and looking out for the best situation, but I have found no place so suitable, and combining every advantage, as on the hill-side east of Windermere Lake; say near, or rather above, the pretty village of Bowness, and about fifteen minutes' walk from the terminus of the Kendal and Windermere Railway. Here is the best water, the purest mountain air, splendid scenery, and free walks and pathways to any extent. From this spot might be diffused the streams of health to the vast ailing working population of England, but especially to the operatives and humbler classes in Lancashire, Yorkshire, and the adjoining counties. The establishment could be commenced on a limited scale; erected so as to admit of extension as the number of applicants increased.

I hope there are hundreds in this country who take the same view that I do upon this subject; persons, too, whose means will allow them to join in this project. My object in this letter is to appeal to all such. Suppose it could be matured, and a prospectus agreed upon for commencing a plain establishment, the charges of which to each patient to vary, say from 10s. to 20s. a week, I am ready to take a share to the amount of £100—the management to be under the direction of the shareholders. I do trust all the old-water-men, and other friends to the system, will give this proposal cordial consideration. In making this offer myself I make no sacrifice, as I feel no doubt of its being a good pecuniary speculation, besides being the means of diffusing immense good among the people. I shall be glad to receive any communication from those friendly to the object.

Yours truly,
J. LIVESSE.

ANOTHER WARNING TO MODERATE DRINKERS,

FROM THE SUICIDE OF THAT DISTINGUISHED MEDICAL PRACTITIONER, MR. MORTON, FELLOW OF THE COLLEGE OF SURGEONS, SURGEON TO QUEEN'S BENCH PRISON, AND SURGEON TO THE UNIVERSITY COLLEGE HOSPITAL.

BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.

IT is the unalterable determination of the God of Heaven that the great principles of humanity, truth, and religion, shall be illustrated and enforced; and all men, whether they will or no, are doomed, by an inexorable decree, thus to fulfil the divine purpose. Obey, if you please, the statutes of JEHOVAH, and the result shall prove their purity, justice, and goodness; but, if you prefer it, trample them under your feet, and the thousand evils that must follow shall abundantly prove, that no one can rebel against the physical and moral laws of the Eternal without having to suffer the consequences.

Facts to confirm these assertions might be adduced by the thousand; but, in the present instance, we shall confine ourselves to Teetotalism. We lay it down as a great principle that Total Abstinence is a natural and a christian duty. "Do thyself no harm" is a command binding upon every human being; "Thou shalt not kill" enjoins self-preservation as well as a regard for the health, safety, and life of others. Poisons violate this law. If we take them ourselves we shorten our own days, and are guilty of suicide; if we give them away to others, those who partake our bounty are sent prematurely to the bar of their Judge. Now, alcoholic drinks are poisons, and cannot enter our bodies without opposing those benevolent laws of health and life which the Creator has established in the human frame. To drink beer, wine, or spirits, is to send a murderer into our veins; and all who do so, sooner or later, pay the penalty. Mercy, we are told, flies with swifter wings than those of light; while Justice travels tardily and with leaden footsteps: in a word, "God is slow to anger." But still the day of retribution must come. Sign our pledge, gentlemen, if you think proper, and you shall taste the sweets of Total Abstinence; but spurn our advice, and continue, though in moderation, to imbibe the drunkards' drink, and your nerves, your brain, your poisoned frame, and shortened days, shall prove that Teetotalism was a duty you owed to yourself, to society, and to God.

These sentiments have had within the last few days a most remarkable verification in the suicide of Mr. THOMAS MORTON, of Woburn-place, Russell-square, London. This gentleman was an eminent member of the medical profession. According to the testimony of the Coroner, J. WAKLEY, Esq., M.P., "he was a young man, 36 years of age, of great promise in his profession; a man of fine mind and of fine feeling, and universally beloved by all who knew him." This eulogy we had confirmed by some who knew him. The Morning Chronicle of November 3, in an admirable article, written expressly on the case of this unhappy gentleman, has said that he was "apparently strict in conduct, diligent in the exercise of his calling, of religious feelings, moderate desires, and well off in worldly comforts." All seem to agree that, in the common acceptation of the word, he was by no means a drunkard, or even a hard drinker. Among other ties that bound him to earth were a wife and daughter, whom he appears to have tenderly loved; for, in a letter written to the former, only the day before he took the fatal draught, he concludes by subscribing himself, her "ever affectionate husband;" and yet this unhappy individual, the morning after he had penned these words of love, deliberately swallowed a quantity of prussic acid, and was found stretched a lifeless corpse upon his bed, with his eyes half open, and a Bible in his hand!

It appears that for some time past he had been labouring under that most distressing of all complaints, "lowness of spirits." The writer of this article could fill a volume with the woes which he himself endured from this very cause, and therefore can sympathize with any poor sufferer who may be afflicted with this scourge, and is not at all surprised to find that, under its influence, life should be sacrificed. Abstinence from all stimulants is the only remedy; and the fatal termination, in the case of Mr. Morton, has, with more than common emphasis, enforced this sentiment. No one was more aware of this than the profound medical practitioner who has so rashly terminated his career, and precipitated himself uncalled for into the presence of his Judge. We accept most cordially of the statements made by his friends, that he was not a drunkard. We are quite willing that every evidence of his moderation should be received. We are ready to allow that his mind was affected with a monomania respecting drink, and that this monomania might be traced to "the opacity which was found in the arachnoid membrane which envelops the brain." Truth may even compel us to admit that many distinguished professors of Christianity and Ministers of the Gospel, who stand high in the church, and are eminent in the pulpit, drink far more than Mr. Morton; still the stronger you make the case in favor of the temperance of Mr. M. the more deeply and immovably you establish the duty of Total Abstinence.

Perhaps we cannot discuss this subject better than by taking up seriatim the opinions just stated: I. The Temperance of Mr. Morton; II. His supposed Monomania; III. The opacity of the arachnoid membrane of his Brain; and, IV. His skill as a Medical Practitioner, and the consequent weight of his own testimony.

I. THE TEMPERANCE OF MR. MORTON. This seems to be a matter which most parties zealously maintain, we therefore grant it; but our readers will perceive that if moderate drinking could induce those nervous affections which brought this distinguished individual to so melancholy an end, then it is the duty of all to abstain. It was not drunkenness, but the fashionable temperance of the day that tormented him with almost constant "horrors," and at last made life itself such a burden that he threw it away with his own hands. We want the medical men who recommend beer, wine, brandy, &c., in moderation, to look at this fact. The draught they prescribe is death to thousands. "The horrors," here and beyond the tomb, is too often the consequence. We have passed through years of torments from their commendation of stimulants, and should perhaps have fallen as Mr. Morton did, but for teetotalism. We have known numbers who were harassed day and night with ennui, and owed all their morbid affections to the doctors. Bleeding, cupping, leeches, shower-baths, all sorts of nauseous draughts and filthy pills, the most opposite and contrary dietetic rules are often enjoined in such cases; but all to little purpose; the poor hypochondriac is still a martyr, and will be a martyr to his feelings until he abandons stimulants of every description. Demons could hardly desire a more potent or efficient physical tormentor of the human family than the exciting liquors of our day, especially when taken in moderation as recommended by the medical profession and the ministers of religion.

You may tell us, reader, that you use these liquors and escape these ills; there was a time when Mr. Morton would have said so too, but the day of reckoning was even then at hand. Probably it has already begun with you. Not perhaps with "low spirits," or "ennui," though few of you are strangers to these, for until you have taken your glass, you admit that you cannot pursue your callings. But there are other ways in which these poisons may work, and never perhaps more surely or fatally than when the wretched victim boasts of his immunity from the consequences of drinking them. ALCOHOL, like some of the fabled giants, or magicians of old, has his hundred hands, and ten thousand devices, by which to smite and destroy his votaries, and there is no safety for any one but in total abstinence. No one can live out all his days and yet be a moderate drinker of stimulants. The danger of moderation has been written with tears, or rather in lines of blood, by the death of Mr. Morton. When will our medical men, and professors and ministers of religion, put an end to this carnage?

II. We are told that Mr. MORTON was afflicted with "MONOMANIA." Monomania, as most of our readers know, is mental derangement, induced by some disease or disorganization of the physical frame. The term comes from two Greek words, "monos," one or alone, and "mania," madness; and signifies that the patient has one idea that preys on his mind and drives him to distraction. But it must be remembered that the source of this aberration is in the body. The soul, without corporeal organs to obstruct the free exercise of its powers, would never become mad on one idea. Heaven made it capable of receiving a countless number of thoughts, and has constructed the universe, and revealed himself, to supply it with an infinite variety of mental occupation and pleasure. Every bird, beast, fish, insect, weed, flower, shrub, tree, atom, rock, planet, star, sun, &c. &c., is not only a thought, but an inexhaustible volume of thoughts. Every dispensation of Providence in all its chequered mazes, every phase of human character, as well as every word of revelation, are intended by the Creator to prevent the possibility of "monomania," and therefore, wherever it exists, the cause must be traced to the body of the sufferer, and especially to the nervous system. Our physiologists all know this. All our physicians are metaphysicians enough to subscribe to this fact. When, therefore, a medical gentleman informs us that Mr. Morton was afflicted with "a monomania" respecting drunkenness, he only informs us that the bodily constitution of Mr. M. was diseased or disorganized, and that his nerves and brain were especially deranged.

But then the question returns, "What produced this nervous affection?" And the only rational answer in the case before us is, that the unhappy individual alluded to had his monomania induced by "a moderate use of stimulants." Tell us not "it was trouble;" for he was "in comfortable circumstances." Tell us not, "it was weakness of mind," for Mr. M. was a person remarkable for the vigour of his intellect. It is useless to say, "that it was hard study," for the mind, provided the nerves and brain be shielded from the exhausting influence of stimulants, can bear an incalculable amount of labour, and especially such a mind as Mr. Morton's. Granted that this gentleman destroyed himself through monomania, then it must also be granted that the monomania arose from a diseased brain, and the diseased brain from the "temperate" use of stimulants. Yes, those very drinks, and that very moderate use, which medical men recommend, brought, in the case before us, one of the most distinguished of their profession to a most awful and premature end.

In these remarks we have spoken as if the "monomania" was proved. This we by no means believe or admit. The papers produced at the inquest would never suggest the idea to any impartial observer. There is no appearance of madness in them. They all contain the plain wholesome words of "truth and soberness;" and the construction put upon them could only have been suggested by the benevolent wish to save the suicide from the reproach of intemperance, or prevent the spread of those "tacetotal principles" which Mr. Morton so cordially believed in secret, and by which he had more than once determined to regulate his conduct. But allowing that a real case of monomania was made out, that one fact speaks volumes in favour of Total Abstinence, and against the moderation which our physical and theological doctors so highly applaud.

III. The post mortem examination speaks of the "OPACITY OF THE ARACHNOID MEMBRANE." Our readers will observe that the brain is covered with a tunic, or coat, and that this coating consists of different membranes or thin parchment-like substances. The outer one is called the "dura mater," or hard mother;" the inner one is termed the "pia mater or soft and tender mother." But between these two there is a thin lining called the arachnoid membrane. "Arachne" is the Greek word for a spider, and "arachnion" is a spider's web;" and therefore an "arachnoid membrane," or tunic, refers us to a substance resembling the web of a spider. In the healthy state of the brain, this arachnoid tissue is transparent; but in certain cases of disease it becomes dark, or "opaque," which was the case with the arachnoid membrane of Mr. Morton; and to this "opacity" the medical men attribute his committal suicide.

But the question returns. Was not this "opacity" produced by the moderate use of stimulants? We believe that an impartial inquiry into the matter would lead to no other conclusion. Mr. Morton used his brain as a student—perhaps he may have overworked it; but then if he did so, how much more necessary was it that he should have shunned every stimulant. Study exercises the brain; stimulants also agitate the brain; and therefore the student who uses the latter has to perform double work, and shattered nerves, perhaps an "opaque arachnoid membrane," indigestion, &c. &c., ensue. To a studious man "kind nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep," is salvation. "Lord," said the disciples concerning Lazarus, "if he sleep he shall do well." No philosophers or physiologists could have spoken better. Now, one of the baneful effects of stimulants is their preventing that sweet, natural, salutary repose which restores the perfect equilibrium and health of the body, and consequently nerves, and invigorates the mind. We query whether a moderate drinker ever obtains a perfect night's rest of natural sleep. The stimulants work on his brain and nerves even during his supposed repose, and a dreaming, feverish, restless night is the result. By this everlasting excitement, when in bed and up, the arachnoid membrane may become opaque, and a thousand other ills may ensue, leading to lowness of spirits, monomania, suicide, or premature death. Such are some of the deadly effects of moderate drinking on many studious, scientific, and religious men.

IV. THE SKILL OF MR. MORTON AS A MEDICAL PRACTITIONER, and the consequent weight of his own testimony. All parties agree that Mr. M. was no common-place man in his profession. His judgment on most questions respecting physiology or pathology would have been received with great deference by his own body; and this was the case up to the day of his death. None of his associates perceived any defect in his intellect, or would have hesitated to intrust patients to his hands. Here, then, we have a person of correct information respecting the character of stimulants. His judgment also was formed not more from what he had witnessed in others, than from what he had experienced in himself. The memoranda which have been found among his papers since his death, inculcate rules which he prescribed for his own conduct, in which he determines to avoid beer and wine. The following are a few:—

"I fail for want of sufficient firmness, and from running into temptation to try myself; also from an opinion that I can stand a good deal of beer. Let me not forget my dreadful sufferings in the morning after taking two or three pints of ale. It is the system, 'well, one glass more,' which breaks a man down. Let me remember my dreadful sufferings in the morning—lowness of spirits—suicidal feelings—despondency—gloomy thoughts—pulse 100 to 120—limbs tremulous—pains about the heart—flatulency—eructation—incapacity for duty—irritable temper."

Another paper said, "Never take beer or wine in the morning; never take beer and wine together under any circumstances. Let me drink no beer, and only water. Remember the happy lightness of a water drinker. I am better on water; I never was so happy as on water, and so was Law; the health, temper, and character of a beer drinker are undermined."

These, remember, are the statements of a temperate man, a distinguished medical practitioner, and an eminent physiologist; of a gentleman who not only dissected other men's bodies, but registered his own experience of the baneful effects of stimulating liquors; and more than all, they are the words of one who fell a victim to his own neglect of what he knew to be the only means of preserving health of body and cheerfulness of mind. He tells us that "beer and wine drinkers" have "dreadful sufferings in the morning;" are "oppressed with lowness of spirits"—"suicidal feelings"—"despondency"—"gloomy thoughts"—"tremulous limbs"—"pains about the heart;" &c. &c.; while on the other hand, "water drinkers," he assures us, enjoy "a happy lightness;" and adds, "I am better on water; I never was so happy as on water." Here then we have an individual, an ornament to his profession and to society, whom water drinking would have saved; who fell a victim to his want of resolution to join the teetotalers; and we believe no small portion of that irresolution was traceable to the effects of stimulants on his nerves and brain, and consequently on his mind and will.

We said at the beginning of this article, that truth must live and be supported, and that men are doomed to yield it a cordial or reluctant and involuntary confirmation. Mr. Morton's death, by his own hands, has done more for the progress of total abstinence than the lectures of a thousand advocates; and has spoken louder and more emphatically to the country than any meeting at Exeter-hall or elsewhere could have done. Ever since we have studied teetotalism we have felt convinced that drunkards are not the greatest sufferers from strong drink. Their woes are awfully numerous, but those of moderate drinkers are far more so; and we may boldly assert, that while drunkenness kills its thousands, moderation kills its ten thousands. Not long since we had to drop the tear of sympathy over the premature death of the Rev. Dr. Hamilton, one of the greatest and noblest spirits of the age. He was slain by moderation; and now Mr. Morton, an eminent medical practitioner, dies from the same cause; and between the funerals of these lamented geniuses, born to bless their age, how many have fallen; and yet this vile cup, worse than the supposed "cholera fungi," is distributed with as much glee as if it had never slain a single soul, and is commended with all the zeal of the physician, and consecrated with all the piety of the saint; and thus the hands, from which blessings alone ought to flow, are scattering, like the madman of Solomon, "fire-brands and death."

We cannot better conclude this article than in the words of the Morning Chronicle, alluded to above:—"To men of Mr. Morton's temperament, the 'abstinence pledge' is of infinite service." Here "no debauchery, no midnight orgies, no vice, in the common acceptance of the word, disgraced this unhappy man. Nothing but weakness against small temptations, and a facile yielding to the desire of the moment. These led but too surely to self-destruction. All was cast away—fame, place, fortune, friends, the love of his wife and young child—every thing was staked on a paltry gratification, and life, with all its beauties and all its pleasures, was lost for half a bottle of wine. It is a fearful subject to think of—more so because the instance is not a solitary one."—"We hope that this mournful event, one of the most melancholy that has ever been recorded in our columns, will prove a warning to many; and that from fear, if not from virtuous will, men may become more temperate than heretofore. We hope to see the day when our gin palaces shall be the silent and deserted monuments of a bygone vice; or, better still, converted into workshops of industry, instead of being, as now, filled with unhappy wretches to whom they are the portals to the madhouse or the grave! Take the strictest pledges—abstain even from social pleasures—cut out this horrid vice by the deep-lying roots; do anything rather than make humanity, so divine as it is, worse than bestial; abstain from what is allowed, rather than wallow in the excess of what destroys health, virtue, reason, and manhood, more effectually than the foulest and deadliest of plagues ever inflicted upon man!"

ALE FOR EVER!

A SONG FOR A DRUNKARD.

Though I go bare, take ye no care,
I nothing am a cold;
I stuff my skin so full within,
Of jolly good ale and old.
I love no roast but a nut-brown toast,
And a crab laid on the fire;
A little bread shall do me stead,
Much bread I nought desire.
No frost, no snow, no wind I throw,
Can hurt me if I wold;
I am so wrapt, and thoroughly lapt
In jolly good ale and old.
Back and side, go bare, go bare,
Both foot and hand go cold;
But belly, God send thee good ale enough,
Whether it be new or old.

BISHOP GIBSON, 1656.

THE DRINKING SYSTEM.

BY DALMOCAND.

THE PRINCIPLE OF TOTAL ABSTINENCE in its numerous bearings, and the good accompanying its adoption, have been so much dwelt upon among us, that it were wonderful if any could be met with wholly unenlightened on the subject. So much knowledge has been spread abroad regarding the moral and physical advantages flowing from the entire disuse of alcoholic beverage, that it is matter of regret to behold men so unwilling to give the question a close investigation. Let men but exercise themselves in endeavouring to determine, each for himself, whether or not Teetotalism possesses any of the virtues which its advocates award it. If found actually possessed of soundness, and conducive to the happiness of men, let it be heartily embraced; if proved unsound and injurious, let it be rejected. This is all Teetotalers demand in favour of their system, and if this trial be accorded to, they fear not the result.

What, I ask, are the benefits which intoxicating stimulants confer on such as use them? Does the drinking system tend to the increase or maintenance of wealth, or health, or happiness? Spirituous indulgence bestows little benefit that we can see. Instead of collecting or retaining wealth, it scatters it with prodigality; instead of promoting or preserving health, it swears alliance with disease; and instead of bringing or consolidating happiness, it induces misery temporal and everlasting. Did men take into mature consideration the desolating influence of alcohol upon its votaries—how it sinks multitudes in crime and wretchedness—how it disables such from serving any master save vitiated appetite and Satan—and how it, finally, if they repent not, consigns them over to horrid torment and unavailing wailing—think you so many would be witnessed treading heedlessly the slippery path of moderation?

To attempt describing the progressive way in which the unsuspecting moderationist becomes a derision to the wicked, and an eyesore to the godly, would be superfluous. You may have heard about and wondered at the infatuation of the fabled rustic, who, on perceiving in his path an adder, torpid or benumbed with cold, did, dreading no evil, kindly place the reptile in his bosom to revive it; and you may remember how he smarted for his foolish confidence in a thing so base. But why should the poor adder-bitten rustic's case be deemed improbable or strange? Do not men exhibit daily conduct as absurd and reprehensible, by taking into their confidence an adder infinitely more poisonous and dangerous? Moreover, the countryman, we read, cast away his treacherous bosom-friend with detestation—not so do alcoholic-stung men. They, on the contrary, in general, hug their deceiver the more closely, and allow it to feast upon their very souls!

But, not to horrify you farther, let us glance at a few absurdities of the drinking system. Has a man a head-ache or a heart-ache; cracks he his skull, or scratches he a finger; straightway a little of the favourite liquid is prescribed. Should one visit an acquaintance: "Come," says the latter, "will you taste?" Meet two friends in joy or sadness, can they congratulate or sympathise until the efficacious remedy be freely taken? Then, oh, marvellous! in the first case, the friends wax vehemently merry; or, in the second, mournful, "greetin' fou." In every variety of situation, warm or cold, sick or well, still the bottle is applied to: with strict propriety may alcohol be named, PHYSIC FOR THE MILLION. Again, how generous and noble does it seem for men to drink health and happiness to others, and be, at the same time, the destroyers of their own!

Most moderationists excuse themselves from entering the ranks of abstinence by urging that they run no danger of becoming drunkards, and that a glass can do no harm. What, no danger! no probability, no possibility of becoming drunkards! Whence, then, in the name of wonder, do drunkards come? Are they born drunkards? Fall they full-grown from the moon? Or spring they up, like mushrooms, in a shower? No, no. If we ask our powers of observation, they will at once declare that the drunken are not born so, nor become full-blown in a trice; but that sots come into the world, as all men do, drink-haters, and acquire proficiency in drinking just as those skilled in other arts, namely—by successive stages and continued practice. That the poor drunkard did, whilst a moderationist, deliberately intend yielding to intemperate habits, we cannot for an instant fancy—nay, in all likelihood, he shuddered at or scouted the idea of his ever transgressing decency, or being transformed into an idiotic libel on humanity, or an incarnate demon. Yet, notwithstanding, alcoholic fascination proved too mighty, and he fell as thousands fall. How, therefore, can it be with truth alleged, there is no danger? In fact, the fallacious argument that a glass can do no harm, is the prolific source of all the drunkenness that now debases our unhappy land. Instead of a glass doing no harm, who can calculate the amount of injury it does and may inflict both upon oneself and others—upon oneself by the unwarrantable waste of time and substance, and by the unnecessary risk of the glass forming in process of time a mine whereby the interests of his body, and perchance his soul, may be demolished; and, upon others, were it only by the powerful influence of example. Then how can moderationists affirm their hands are clean, and assume they run no danger of falling at some future day into the meshes of intemperance? A child of God, I know, will have grace given him to rise; still he may fall, as did those holy men of old whose shame is placed on record that Christians may be warned, and led unremittingly to watch and pray, that they "enter not into temptation." But even were men unmistakably assured that, in their case, inebriety would not ensue, yet, I submit, it behoves them, for the sake of religion and their country, to abstain. What opposes more the advancement of religion than strong drink, and what casts blacker reproach upon the British name? Let every Christian attempt, with energy, the removal of whatever may be seen presenting itself a barrier to the spread of Heaven's truth; and let every Briton do what in him lies to redeem the glory of his nation, and exalt it in the moral scale: it is from the virtuous conduct of its united units that the true glory of a nation springs.

See, I beseech you, reader, in these days of arithmetic, that you are not paying "too much for your whistle." You need no cipher-building HUME or CORDEN to assist you in the financial department here. Just muster self-reliance for a few minutes' honest balancing of loss and gain, and you will probably discover that you have been spending your money for that which profits not—for that which costs your country many times more than its naval and military equipment, and which might be given up at once, without danger of invasion by Frank or Cossack.

But you answer, that our drinking customs yield a deal of pleasure, and that when a sufficiency is taken, you desist. The alcoholic coinage, although so prized, has, I suspect, an over-quantity of alloy, and, like the recently-issued florin, lacks the impress "D. G."—verily, God's favour rests not on the drinking usages. The portcullis-divided charger of the famed Munchausen drank and drank without its thirst being slaked, and in complete unconsciousness of the injury it had sustained. Into a similar undiscerning state does the dram-fancier pass when outraged nature becomes dumb. Now, as to the "pleasure" derivable from drinking, be certain that no error has crept into your calculations, otherwise your own experience may furnish an illustrative comment on the sacred proverb—"Bread of deceit is sweet to a man; but afterwards his mouth shall be filled with gravel."

Such as are now Teetotalers at one time considered Teetotalism a very foolish thing, and Teetotalers very foolish people; but ever and anon an arrow of conviction smote us, till at length "a change came o'er the spirit of our dream." We became convinced that, after all, the abstinence plan was not a bad one, that it contravened no principle of nature or of revelation, and harmonised entirely with the law of Christian love. Many professors of religion still retain the views we years ago discarded, pleading inability to see in our way; yet we must grant them the same credit for sincerity to which we ourselves laid and lay claim. Let us, however, as teetotal marksmen, endeavour to have our quivers stocked with arrows, and continue to discharge them. If they be barbed with truth, and dexterously directed, we shall sooner or later gain a bloodless victory. The measure of success hitherto attained affords small room for dissatisfaction or despondency. Permanent reforms are always gradual; and the lofty structure hastily upreared is apt to topple over. As liquids must be poured gently down a narrow opening, through which airy matter can rush unhindered, so the human mind admits reforming essences but slowly. True, when novelty first sounds her trumpet, a mob is soon in waiting; but curiosity relieved, it melts away, with the exception of those earnest souls to whom things true, once proved, are ever precious. Than a sluggish, uninquiring mortal, or rather immortal, no greater wonder can be mentioned. Life's problem he leaves over unexamined till eternity, and plods on his purposeless career, heedless of the angel-voices whispering in his ear—"This is the way; walk thou in it." The abundance of such lethargic individuals sadly obstructs the abstinence movement—far more desirable an active antagonist of an inquiring intellect, who, listening to argument, may be won over, than a stagnant-minded "neutral." No marvel that, at sight of such indifference amid a world of suffering, the indignant advocate should sometimes unwisely lose his self-possession, and shoot an arrow dipped in gall.

Before uttering a cordial farewell, I again affectionately press on all that have not hitherto seen it your duty to embrace our cause, to weigh the subject carefully, and, having done so, to come forward with your aid. Waste not your faculties in dreamy sloth. Why invite the doom of Meroz? Neither to tittle nor to countenance the tippler, were you sent into this world: but in every contingency to glorify your SENDER. To those who do experience the substantial joys of abstinence, I shall simply say—"Plinch not; persevere." By God's blessing, the teetotal system has accomplished much, and under his approving smile it will accomplish much more.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TAVERN DINNERS AND TOASTS.

To the Editor of the Teetotal Times.

DEAR SIR,—I herewith send you a copy of a letter which was duly forwarded to the office of the Society (the New Asylum for Infant Orphans, Stamford-hill). My letter was dated July 5; on September 21, I received an acknowledgment of the receipt, in which the Secretary says,—“I am desired by the Board of Managers to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of July 5th, the subject of which will receive their best consideration.”

So I suppose the subject must be dropped at present.

Yours respectfully,

GEORGE MILLER.

33, Duke-street, Grosvenor-square, Nov. 15, 1849.

To the Board of Directors of the Infant Orphan Asylum.

GENTLEMEN,—As a subscriber to the funds of the Infant Orphan Asylum, and feeling interested in its well-doing, I am urged by a sense of duty to make a few remarks on a feature in the management of that Institution, namely, the holding of its anniversary by a public dinner, and drinking of toasts after said dinner; and it is to the drinking of toasts I would specially refer.

Having been surprised at the prevalence of this custom at the anniversaries of our benevolent and religious Institutions, I have naturally asked for a reason, and have received the answer, that more money is got by this means than by the ordinary methods. I am struck at the lameness of the reply; for the money spent in buying tickets (in this case a guinea each) would, if given to the funds instead of being paid to the landlord of the tavern, be a very considerable sum. But I object altogether to the means employed as neither honest nor scriptural. I assume the more money to be given, but given under the influence of intoxicating drinks, and the excitement necessarily resulting from swallowing those drinks—which drinks have been certified by hundreds of medical men, and proved in the experience of thousands, to be not only unnecessary, but injurious to persons in health. Such a plan for raising money for any Institution is not honest, inasmuch as it is said that such and such sums have been given by Mr. So-and-so for the benefit of a certain Institution, out of regard and admiration for that Institution; when, in fact, the money could not have been got purely out of love for the cause, else why have a public dinner and drinking of toasts, and, just in the nick of time, when the liquor is diffusing its pernicious influence through the system, that money is drawn forth from the pockets of the guests, and paraded next day in the public newspapers as the munificent donations of certain individuals.

Nor is the plan scriptural. I quote only from one passage—"Not to do evil that good may come." The evil is, religious men drinking intoxicating liquors; thus injuring their own bodies, and setting an evil example to others; sanctioning and perpetuating the drinking customs of our country (without exception the greatest curse in the land). Thus evil is done that good may come—that is, the money is forthcoming as the result of this practice. I will take one toast which was given at the conclusion of the dinner—"Prosperity to the Infant Orphan Asylum!" on which I will say a few words as regards the meaning conveyed by the words, the medium through which the toast was given, and the place and company in which it was given; and, to me, the common sense of the toast is, "prosperity to the increase of orphans." It will be objected to that this was not meant. I do not say that it was; but how can the "Asylum" prosper, unless there be subjects provided for its care? If there were no destitute orphans, the society would not be in existence; and but for the drinking customs of our country, which you have assisted to perpetuate, three-fourths of those now destitute of guardians would not have been. With the sums spent in the moderate use of these drinks by parents, invested in a life assurance office, a sum might be secured for the education of orphans. Then look at the medium through which the toast was given—intoxicating drink. Ministers and other influential men, in the year 1849, toasting in a public tavern the success of an asylum instituted to provide for and educate destitute children, many of whom have been made so through these drinks—in a liquor which is at this moment causing more improvidence, doing more harm to morality and Bible Christianity than all other causes; and not only leaving children without protector or guide, but poor helpless beings with vitiated and drunken appetites inherited from their parents' course of life, thrown on the support of the public to be a source of misery to themselves while in existence, and, at last, drop uncared for into the last resting place of all! Look, further, at the place and company. A house licensed by law to dispense these drinks to all and sundries who may call and pay for them, without ever asking whether the state of their bodies be such that alcoholic drinks can be taken with ordinary impunity, and among ministers and religious men—for this society boasts the names of such, and professes to be guided by the religion of Jesus Christ!

Gentlemen, reflect for a little on your example in this case, and the influence it will exert. I say a stronger hold is given to the drinking customs, a more lasting impulse to drunkenness and its awful consequences is spread around, than all the acts of excess committed by drunkards could accomplish. Look at it: every Sabbath-day, as it comes round, sees at least 40,000 men employed in turning barley (one of God's gifts) into malt (an invention of man) useless for nutrition, and injurious when taken into the body; at least 100,000 more are employed in selling these drinks every Sabbath-day; and yet ministers and professing Christians use the drinks made in this way, and publish their example to others, while they know at the same time that a large number of their countrymen and countrywomen are doing what they can to stop the progress of this vice and disease, by personally abstaining from all that intoxicates, and recommending the same course to others. Some noble-minded man or woman may be struggling with the dominion of this habit over them, but seeing the names of individuals present at the London Tavern, and reading their drinking of certain toasts, have thrown to the winds their desperate resolve, and gone back to old habits. Tell me what is to be the end of that man or woman, and if your example has not tended to send him or her away, reckless and regardless of consequences?

In whatever spirit these remarks may be received I cannot tell; I have partially done my duty. It is now more than ten years since I abstained from all intoxicating drinks, and they have been years of health and hard work, and I earnestly recommend the practice to all who may be influential in deterring others from falling into a drunkard's grave, and leaving diseased children to be a burden to the public. The old proverb is as true as ever, "Prevention is better than cure." "Whatever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them."—Your humble servant,
GEORGE MILLER.

[This toasting, drinking system—especially at the annual meetings of benevolent and religious institutions, at ordinations and settlements of pastors, and at the founding and opening of churches and chapels, is, we are glad to see, assailed from a variety of quarters. Some of the LEADERS of these institutions seem to be partly ashamed of the system. This is, so far, encouraging. A great moralist has said:—"Where there is shame there may one day be VIRTUE."—Ed. Teetotal Times.]

MONTHLY TEETOTAL CONFERENCE.

The next meeting will be held at Mrs. Watts's Temperance Hotel, Catherine-street, Strand, on Wednesday evening, December 5. The attendance of Secretaries of Societies or Members of Committees is highly desirable, as the subjects usually discussed at this Conference are eminently calculated to promote the prosperity of the cause.

"THE EXAMINER" versus THE TEMPERANCE REFORMATION.

MANY of our readers may have read or heard of a violent attack upon Teetotalism which appeared, a few weeks ago, in a weekly newspaper, the Examiner. A most able exposure of the extreme defectiveness of this Examination appeared in the Standard of Freedom, of November 24. We regret that our space will not admit of our quoting largely from this excellent article. We understand, however, that it is reprinted as a four-page tract, and may be had at the office of the Standard of Freedom, at such a price as will put it into the power of our friends to circulate it by thousands.

CENTRAL TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

WE have to announce the resignation of Mr. R. Wakelin, as Secretary of the Central Temperance Association, and that Mr. Cornelius Newcombe has been elected to the vacant office. Mr. Newcombe is well known in connexion with the Coventry Temperance Society, of which he has been the active and enterprising secretary for a considerable time past, and has greatly contributed to the success of its operations. We trust that he may be the means of restoring the Central Association to the like vigorous action.

MRS. HARDWICK.

WE understand that a number of the Metropolitan Total Abstinence Societies have united for the purpose of inviting Mrs. Hardwick to London to deliver a series of Lectures. Societies wishing to avail themselves of her services had better communicate with Mr. J. H. Esterbrooke, 2, Upper Crown-street, St. James's-park. This should be done immediately, as the series of meetings is nearly completed.

VERY IMPORTANT.

THE following will be read with interest, especially by teetotalers. It forms a portion of the concluding page of a very interesting and important pamphlet, written by W. B. CARPENTER, M.D., F.R.S., F.G.S., &c. &c., entitled "TEMPERANCE AND TEETOTALISM," a notice of which will be found in another page:—

"The whole medical art is based upon experience; and the value of any remedy can only be fairly tested by the omission of it in some of the cases in which it has been reputed to be most successful. Nothing can be stronger than the reputation which alcoholic stimulants have acquired, as affording efficient aid in the maintenance of the bodily strength under circumstances calculated to exhaust it; and yet the most unimpeachable testimony has shown the fallacy of this opinion, and has put 'universal experience' quite in the wrong. So it has sometimes happened that medical men have assured staunch teetotalers that they would die unless they admitted alcohol into their system as a medicine; but the patients, being obstinate, did neither, thus falsifying the prediction in a very unexpected measure, and proving that the experience of doctors is not more infallible than that of the public."

INTEMPERANCE IN CARLISLE.

WE have great pleasure in making the following extract from the Report of the Public Health Inquiry. The public are greatly indebted to Dr. Lonsdale for his spirit in bringing forward this important subject. It appears that Mr. Rawlinson, the Government Inspector is now engaged in Carlisle, and at one of his courts the following conversation took place:—

Dr. LONSDALE said there was another subject in which the inspector would no doubt feel interested—the number of public-houses in Carlisle.

Mr. RAWLINSON, in reply to a question from the Doctor, said that he had not any return of that description put in.

Dr. LONSDALE then said he had an opportunity of pointing out that Carlisle stood on the very lowest scale of temperance as far as public-houses were concerned. The Doctor here read over a number of returns from various towns in England, which, by comparison, showed that there were more public-houses in Carlisle, in proportion to the population, than in any other place. He differed with Mr. Steel in saying the population was twenty-seven thousand; twenty-five was more like the number; but he would take the medium, twenty-six thousand, and showed that there was a public-house for every 180 persons in Carlisle. He hoped the inspector would advert to this subject in his Report.

Mr. W. RICHARDSON asked if Dr. Lonsdale had got from the towns he had mentioned the number of "drunk and disorderly" that had been brought before the magistrates, as that was the real criterion whereby to judge of the temperance of a town. He was one of those who thought that drunkenness was not to be estimated by the number of those who sold drink.

Mr. RAWLINSON said that the matter was highly important to the whole community of Carlisle. It was a question which he might or might not enter into in his report, as it formed a portion of the act under the clause "General condition of the Inhabitants." He thought that when a proper drainage had been effected, and a thorough system of cleansing adopted; that when the poor man's home became more comfortable; when those evils which drove him to the public house no longer existed, but in their place a cheerful fireside and cleanly habitation, there would be a silent and imperceptible passing away of this habit of intoxication. He did not believe that Englishmen, especially the lower classes, when they were surrounded by the blessings of a comfortable home, would have the disposition to go away to the public-houses: when they were no longer beset by dirt, and heaps of loathsome accumulations; in fact, when a better state of things was brought about, the temptation to indulge in intoxicating liquors would be almost if not entirely removed. It might do good to contrast one town with another, but unless they traced the evil to its source, and pointed out and applied a remedy, not much could be effectually done by such comparisons.

Mr. GEORGE COWEN observed that the existence of many of the public-houses in Carlisle might be accounted for by the great number of travellers who passed through the town on their way to other places, as it was a sort of central point for all parties. In addition to this, the markets drew a great number of country people hither, and he believed that in no other place could there be found so extensive a market with such small accommodation.

Dr. LONSDALE merely contended for the fact he had stated; the inference to be drawn from it, and the discussion which would arise, might be inconvenient on an occasion like the present, therefore he had confined himself simply to the statement of the fact.

Mr. ROME dissented from Dr. Lonsdale's argument respecting the number of public-houses and the consequent insobriety of Carlisle. He believed that the number of houses had no influence upon drunkenness, in the same way that a great number of shops did not increase trade. Where there were fewer houses the greater was the attraction, for many went, not only for drink, but also to have the news of the day, and for the sake of company. He thought there was less drunkenness in Carlisle than in any other manufacturing town of the same population in the whole country.

Mr. FAWCETT mentioned that last Saturday was a fair day—and there was perhaps a larger fair than there had ever been before—and it was generally the case that after fairs a number of drunken characters made their appearance before the magistrates. On that day (Monday) there were only three (hear).

The MAYOR thought that the immorality in Liverpool was much greater than in Carlisle.

Mr. STEEL said that in Lancashire they would find men and women mixing up together and drinking together in public-houses; such a thing was never seen in Carlisle.

Dr. LONSDALE thought the reasons assigned by the Mayor were extremely imperfect, and he could successfully combat them if he were to argue the question; but he only wished to draw attention to the fact that there were such a number of public-houses in Carlisle, and when that statement went abroad people would draw their own inference. Dr. Lonsdale also stated, referring to Mr. George Dixon, in corroboration of what he said, that many of these houses were used for most improper purposes, and he hoped that the borough magistrates would on the next licensing-day carefully inquire into their character.

The MAYOR said he did not rise to differ with the doctor, but he had had much experience on the police committee, and he was fully convinced of the correctness of what he had stated.

Mr. RAWLINSON said he did not wish to interfere with the discussion, for he was quite satisfied that when public attention was directed to this subject it would be productive of good. He was quite satisfied the doctor could have no desire to misrepresent, and the difference of opinion appeared to arise out of a kind of local pride as to the character of their fellow townsmen (hear, hear).

Mr. COWEN observed that on the last licensing day the Borough Bench did not act upon the principle of increasing the number of public-houses. He believed that not a single additional license was granted.

Mr. W. RICHARDSON considered that the discussion had nothing to do with the sanitary inquiry, but was simply an argument as to whether the present licensing system was good policy or not.

Dr. LONSDALE observed that he had wished for no argument at all. He had merely brought forward facts.

Mr. W. RICHARDSON: You draw an inference.

Mr. STEEL: It does not belong to this inquiry at all.

Dr. LONSDALE: Decidedly it does.

Mr. RAWLINSON: It belongs so far to it that we have always tried to get the returns of the consumption of liquors from the officers of excise, but from some causes or other they have always been unable to furnish us with them. The inspector then went on to say that he should represent to the General Board of Health the anxiety expressed in Carlisle that no delay should occur in the application of the act, and he could state on their part that the General Board in London were equally anxious to receive these inquiries, especially when they had the support and encouragement of so large a community as Carlisle. It was much to be regretted that a work calculated to do such immense good should meet with obstruction, and this obstruction had in several instances been offered even after a petition had been sent up to London praying for the application of the act.

Many important considerations are suggested by this report; but we have not time to pursue the subject this month. In our next number we purpose to make some inquiry into the truth of the observation made by Mr. Rawlinson, that—"When a better state of things was brought about (this better state of things being sanitary arrangements) the temptation to indulge in intoxicating liquors would be almost if not entirely removed." As we think this involves some fallacy, we shall make it the subject of a special article next number.

WINE AND WATER DRINKERS.—My whole experience assures me that wine is no friend to vigour or activity of mind. It leaves body and soul in a state of listless indolence. In a survey of my whole acquaintance, I find that the water-drinkers possess the most equal tempers and cheerful dispositions.—Dr. Trotter.

RAGGED SCHOOL AND TEETOTALISM.

From public announcement I felt constrained to attend a meeting of the "Juvenile Band of Hope," and Cake Soiree, held in the lecture-room of the Working-man's Institute, Pear-street, Strutton-ground, Westminster, on Friday, November 2. The place was crowded as soon as the doors were opened. A large number of children of all ages was present, besides parents, hard-working men and women, benevolent ladies, ministers of the gospel, and several warm-hearted missionaries and advocates of the glorious cause. About one hundred and ten juvenile teetotalers were judiciously arranged on the platform and most conspicuous seats. Although some were bare-footed, they were remarkably clean, and their behaviour highly commendable—especially when we consider that most of them are the offspring of intemperate, improvident, and reckless parents, surrounded by every species of depravity, wretchedness, cruelty, and starvation.

T. B. SMITHIES, Esq., a distinguished friend of the rising generation, occupied the chair, and commenced the important and novel proceedings of the evening by reading a portion of God's word; afterwards a suitable prayer was presented at a throne of grace by Mr. Terence Smyth, of Canada.

The Chairman then delivered a very impressive address on the importance of such meetings, and the great and paramount influence they are calculated to exert in the world and the church in a few coming years; he exhorted the young to keep their pledges, and pray to heaven for strength and guidance. Excellent recitations were spoken by girls and boys with becoming simplicity and touching pathos, all of which were so admirably arranged as to depict the evils of intemperance in all their horrible phases and consequences, and the charms and blessings arising from the Total Abstinence principle. During the evening some pieces of sacred composition were sung by girls of the "Refugee and Schools of Industry" with good taste and sweetness, among which were "Flowers that never die," "Babel's fall," "Christmas-day," "Temperance band," &c.

About the middle of this intellectual and cheering enjoyment, the secretary, Mr. John H. Esterbrooke, founder of this recently-established temperance station, presented each member, on rising and producing their card of allegiance, with a good-sized currant cake, which they accepted with pleasing politeness and inexpressible delight. To our surprise and delight, this distribution was carried on with the utmost order and quietness. The secretary afterwards took a rapid and vivid glance at the consequences of the drinking customs of the land, and the imperative duty of all to abandon at once the vice of drinking. He was loudly cheered on retiring.

After a few excellent well-timed observations from the esteemed chairman, "Praise God" was sung by the dense assembly with solemnizing effect. Votes of thanks were passed to Mr. Smithies for his valuable services; to the governesses, school-masters, and teachers, for their kind and efficient aid; and also to the secretary for his persevering zeal in identifying the cause of Teetotalism with the Ragged-school movement of this large neighbourhood, and for the blessings of peace and morality which he has carried into man's wretched home, and for rescuing many a harrowing specimen of blasted humanity.

The poor children before they left were supplied with a pictorial book on "Temperance;" with a beautiful engraved card, with the following expressive motto—"Thou God seest me," with a piercing eye above.

The greatest enthusiasm prevailed throughout the evening. Some of the reclaimed mothers were so affected while listening to their children reciting, as to burst into tears, and at the close embraced their ragged offspring. Such an imposing spectacle of rescued children from the iron grasp of intemperance and vice, with joyous countenances, cleanly-clad apparel, and hearts brimful of gladness, through the angel influence of teetotalism, associated with the hearty affections they manifested towards their young benefactor, the secretary, the guardian of their present and future interests, have made impressions upon my heart which time will never remove, and which I will recollect with the most pleasurable feelings of emotion when seated at my own cottage fireside, in my native land, thousands of miles from this glorious land of Christian benevolence, temperance, energy, unbounded liberality, and feeling of universal brotherhood. — Notes by a British North American. T. ## TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

LONDON.

The second great public meeting in furtherance of the diffusion of temperance principles among the people of this country took place on Monday evening at Exeter-hall. The hall was exceedingly well filled. The 117th Psalm having been sung by the meeting,

JOHN CASSELL, Esq., took the chair, and proceeded to open the business of the evening. He said: The subject to be considered that evening was one of vast importance, and deserving the serious consideration of every one who felt interested in the moral and spiritual welfare of his fellow-men (hear). There was no class of individuals engaged in any benevolent enterprise who had been called upon to endure such an amount of obloquy and contempt as the temperance reformers. He did not allude to the hostility of those who were interested in the manufacture of alcoholic drinks, for from such persons opposition was to be anticipated; but to those who were classed with the wise and good fathers and "leaders in Israel;" men who preached against the evils of intemperance, but yet frowned upon those who were anxious to remove the cause (cheers). Even at that day, when the triumphs of total abstinence were so manifest, learned individuals, doctors of divinity, thought it consistent with their high character, so to step out of their course and assail teetotalism, not upon the ground that it was impracticable, for that they could not do in the face of the million of teetotalers in England and Wales and the four millions in Ireland, with millions in the United States, comprising men of all ages and moving in every grade of society, but they assailed it on the ground that it was false in principle, that it was unscriptural, and that consequently it had no claim upon Christians to unite for the purpose of propagating it (hear, hear). Learned and eloquent divines upon that platform, while lecturing to young men, had dragged in teetotalism, for the purpose of directing a philippic against it (hear, hear). When they saw such an impression existing in the minds of the religious community, it was deemed desirable that one evening of the series of meetings should be devoted to the purpose of showing the connexion between total abstinence, and the extension of religion, and above all to show that it was strictly in harmony with the gospel (cheers). To say that total abstinence was unscriptural, that it was not in accordance with the Bible, was unreasonable and absurd. Their country was deluged with drunkenness—drunkenness was the great cause of crime, and teetotalism offered a direct and effectual remedy (hear, hear). Apply it, and drunkenness would be crushed—reject it, and continuous iniquity would be the lot of that and every succeeding age (loud cheers). He would ask, did not the religion of the Bible call upon them to exercise their reasoning faculties, to bring into exercise their benevolence, for the purpose of doing good whenever the opportunity presented itself? (hear, hear.) They were not, it was true, expressly commanded to establish teetotal societies; but, nevertheless, the religion of the Bible called upon them to resist everything that tended to arrest the progress of the kingdom of God, or to injure the morals of the people. If they went to the Bible they would find that teetotalism, as it was technically called, was no new thing; they would find that the most eminent individuals that had ever figured in the world's history had been abstainers from intoxicating drinks (here Mr. Cassell demonstrated this truth from numerous scriptural examples). Still they met individuals well versed in Hebrew and Greek, who talked learnedly about the wines of the ancients. To such his answer was, that he could not argue the question with them, because he did not understand Hebrew or Greek. He looked at the case as a Christian, a patriot, and a philanthropist; and at the evils caused by the use of intoxicating drinks among the people at the present day (hear, hear). And if such individuals proceeded to contend with him that such drinks were given to man as a blessing, he would answer that, supposing they were originally given to man as a blessing, what were they in their later days (hear, hear). "We have nothing to do with what the ancients drank. We have to deal with modern times and our own country, and we hesitate not to say, that the greatest curse ever inflicted on a nation is the use of intoxicating liquors" (cheers). Mr. Livesey, of Preston, had estimated that the quantity of alcoholic liquors consumed in Great Britain in a year would make a river three feet deep, thirty feet wide, and 163 miles in length. And yet they wondered at the spread of dishonesty, prostitution, and crime (hear, hear). When he thought of the way in which intoxicating drinks were spreading desolation on every hand, making wives widows, and children fatherless, in fact ruining the working class, he could not but shudder at the result. Why, the judges on the bench stated that, in four out of every five cases brought before them, intoxicating drinks had been the first incentive to crime (hear, hear). And the evil was not confined to our own country, for we were the means of spreading it far and wide over the world (hear, hear). Our ships carried it to distant islands, and with it poisoned the inhabitants. They were simple savages. What had they done that we should introduce the fruitful cause of so much sin amongst them? (hear, hear.) Professedly our missions were for the extension of civilization, but we introduced intoxicating drinks among people who had heretofore been innocent and ignorant of their use. By this means youth was cut off in its vigour, and manhood in its strength, and misery was created in many a previously-smiling land. He asked, then, of the Christian men and Christian women, when they saw their country with its 600,000 drunkards, and were told that 60,000 fell victims to drunkenness every year, whether they should not resist this curse, and say, "Stay, hold thy hand, is it not enough?" (hear, hear.) Should they not do everything in their power to root out from the land this gigantic upstart, until every drunkard had been cured of his sin? (loud cheers.) Their principle had already effected much; it had not only reclaimed the drunkard, but had, in many cases, turned his attention to the contemplation of eternal things. Still it was found no small difficulty to convince the people of the evils of intemperance and of the efficacy of teetotalism. They said, "We know this is a monstrous evil, but we differ with you as to the remedy. What we want in this country is more places of worship. Let us erect more churches and chapels and schools; let us have the gospel more faithfully preached; and if that will not effect the reformation of the drunkard, we are sure that your system will fail." Now it was his decided opinion that the religious people did not understand the nature of the evils of drunkenness, or they never would introduce such an argument. What was intemperance or the passion for strong drink? It was not only a moral, but a physical evil; and not one which was a necessary consequence of our fallen nature. It was an acquired passion, and was added to all our other evils (hear). They were told by physiologists that the brain was the organ of the mind, and how important, then, was it that they should not introduce into the system anything calculated to derange its functions. Alcohol was dangerous not only to the liver, lungs, and stomach, but it mounted to the brain, the port royal of the soul, and there committed its dreadful ravages (hear, hear). The rational communication between mind and matter was suspended and the man fell into a state of absolute insanity. It was no use preaching the gospel to a drunkard any more than it would be to an insane man (hear, hear). The gospel was never intended for a remedy for physical evils, and it was a physical evil which they sought to remedy. The founder of that gospel had been compared to a husbandman, and the gospel was his seed. But if they wanted the seed to be sown successfully, there must be an adaptation between the soil and the seed. Suppose the Government had allotted to him (Mr. Cassell) some bog land in Ireland on the condition of his cultivating it, and that he commenced at once sowing broadcast without any previous preparation, would not his labour be in vain? (hear, hear.) Should he not first drain his bog, and then no doubt it would bring forth fruits in abundance. So it was with the mind of the drunkard. If they attempted to sow gospel-seed in his unreformed mind these would be no adaptation, but let them go to work with the machinery they had created. Let them dig drains, so to speak—let them dig the dykes of total abstinence, and drain his brain of the alcohol, and then he would be prepared to receive his intellectual and spiritual food ("Hear," and cheers). Then they might sow the precious seed of the gospel; it would be sure to take root and would bring forth fruit in abundance. They had the evidence of ministers in various parts of the kingdom to testify that, since the principles of teetotalism had been broached, they had witnessed many instances of drunkards not only cured of their vice, but turned to spiritual ways. He asked them, as Christian men and Christian women, to think of the 600,000 drunkards in this country, and not to let them go down to the bottomless pit crying out, "No man careth for my soul" (hear, hear). They (the Society) were determined to persevere. They would knock at the door of the Conference, and never stand still until they made all Christian people awake to the evil. He trusted that ministers and laity, Christian men and Christian women, would come forward and show to the world, by their example in abstinence, that they considered the lives and souls of their fellow-creatures of more importance than any gratification they could experience from the use of strong drink (cheers).

The Rev. W. MORTON, late of Calcutta, then addressed the meeting. He said that after spending thirty years as a missionary in a foreign country, he felt a deep and growing interest in the abstinence cause. That cause was one of great importance—an importance extending to eternity. Facts were stubborn things, and those in favour of abstinence could only be met by opposing facts (hear, hear). His own observations abroad supported the experience of the missionaries whose names had been mentioned by the chairman. The inhabitants of India, as a nation, were professedly and actually water drinkers (cheers). The Brahmin, in whom centred all the dignity and importance of his race, on the authority of the sacred books, abstained on principle from intoxicating drinks. British customs, however, had operated to introduce the use of strong drinks among the lowest class of the population. This was attributable partly to the example of the British residents, and partly to the efforts of the Government to obtain revenue from the use of intoxicating liquors (hear, hear). To such an extent had Christians—even Christian missionaries—thus injured the Indian population, that within the last few years a temperance movement had been headed by the millionaire native of Calcutta, a heathen to the fullest extent of the word, and of the grossest kind, for the purpose of stemming the tide of drunkenness which Christians had introduced. It was objected to abstinence that it was nowhere spoken of in scripture as a virtue, though temperance was declared to be one. Whatever might be said as to the abstract lawfulness of using intoxicating liquors, if all the best authorities united in declaring that the use of strong drinks was filling the land with crime of every kind; if experience showed that legislation, education, and the best moral efforts had failed to effect a cure for the prevalent evil, the disease being desperate, they were driven to the adoption of a desperate remedy (cheers). The necessity resembled that which occasionally existed for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. One startling fact was admitted by all well-informed persons, that the present rate of evangelisation did not overtake and was not even proportionate to the increase of population. To what, then, but abstinence could ministers look as a means of effecting a change? The principle of adopting a pledge had been followed by some clergymen who had proposed a pledge as a means of withstanding Puseyism. [The speaker here read the pledge to the meeting.] St. Paul declared, that if meats or strong drinks made his brother to offend he would not take either. Here was the principle of total abstinence admitted and sanctioned by the apostle of the Gentiles. The same apostle said further, "I will not be in the power of anything;" that is, he would not be the slave of his nose or his palate (cheers). By far the larger number of exclusions from the Indian churches had arisen from intoxication. It could not be wrong to arrest such an evil in its course (cheers). As regarded the religious effects of temperance, he had known many instances of persons who having been in misery and rags, under the practice of temperance had, after taking the pledge, not only formed improved general habits, but had become regular attendants at a place of worship (hear, hear).

Mr. D. G. PAINE, of Deptford, was the next speaker. The word unscriptural was very effectual against any cause to which it was opposed, and that word had been much employed against temperance. The principle of temperance appeared at once calculated to produce good effects. But it was asked whether temperance was scriptural, and that question was one in professing which the profane joined with the religious. They must come to a clear and satisfactory understanding on this point. Was the adoption of abstinence as a principle defensible by scripture? If they searched in the Bible for examples on either side the investigation would be fruitless; examples might be found both for and against, and they could therefore only arrive thus at a negative conclusion. This mode of searching failing, they must turn from example to principles. Suppose that not a single instance of the practice of abstinence could be produced, still, if it were found that a great principle, interlinked with Christianity, was infringed by the use of intoxicating drinks, nothing more should be required to induce abstinence. If it were the testimony of scientific men that such drinks were dangerous to the constitution, introducing a desire which threatened the healthful action of the body inimical to the welfare of the soul, that was sufficient to establish the principle of abstinence. The precept, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," was a virtual condemnation of intoxicating drinks (hear). Christians, doubtful of the consistency of total abstinence should look around them and observe the effects of drunkenness (cheers). They should visit dwellings in towns, in which all the inmates, young and old, were the subject of its power. They should visit spots in the country, in which they would learn that the peasant, living under the influence of drink, was not the innocent rustic whom poets had portrayed (hear, hear). The Bible bade them "look not every one only on his own things, but also on those of others;" and thus seconded conscience when it whispered the command, "Deny thyself" (cheers). He concluded with an earnest appeal to professors of religion, who were not yet total abstainers, to meditate calmly on the spirit and tenor of scripture, declaring his belief that the result of their doing so would be the adoption by them of the principle of total abstinence.

The Rev. S. DUNN, of Nottingham (late member of the Wesleyan Conference), on rising to address the meeting, was received with loud and reiterated cheers. He said he believed that, notwithstanding all the attacks which had been made on the cause of abstinence, it was rising in public estimation. It was a satisfaction to himself to be able to declare that he had never drunk a glass of brandy, rum, or gin, had never smoked a pipe or a cigar, and had never taken a pinch of snuff since he was born (laughter and cheers). He had now passed his fiftieth year. In the course of his life he had, perhaps, travelled as many miles, preached as many sermons, delivered as many lectures, seen as much public service in various climes, under various circumstances, by night and by day, on the sea and on the land, as most ordinary men; and though he had never tasted ardent spirits, he had never yet had one day's bodily sickness or pain (cheers). He then proceeded to relate his missionary experience for the purpose of illustrating the practicability of total abstinence under the most trying circumstances of missionary life. He observed that his friend the late Adam Clarke had told him that more Methodist preachers had been destroyed by strong drinks than by any other cause (hear, hear). For a quarter of a century he had been exposed to great temptations to cease from abstaining, but whatever faults might be attributed to him by his Wesleyan brethren, none could say that he had ever put the poisonous cup to his lips. He had been subjected to some ridicule by the firm stand which he had made personally, and by his remarks on temperance in the pulpit. He had never before attended a temperance meeting. A rule of the Conference prohibited the use of Wesleyan chapels for total abstinence meetings, a subject of much regret to him, if only on account of the many expulsions which he had himself been compelled to enforce (hear, hear). It was to his expulsion from the Conference as a Wesleyan minister that his presence that evening was attributable. In conclusion, he entreated the friends of total abstinence to put forth increased energy in seeking its extension.

The Rev. J. KIRK, of Edinburgh, delivered the concluding address, choosing as his special topic the influence of the drinking customs of society on the spiritual interests of those who were engaged in the trade of strong drink. He knew of no men whose case was more fitted to move the heart of benevolence than those who daily prepared or delivered strong drink for the use of their fellow-creatures. He then narrated several cases which had come within his own knowledge in illustration of the foregoing remark. A friend of his once had occasion to seek the use of a room for a temperance meeting. The person with whom the power principally rested happened to be himself engaged in the spirit trade. On going to him his friend found him busied with a number of customers, and he remarked to him, "You see I am very busy; we must be diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord." So delusive was the effect of his occupation that he actually imagined that in pursuing it he was doing God service (hear, hear). Strange to say, the spirit-dealer acceded to the request for the room, observing that he was a great friend to temperance (laughter). In their individual capacity they were bound to regard the interests of men engaged in this trade. He concluded by calling upon all who were not then total abstiners to become so at once (cheers).

A vote of thanks was given to the chairman.

HARP-ALLEY, FARRINGTON-STREET.

We understand that BENJAMIN ROTCH, Esq., one of her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the county of Middlesex, has become the President of the above society, and that he will take the chair at the forthcoming annual festival, to take place in the usual place of meeting, the British School-room, Harp-alley, on the 27th inst. This has usually been a season of deep interest, and is not likely to be less so on this occasion.

HAWKSTON-HALL, WATERLOO-ROAD.

The meetings in the new hall continue to be held every week, under very encouraging circumstances. The committee, we understand, intend getting up a festival on the evening of New Year's Day, in a style not hitherto attempted by any of the Metropolitan Temperance Societies.

THE TRIUMPH OF TEETOTALISM AT A RAGGED-SCHOOL.

In order to commemorate the laying of the foundation stone of a church in Westminster, a few days since, J. Carter Wood, Esq., brewer, of that neighbourhood, sent a quantity of good beef, bread, potatoes, and a large barrel of beer to the children of the Ragged school, who were seated before a long table and supplied with the solid nutritious substances, the sight of which made their eyes beam with joy and their hearts beat with gratitude. A mug of beer was also placed before each poor child, but the members of the Westminster Juvenile Band of Hope, as if touched by an electric wire, simultaneously and fearlessly pushed away the mug of beer, exclaiming, "We will not drink the drunkards drink;" and this noble and cheering devotedness was manifested in the presence of their governesses, masters, and others, who are not Teetotalers! How powerfully does this circumstance speak in favour of juvenile temperance societies, and their probable influence in accelerating the triumphs of the hallowed cause of sobriety and virtue. The gentleman referred to is one of the committee of the "Westminster Improvements," and to exhibit his Christian benevolence and good taste, is erecting a large public-house facing our ragged-schools, and just by stands his black looking brewery, as if in mourning for the myriads murdered by the poisoned drinks there manufactured—drinks made from the people's bread, while numbers are perishing in loathsome cellars and dreary garrets, for the want of the common necessaries of life, and our alleys and courts are teeming with ragged children and drunken parents, resulting from such curses of our land.

CONGREGATIONAL TEETOTALISM.

On Monday evening, November 12, the members and friends of the Association for the Diffusion of Total Abstinence Information in the Church took tea in the Fitzroy Temperance-hall, in commemoration of its third anniversary. Nearly one hundred persons sat down to the social feast; after which a meeting was held, Mr. ROBERTS, treasurer of the association, presided, and in a few pointed remarks spoke of the perpetuation of the drinking system depending in a great measure on the position and practice of professing Christians.

The SECRETARY read the report, which stated the society to have been the result of the World's Temperance Convention. Its operations were chiefly confined to the distribution of tracts among professing Christians. Among other encouraging circumstances narrated was the following:—A Christian man through the perusal of one of the tracts became an abstainer, shortly after he visited his native town carrying the tract with him, which was made the means in leading several to pay attention to the subject of Temperance, and inducing a malster to give up his occupation from conscientious convictions. Nearly 10,000 tracts including pamphlets had been circulated during the twelve months.

Mr. G. CAMPBELL demonstrated that while Sabbath Schools and Missionary Societies might be injured by drinking, it was not possible for them to be benefited by it; and, on the other hand, each of these might be benefited were those connected with them total abstiners. The object of teetotalers was, not to put teetotalism in the place of Sabbath-schools, or of missionary societies, or of the Gospel, but in the place of drinking, so that the question was not whether teetotalism was better than either of these, or any other mode of Christian operation, but is teetotalism better than drinking.

Mr. MANN referred to the position for usefulness a Christian who was an abstainer occupied above those who were not; and advanced the following fact:—A man had several times been cut off from the church in consequence of drinking; his wife applied to an officer in the church to visit him, urging that if he would make her husband a teetotaler all might be well; he not being a total abstainer his conscience would not permit his enforcing what he did not conform to, he consequently excused himself by sending the woman to Mr. M. Therefore he thought he had opportunity for Christian usefulness which it was impossible those who drank strong drink could have.

The Rev. W. MORTON stated several cases of individuals who had occupied high and influential stations losing property and character through drink. In an appeal to mothers he proved the education given in childhood to be the implanting of principles which would grow with their growth, illustrating this by the manner in which idolatry was perpetuated in India; the mothers taking their children from the earliest period to the shrine of the idol gods, and instructing them in the obscenity and follies connected with that devotion, to which afterwards they become desperately attached.

A hymn was then sung, and this refreshing meeting terminated. A. S. D.

BRIXTON AND CAMBERWELL.

The newly-formed Temperance Association of the above places made a successful debut on Wednesday, 7th Nov., at Camberwell. This first public meeting was attended by about 300 respectable tradesmen and others, and was by far the most influential meeting ever held in this locality in favour of the Total Abstinence cause. B. ROTCH, Esq., was in the chair, and was well supported by the speeches of the Rev. Dr. Burns, Thos. Beggs, Rev. J. Doxsey, and Rev. A. W. Keritage. Mr. Prebble, the hon. sec., read a report, of which the following is an abstract:—In this parish there are two lunatic asylums, generally containing eight or nine hundred unhappy inmates. Lord Ashley has publicly stated that at least two-thirds of the lunatics of this country are bereft of reason by strong drink. Upon this calculation, five or six hundred of these unfortunates are victims of the drinking habits of society. Some competent authorities reckon as many as nine-tenths, resulting from the daily use of intoxicants, which will give above 750 residents in two asylums in this parish in whom drink has darkened or destroyed the noblest endowment of our race. There are said to be 300 paupers in the workhouse, and a careful attention to the history of English pauperism will render probable the conclusion that 250 of these have been cast on the parish through drinking habits, and the extravagance, indolence, and neglect usually produced. The desecration of the Sabbath by the drinking practices is awful to relate. On an examination of 13 public-houses and 19 beer-shops one Sabbath evening, during divine service, 201 men, 13 women, and 2 boys were found. Drinking, swearing, smoking, and singing, were their Sabbath amusements, and in several instances drunkenness had set its mark upon its victims even at that early hour. The examination occupied one hour and a half, and was necessarily hasty and superficial, but in that time these melancholy facts were ascertained. If it were necessary, the names of several respectable tradespeople and other parishioners might be given from the recollection of the committee, of the ruin occurring to the parties by the wide-spread temptations of drinking usages. It was but the other day a tradesman returned home in a state of degradation from over-drinking, and fearfully swift was his destruction, for in nine hours he was a corpse. Another, a few months back, fell down stairs, and died from dislocation of the neck. This was a drinking man. Opposite to him we have the case of a wretched death in the hospital, from disease proceeding from drink. Nine companions in debauchery were seized with delirium, and were under medical treatment at one time; six were cut off from this horrid cause. Several are at this moment roaming like unsettled spirits over the parish, to the utter neglect of their families, to say nothing of society. It may be predicted of them, that they will follow the steps of many, very many, of those who end their day in the work-house or lunatic asylum. Who, then, shall say that Camberwell needs no enlightenment upon the subject we have taken up—viz.: the adoption of true temperance. Many annoyances and dangers arise from the drinking habits of drivers and conductors of omnibuses; and it is surely of importance to put a stop to the present recklessness, caused by a glass above, or the sullenness of a glass below par. A few months back a gentleman fell from the box while "vinous," and though after some weeks he recovered, he will never be the same man again. Another died instantly, under a similar accident. In our street more than thirty could be named who have either died or been ruined through this disease. Many falling from honourable positions in society—many mothers made wretched by their sons' enlistment into that slavery of slaveries, the military profession. Drink, the insatiable monster, the invariable cause. The subjects allotted to the different speakers were listened to with interest, and several pledges were given during the proceedings, as well as at the close.

THOS. PREBBLE, Hon. Sec.

CLAPHAM AND STOCKWELL.

A public meeting was held in Lark-hall school-room on Thursday, 15th inst., when a lecture was delivered to young persons "on the evils of the Drinking Customs" by Mr. John H. Esterbrooke. Notwithstanding the stormy state of the evening, the attendance was respectable, and the greatest attention was paid to the lecturer. At the close sixteen persons signed, including two local preachers. A society will shortly be formed in this place.

BRENTWOOD.

The friends of the Temperance cause in this place have begun their winter campaign. On the 1st of November Mr. T. A. SMITH, of London, delivered a lecture in the National School-room, to a respectable company. In the lecture Mr. Smith explained the nature of the various kinds of intoxicating liquors, and their physiological effects. On the following evening a social tea-party was held in the school-room of the Independent chapel. The Rev. Mr. Hall, the minister of the chapel, presided, and on taking the chair stated that, though he had not been much among them of late, yet he felt a deep interest in the cause. Addresses were then delivered by Mr. Allen, from Glasgow; Mr. T. A. Smith, and Messrs. Gibson and Butler. The East India Company's barracks being near this town, a considerable number of the soldiers were present at the tea, and at the close of the meeting ten soldiers and four civilians signed our pledge.

EPSOM.

On the 6th and 7th of November, Mr. T. A. SMITH delivered two lectures in the British School. The lectures were illustrated with drawings of the stomach, liver, bowels, lungs, heart, and blood-vessels, and also with a real human stomach. In the first lecture he described the processes connected with the analysis of animal and vegetable substances; the composition of the various kinds of intoxicating liquors; the changes these liquors undergo in the human system; and their effects on the function of digestion. In the second lecture he described the composition and uses of the blood; the structure and uses of the heart and blood-vessels; the effects of alcohol on the heart's action; on the function of respiration; and in the production of disease; and concluded by an appeal to all who were present, to assist in reclaiming the drunkard; preserving the temperate; and banishing intemperance from the face of the earth.

ASHTON KEYNES, NEAR CIRENCESTER.

A tea meeting was recently held in the Independent chapel by the Temperance Society of Oaksey, and some friends from the surrounding neighbourhood. After tea a public meeting was held; Mr. Newman, from Cirencester, was called to the chair. The speakers on the occasion were Messrs. H. Alexander, A. Knight, T. Cornley, W. Hall,

J. Packer, and James Jefferies. Some appropriate hymns were sung by the members and choir of the chapel. At the close of the meeting eighteen signed the pledge and since then the number is augmented to nearly forty.—H. COX.

MIDDLEWICH, CHESHIRE.

The above-named place is a small market-town, containing about 3,500 inhabitants. The society owes its origin to the visits of Messrs. Collins, Barlow, and Gorst, of Northwich. Their first visit was on the 6th of May, 1849. Thomas Thompson, a distinguished teetotaler, having been apprised of their second visit, which was on the 10th of June, gave them a hearty reception; and as the result of this and their subsequent visits, a committee was formed, and the society established July the 19th.

The society held its first festival on Tuesday, October 16th, being Wake-Tuesday. A procession, headed by the "Middlewich harmonic brass band," marched through the principal streets of the town. A numerous company sat down in the Town-hall, after which a public meeting was held. The chair was taken by Mr. Thompson, of Northwich. The meeting was addressed by the Rev. E. Britain, Primitive Methodist of Sandbach; the Rev. Mr. Metcalf, Wesleyan Minister; and Mr. Collins, of Northwich.

On Wednesday evening, October 17th, a public meeting was held in the Primitive Methodist Chapel; John Nixon, Primitive Methodist local preacher, in the chair. The meeting was addressed by John Tench and John Leech, of Middlewich; Messrs. Gorst and Barlow, of Northwich; and Ellis, of Betyl. The number of signatures gained from the commencement is 154.

SCOTLAND.

We are much pleased to find that our highly-respected friend, J. S. BUCKINGHAM, Esq., in addition to the popular and instructive lectures which he has been delivering in various towns in Scotland, has found opportunities for advocating the important principle of total abstinence from strong drinks. At Inverness, "a soiree was given by the Total Abstinence Society, in honour of Mr. Buckingham, and for the purpose of hearing an address from that gentleman. The attendance was numerous, and a large portion of the audience were children. The Rev. Mr. Clark, who filled the chair, introduced Mr. Buckingham, who entertained the audience with an interesting sketch of his own experience in connection with the Temperance cause, concluding by an earnest appeal to those present to act upon Temperance principles, and do what they could in their several spheres for the promotion of the cause. A vote of thanks was proposed by Mr. Clark for the able address with which Mr. Buckingham had favoured them; and, in acknowledging the compliment, Mr. Buckingham insisted that, if they were sincere in returning thanks for his address, they should follow his advice, and humorously adverted to the powerful influence which sweethearts and wives could exert in behalf of the Temperance cause upon their admirers and husbands. Mr. Buckingham was listened to with great attention, and was frequently and loudly applauded in the course of his address." At Banff, also, "Mr. Buckingham having been requested by the Committee of the Total Abstinence Society to deliver a lecture on Temperance during his stay in Banff, acceded at once to this request, and generously gave a lecture without any other remuneration than the enjoyment of that gratification which a benevolent mind feels in being instrumental in doing good to others. The lecture was of the first order in every respect. The sentiments were logical and convincing—beautifully expressed, and breathing forth the spirit of purest philanthropy. The audience, which was both large and respectable, listened, for about two hours, with breathless attention to facts and arguments which were presented, illustrated, and enforced, in such a way as to rivet attention and plant conviction in every breast." A similar course has, we understand, been adopted in other towns.

CAPE TOWN.

To the Editor of the Teetotal Times.

RESPECTED SIR,—Though separated by thousands of miles, we are united, I believe, in one great work—the promotion of the principles of Total Abstinence; and a gratifying report of the proceeding of a Total Abstinence Society, though in this distant part of the world, will, I doubt not, be received by you with pleasure, as affording another pleasing testimony that the supporters of this glorious cause are steadily increasing. Should you consider it worthy of a place in your periodical, you would confer a favour on the friends of Total Abstinence here by its insertion.

On Tuesday evening, the 1st May last, the members and friends of the Cape Town Abstinence Society assembled at the Orphan-house Chapel, Long-street, which the minister thereof, though not a member of our society, had kindly placed at our service; and notwithstanding the unpropitious state of the weather (for it rained almost incessantly for some hours during the afternoon), upwards of 200 individuals partook of a plentiful supply of cake and tea, at the first meeting of this kind (viz., a teetotal tea meeting) ever held in this part of the colony. After the tables had been removed, a public meeting was held, at which a report of the proceedings of the past year, &c., was read, a copy of which is enclosed herein. Several interesting addresses were also delivered, and at the close of the meeting several additional signatures were obtained. The greatest harmony and good humour prevailed throughout. A more interesting spectacle than was presented on this occasion it would be almost impossible to describe. Joy seemed to fill every heart, and beam in every countenance; and we think that the remembrance of it will be one of the last impressions that will be effaced from the minds of many that were present.

Our society is still prospering. We hold public meetings twice every month, at the close of which additional signatures are always obtained. May this and all similar institutions continue to prosper under the direction of Him whom we trust we gratefully acknowledge has guided us hitherto, is the earnest desire of

Your obedient servant,

CYRUS JAS. MARTIN, Secretary.

Cape Town, 13th August, 1849.

From the report read at the annual meeting of the Cape Town Total Abstinence Society, we find that the Society has recently been reorganised, and that 364 persons had signed the pledge since that period; 217 of these were military members, and the total number on the book was 534. Several instances of reclamation from habits of intemperance were on record.

TEETOTALISM DEFENDED. An Examination of the "Confessions of a Convert from Teetotalism to Temperance." By A. W. HERITAGE. London: W. Tweedie, Falcon-street.

This sober, serious, candid "Examination" is admirably calculated to settle the minds of any who may have, for a moment, wavered, in consequence of the fallacies and misrepresentations contained in Thomas Smeeton's "Confessions." To such persons we strongly recommend it.

THE BENEFITS OF TOTAL ABSTINENCE FROM INTOXICATING LIQUORS, in reclaiming the intemperate, and restoring the backslider. By WILLIAM SPRIGGS. London: C. Gilpin, Bishoppate-street.

The principal portion of this tract was originally published in the form of a letter to the late lamented William Cash. It contains a thrilling relation of the writer's experience, both as a lover of strong drink and as an abstainer therefrom; interspersed with many useful observations and advices. To this, the third edition, is added a short tribute to the memory of Mr. Cash—a friendly address to Teetotalers—and remarks on capital punishments. The earnestness which characterises Mr. Spriggs' oral addresses is seen in every page of this tract, and from its perusal various classes may derive information, encouragement, or caution, as their circumstances may require.

ON THE MANAGEMENT OF INFANCY. With Remarks on the Influence of Diet and Regimen. By CHARLES HOGG, M.R.C.S., &c. London: J. Churchill.

HEALTHY, honest, affectionate children, are the noblest bequest we can make to posterity. Learning and wealth may, under wise guidance, achieve some worthy purposes, but their continuance cannot be insured for one generation; whereas a healthy constitution is transmissible by poor as easily as by rich, if they will resist the temptations of perverted appetite, and not deprive themselves of the lessons of experience and honest science. "As the twig is bent the tree is inclined." If every infant entering into life were to be well and wisely treated in regard to its physical nature only, an important point would be gained towards future good. The popular sanitary movement commenced in the sewers and gutters; it then reached the human skin, and baths were furnished to keep the surface clean. External purifications must on no account be neglected, but upon inward rectitude even more depends.

The advocates of total abstinence have popularised much scientific truth in respect to fermented liquors. Mr. Hogg fully ratifies all their assertions, and proceeds to the no less important ground of a salutary diet. Above and before all things he demands that infancy shall be rescued from the mistakes of unwise affection, and that the most tender of relationships shall not, as it now frequently is, be rent asunder or rendered unhappy. He is anxious that children should pass through the ordeals of measles, teething, scarlet fever, and the other trials of infancy, without danger, on the simple principle of giving only mild, bland diet, and strictly forbidding all irritating and stimulating substances. His work is full of excellent practical advice, and is perfectly intelligible by the general reader. We quote a passage or two from the "Appendix":—

"Ardent spirits are destructive of the energies of both body and mind. When taken, even in moderation, a powerful preternatural action is produced throughout the whole system; the pulse is rendered full and quick, the mind is exhilarated, and the muscular strength increased for a time; but the lassitude, languor, and other symptoms of debility, which speedily follow the reaction, prove how hurtful the repeated effect must be; and those who indulge in dram-drinking are, of all men, the most to be pitied. A greater curse cannot be inflicted on a nation than the easy purchase of spiritous liquors. This monster of iniquity is not confined to large towns alone; the surrounding villages are wallowing in the same moral turpitude, poverty, political discord, and oppression.

"The bad effects of ardent spirits on the constitution of those who indulge in them, are no less apparent; the long train of stomach complaints, of which dram-drinkers are the subjects, ought to be a warning to the young and inexperienced. The deceitful exhilaration of a few hours is a poor compensation for the suffering from indigestion, flatulence, and the gnawing pains which tempt a recurrence to the fatal dose. This pernicious habit gives rise also to various affections of the liver, particularly that hardened state of it, which often ends in dropsy, and other symptoms of a broken-down constitution. The use of spirits predisposes likewise to inflammatory attacks of various organs, to erysipelas, and disorders of the head, ending in apoplexy and palsy."—P. 132.

Good, as far as it goes. We should, however, have been better pleased if Dr. Hogg had included in his category all distilled and fermented liquors.

THE DRUNKARD'S LIBERTY.—When first I got acquainted with strong drink, it promised me liberty—and I got liberty. I had the liberty to see my toes poke out of my boots—the water had the liberty to go in at the toes and get out at the heels; my knees had the liberty to come out of my pants; my elbows had the liberty to come out of my coat; I had the liberty to lift the crown of my hat and scratch my head without taking my hat off. Not only liberty I got, but music also. When I walked along on a windy day,

"The crown of my hat
Would go flipperty flap,
And the wind whistle—'How do you do?'"

THE MANNINGS AND BRANDY; OR THE MURDEROUS QUALITIES OF STRONG DRINKS.

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

IN one of the reports of the "Confessions" of Manning, given in the public papers, he stated that when the murder of O'Connor was contemplated, his wife laid in a store of brandy—twelve bottles, if we remember rightly. He says that, generally, she was rather sparing in providing these liquors; but now, all at once, she became very bountiful. This shows that she had great faith in alcohol as an inhuman, a corrupting, and destructive beverage. She knew her husband well; and from some points of his character—which, in spite of all efforts to conceal them, have become prominent—we should conclude that he was not over-squeamishly humane, or that at any time he very much stuck at trifles when a question of interest presented itself. Still, his wife feared that some relic of humanity might remain in his bosom, and that he might shrink from shedding blood; and, therefore, to make doubly sure of transforming him at once into a brute and a demon, she resolved to ply him with strong drink. Brandy, she may have reasoned, can do wonders in the way of drying up the last drop of the milk of human kindness from the souls of men and women. She was, doubtless, competent to judge of this experiment, for she had kept a public-house. The scenes she had there witnessed of the almost omnipotent character of these liquors to degrade mankind, and render them fit for any crime, must have inspired her with an unshaken confidence in its power to thoroughly equip herself and her husband as murderers; and therefore she laid in a good supply of these mental and moral poisons.

To ascribe mental and moral influence to a physical beverage may seem contradictory, if not absurd. But "facts are stubborn things;" and facts, rather than theories, must be our guide. True physics and metaphysics cannot wage war with veritable history; or, if they do, by that very act they transform themselves into science and "philosophy falsely so called." Alcohol is a physical and metaphysical plague. It first effects the nerves, then the brain, and finally the soul. It can do this with such rapidity that the different stages of the operation may not be observed; as, in the feats of the juggler, the manner of the performance may escape detection. Still the result is evident and palpable. Strong drinks taken in large quantities can produce temporary paralysis of the nerves, muscles, and brain, so that under their curse the giant is reduced to a helpless infant and drivelling idiot. In more cautious draughts, it can inflame the passions, and nerve the arm, for the most cruel deeds; and thus it possesses a power beyond any other substance with which we are acquainted. It especially arms men and women for cruelty, and renders them hard-hearted, and reckless of results. If, as phrenologists say, there is an organ of destructiveness in the brain, alcoholic drinks possess the cruel art of quickening it into the most deadly vigour and virulence; and thus these liquors are a bane to the physical, the mental, and the moral constitution of man.

Mrs. Manning could not have kept a tavern, an ale-house, or a gin-palace, without being well versed in these truths. She had probably seen the husband, under the influence of beer or gin, destroy his wife and family by the most cruel process. In these cases, the barbarity of the inquisitor, with his vast and tremendous apparatus of torture, or the exquisite brutality of the Indian savage, who dissects his victim alive, and takes his body to pieces a joint at a time, while he carefully guards the vital part that pain may reach its climax, had all been thrown into the shade. She sold and dispensed a liquor which made "woman forget her sucking child," which rendered husbands more brutal than brutes, and sank fathers and relatives below tigers, wolves, vipers, or dragons. The newspapers almost daily informed her how skilful and heartless men and women could be made by the tankard and the bottle; and therefore she had no doubt that her husband, had he been as tender-hearted as an angel, could be transformed by ardent spirits or beer into the image of a murderous demon. The death of O'Connor was, as a consequence, planned without the least fear of a failure. Brandy! BRANDY! could do it all. She tried the experiment, and how awfully she succeeded is now a matter of history. The unhappy victim, without a moment's warning, and in the midst of his crimes, is sent into the presence of his JUDGE. In one instant, the pistol—in the hand of a WOMAN!—fixes his doom for ever. The dying man dripping with gore, and perhaps casting the last look of indignation and despair upon his treacherous destroyer, has his pockets rifled of his keys. That last look was one which might have paralysed a vandal or a fury, but brandy! brandy! can brave anything. She gives him the last blow with the crowbar, and hastens to his lodgings for his treasure; while her husband, in sight of the corpse, smokes his pipe! On her return, they bury the uncoffined body, and cover it with quicklime to hasten decomposition. Finally, the cruelty of the Mannings is more than imitated by our laws; and now, O'Connor and his barbarous destroyers have met face to face on the awful shores of eternity!

The tale is one of the most melancholy that has been written for a long time; and is perhaps as tremendous an example of the potency of strong drink to destroy the bodies and souls of men as we have on record. And, alas! the case is not solitary. Every week, and almost every newspaper, proclaims the doings of alcohol. Executions are on the increase, and the spectators of this barbarous custom in a Christian land depart from the gallows more steeped in vice than before. What myriads have been corrupted by the crime and execution of the Mannings! In these awful facts there is A MORAL, which all ought to study with the deepest seriousness.

Our age is one in which not a few profess to aspire to the extreme of spirituality. To those members of our churches, and ministers of religion, who use and commend intoxicating drinks, we might say: "Ladies and Gentlemen, you have attained to the climax of your vows. With the same mouth and hand with which you recommend the omnipotent grace of JEHOVAH to save, you extol another power, which is almost as omnipotent to destroy; and thus, 'from the same lips proceed blessing and cursing.' You seem to be as much delighted with Mount Ebal as with Mount Gerizim, and for every single soul that you save by the Gospel, thousands are destroyed by the liquor that you use, and so heartily commend. Yes, this insinuating, material demon, which lies concealed in your beer, wine, &c. &c., has destroyed millions of souls! You are fully aware of this fact, and stand ready to admit it, while you lift the deadly draught to your mouth. If you continue to use this bane, it will shorten your days. The assertion that you cannot do without it, is ample proof that it has already committed dreadful havoc on your body and mind. What was at first a luxury is now a want; and you are in the condition of the most pitiable voluntary slave. Indigestion, nervousness, depressed spirits, &c. &c., proclaim that you have fallen by the potent influence of this arch-deceiver.

But alcohol may go further than even this. It has cast down many mighty men wounded, and many strong men have been slain by it. Not a few ministers of religion have been degraded from their holy office; myriads of members of churches have been dismissed, and we should not exaggerate if we said that millions of the young have been decoyed and destroyed by these drinks, multitudes of whom were once hopeful children in our Sabbath-schools. We have seen whole families of professing Christians demoralised and beggared by these poisons; and what hosts of ministers' children have been thus rendered a bane to themselves and society!

You have no excuse for using these drinks. Millions now have abstained, and have reaped from the pledge incalculable benefits; while impaired health, debauchery, murders, and every description of woe, have arisen from their use. In drinking, or in commending them, you endanger your own health, intellect, and morals; you put in jeopardy the temporal and eternal prospects of your offspring, and you encourage one of the greatest physical and moral plagues that has visited the world. Let facts speak. Let the fate of the Mannings warn. Let self-interest, domestic affection, patriotism, and religion, have a voice in your conscience, and then we are sure that you will join our ranks and TOTALLY ABSTAIN.

MORE BRANDY! ATTEMPT AT PARRICIDE!

On Wednesday, December 19, Henry Bathurst Monkhouse, aged 29, was arraigned at the bar of the Old Bailey, upon an indictment charging him with the capital offence of discharging a loaded pistol at his father, John Farmer Monkhouse. The evidence against him was clear and decisive. The defence set up was, that the prisoner, who was addicted to habits of intemperance, made the attack upon his father while in a dreadful state of intoxication, and was therefore, to a great extent, irresponsible for the act he had committed. Witnesses declared that, on the afternoon in question, the prisoner had visited several public-houses, and had drunk from twelve to fourteen glasses of brandy. At the time he visited his father's house he was in a very drunken and excited state. The counsel for the prosecution, in reply, considered the defence set up as "an affront to public justice." The jury returned a verdict, finding the prisoner guilty upon the count charging his intent to be to do grievous bodily harm to the prosecutor. They, at the same time, strongly recommended him to mercy, on the ground that the act had been committed by the prisoner while under the excitement of liquor. Mr. Justice Coleridge, in passing sentence, remarked that the jury had founded their recommendation to mercy upon the ground that the prisoner had committed the act while under the influence of liquor; and his duty compelled him to say that the Court could not allow that fact, in any way, to operate as an excuse, and that they could not for a moment permit it to be thought that it was any palliation of an offence, that it was committed under the influence of drink. He could not help thinking that in the present case, the prisoner, having formed the desperate design which to some extent he had carried out, had endeavoured to qualify himself to commit it by the excitement of drink.—The prisoner was then sentenced to be transported for fifteen years.

CONFESSIONS OF A GIN DRINKER.

THE following appeared in the Morning Chronicle of December 11. It is the result of an examination of a journeyman tailor, by one of the gentlemen appointed by the proprietor of the Chronicle, to inquire into the condition of the labouring classes; and occurs in an examination of a man who was pointed out to him as one who could furnish much information as to the trade in question. This statement is most extraordinary:—

"I work at coats generally, and for one of the best houses. I am reckoned one of the most skilful hands in the trade. I might be always in work if it were not for my love of drink. Most of the foremen know me, and object to give me work on account of my unsteadiness. I am only casually employed. I might be a leading man if it were not for my love of drink. The intemperance for which the casual hands are distinguished arises chiefly from their being 'called on' at public-houses. The men of trade, and seeking for employment, are kept knocking about at the public-houses all the day through. The consequence of this is, that the day is passed in drinking, and habits of intemperance are produced which it is almost impossible to withstand. Those who have got money treat those who have none; and such are the inducements to drink, that it is almost impossible for the tailor who is not constantly employed to remain sober. In the slack season there must be from 500 to 1,000 people out of employ, who pass their days continually at the public-house. They can't spend much, because they hav'nt got it to spend; but every penny they can get goes in drink, and many of them pawn their coats and waistcoats in order to get liquor. I myself have duplicates enough to make a pack of cards for things that I have converted into gin!

"Ah! I like gin—you can see through it. Beer is like a fish-pond. What I hang on to is 'Old Tom.' A glass of that neat is my weakness: to mix it spoils it, to my fancy. I drink a tremendous lot. I can drink twenty glasses in the course of the day easy. I drank more than that yesterday, I am sure; I know that by 'the shakes' I have got to-day. I have them 'rattling bad' this morning. When I get another glass, or two, or three, I shall be all right. If I was to try to lift a glass to my mouth now, I should spill half of it before I got it there. One barman, who knows me, always puts it into a large tumbler for me when I go to him the first thing in the morning. I have tried to give it up, but I never shall be able. The scars on my face do not arise from small-pox, but solely from drink. When I take a great deal it flies to my nose, and breaks out; and about five years ago my face was one mass of sores, of which these 'pits' are the scars. When I can get it, I will drink as much as three pints of gin in the course of the day. Upon an average, I think I drink about half a pint of raw gin every day; and if I could get the money I should drink double that quantity. I am sure it costs me five shillings a week in gin. I used to be a very lucky chap at the 'Derby sweeps' that used to be held at the public-houses. I have won as much as £8, £6, £5, and £4 twice; and whenever I got a prize I never did a stitch of work until I had drunk all the money away, and then I was sure to get the sack from my employer. The £8 did not last me above two or three days. I was 'roaring drunk' all that time, and afterwards I was ill for a week. I made all my companions in the same state. The public-house got all I won. I generally spend half my wages in drink (unless my missus comes and catches me); and on several occasions I have squandered away in liquor all I had earned in the week. My missus knows my infirmity, and watches me of a Saturday night regularly. She was waiting outside the public-house where you picked me up; and there were three or four more wives of journeymen tailors watching outside of the tavern besides my old woman. The intemperate operative tailors seldom take half of their earnings home to their wives and families.

"I know the evil and misery of this love of drink; it is the curse of my life; but I cannot keep from it. I have taken 'the pledge' four or five times, and broken it just as often. I kept it six weeks once, and was quite a little king at that time. I had always money in my pocket; and my wife got me a watch out of my earnings as well. Dr. Wormwald told me, when my face was bad, I should lose my nose, if I continued drinking; and I said, I would have my drop of gin if I had no nose at all! Any person who could prevail upon me to take the pledge, and make me keep it, would be the saviour of me. My wife is a hardworking body, and is obliged to keep me half the year round. I am a civil and well-disposed person when I am sober; but when I get a drop of drink, I am a madman. I break open the doors, and smash the teapot and tea-things; and, indeed, break or disfigure everything I can lay my hands on."

The reporter adds:—

"The man has given me his solemn promise that, 'for the honour of his craft,' and 'for the sake of his wife,' he will keep from all intoxicating drinks for the future."

Such is the sad confession of this unhappy man! It needs no comment. We have underlined a few sentences, to fix the attention of our readers more fully upon them. It reads solemn lessons to those who drink gin, or any other intoxicating liquor; and lessons of activity and zeal to total abstainers. Thousands are addicted to the same fatal practice; thousands more are in a course of regular training?

"THE WORKING CLASSES AS THEY ARE AND AS THEY MAY BE."

A lecture on the above subject was delivered to a crowded audience in Tailors'-hall, Broad-street, Bristol, by EDMUND FRY, Esq., of the Peace Society, on Monday, Nov. 19. After commenting on the vast importance of the working classes, and their right to the enjoyment of a fair share of the comforts of life, he proceeded to observe that a most fearful amount of distress and misery prevailed among the labouring classes. He adverted, briefly, to the alleged causes of this distress, but maintained that much of it was caused by the habits of the working classes themselves, and that they possessed the means of most speedily bettering their condition. The causes of their depression were, chiefly, Ignorance, Vice, and Intemperance. The means of cure, therefore, must be Intelligence, Morality, and Temperance. It was indeed strange that the working classes had not long ago discovered that they had heads as well as hands—brains as well as muscles—and that God had endowed them with intelligence as well as physical strength. Ignorant men were little better than living machines; and if the working classes were content to remain in that condition, and voluntarily put themselves into competition with the steam engine, the human machines being the weaker, would of necessity go to the wall. They might depend upon it, their mental powers were not given them for nought. God intended that they should cultivate and use them for their own benefit, and that of the world at large. He therefore looked upon the growing intelligence of the working classes—the increase of schools—the rise of mechanics' institutes, ragged schools, &c., as one of the most hopeful signs of the future. One great disadvantage resulting from the non-use of the intellect was, that the working classes had allowed others to think and act for them instead of doing so for themselves. Thinking and acting had been too much done by proxy. Now, when he heard his working friends uttering complaints against government taxation, &c., he was disposed to say to them—"What else can you expect?—you never think or act for yourselves." There was a vast deal of truth in the saying that every country has as good a government as it deserved. If all used their powers as God intended them to do, England would soon have the most beautiful government possible. They might desire universal suffrage, but that and its accompanying blessings could only be attained by the right exercise of their moral and intellectual powers. If they did what was right towards themselves and each other, and so engender a healthy public sentiment in the country, they would have no need to threaten government with 10th of April demonstrations, or to bind themselves into societies to oppose and denounce the government, for such a powerful influence would emanate from the people as would be irresistible. Then the people would have the true charter, the endorsement of which was "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace and goodwill towards men." But although ignorance and vice had much to do in causing the present moral and political degradation of the labouring classes, intemperance had much more. The cost of intoxicating liquors was enormous. In Bristol alone it amounted to nearly £300,000 per annum. But it was not money alone that was wasted. What was more valuable to the working man than time? and yet what a vast amount was spent in the gratification of mere animal passions, which could and ought to be spent in useful labour in the improvement of the intellect. Now this was an evil which they could rid themselves of. They need not stop to petition Parliament, but could set about it at once, and that with incalculable advantage. Few could deny the benefit it would be to the drunkard, and the moderate man would at least save his money and be enabled to devote his time and energy to the improvement of his fellow-countrymen. He wished every man and woman to value his or her influence—all had influence. God never sent them into the world for sixty or seventy years, endowed with various faculties, without intending that they should use those faculties for their own advantage and that of their fellow-creatures. It was only when every one did justice to himself and recognised the true value of his opinions, practice and example, that there would be realised in society all these improvements—all those blessings—that true equality of sentiment—and that happiness which he believed God had in store for his people, when they walked according to His rules and sought to obey all His commandments. The speaker resumed his seat amidst much cheering.

A few appropriate remarks were made by the chairman, Mr. JOHN RUSSELL, both in introducing the lecturer, and at the close.

INFLAMMATION OF THE STOMACH.

LET us examine a case of inflammation of the mucous membrane of the stomach, from the habit of drinking alcoholic drinks. This inflammation does not come on at once; it does not occur at the commencement of the habit. At first the membrane and the whole system are only excited, and this excitement subsides during the night, and the injury is repaired by the curative principle. But by time and by degrees the general health suffers, the nervous energy is weakened, the secretions are suppressed, the blood is defiled, the organs become congested, and the curative principle is enfeebled. The drinking goes on, but the enfeebled curative principle is no longer able to repair the mischief which daily drinking daily inflicts. There is now, therefore, as it were, an accumulating mischief. The excitement and subsequent nervous exhaustion produced in the stomach on Monday is not repaired by Tuesday; and thus the Tuesday's mischief is added to the Monday's mischief; and this goes on until permanent chronic inflammation is set up.—The foregoing is extracted from a volume just published, entitled, "The Domestic Practice of Hydropathy," by Dr. Edward Johnson. It is a powerful argument against MODERATE DRINKING.

AMPLE FUNDS FOR BENEVOLENT AND RELIGIOUS PURPOSES.

A LETTER has recently been addressed to DR. COOKE, of Belfast, on the subject of the pecuniary difficulties which embarrass the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland. The author repudiates the idea of appealing to the Government for more Regium Donum, and recommends a system of self-support. Having sketched out a plan by which a very large increase might be made in the funds at the disposal of the Assembly, namely, by establishing the principle of a common fund, the writer proceeds to make another bold proposal, in the following terms:—

“By instituting an association based on the principle of ‘Total Abstinence from all Intoxicating Drinks, and the use of Tobacco.’ Such drinks and such a weed have done more harm to the members of the congregations of the Assembly, and have prevented more good being done, than any human mind could calculate, or pen describe. I know that much has been said and done by imprudent men to prejudice the ‘Reformation from all Intoxicating Drinks’ in the minds of those who cannot make, or who do not wish to make, the ordinary allowance for human imperfection, necessarily connected with the organising or the working out of almost any institution. But an organisation of this character, superintended by a responsible committee of Christian men, carried out in a Christian spirit, and for moral and religious objects, would separate the members of the Church from two of the principal sources of social, intellectual, and moral defilements, and prove a corresponding source of power for good that eternity alone would unfold; and the means thus economised by the members of the Church would be more than sufficient for all the expenses connected with a liberal support for her ministers, missionary operations, and educational and benevolent enterprises. In the year 1847—the year of famine—the following amount of money was expended in intoxicating drinks in Great Britain and Ireland:—

Gallons.		Per Gallon.
20,639,365	Whisky,	at 7s. 6d.	— £7,739,761
3,329,940	Rum,	at 14s. 0d.	— 2,330,958
1,537,762	Brandy,	at 36s. 0d.	— 2,767,971
28,830	Geneva,	at 30s. 0d.	— 43,245
6,310,536	Wine,	at 22s. 6d.	— 7,099,353
613,900,976	Beer,	} at 1s. 6d.	— 46,447,573
5,400,000	Cider,
651,147,409 in all.			£66,428,861

“This calculation is confined to the drinks that pass through the hands of the Government officers, and does not embrace the great quantity of intoxicating drinks that are smuggled; neither does it include the direct and indirect losses that result from their use. It may be observed, that a large quantity of the whisky taken at the above average of 7s. 6d. is sold in England at 15s. per gallon, which would increase the amount considerably.

“If the population of the United Kingdom be taken at 27,000,000, and the amount expended by that number for those drinks be £66,000,000, it gives an average of £2 8s. 10d. for each individual in the British Empire annually.

“If the number connected with the General Assembly be taken at 500,000, it shows an expenditure by them for these destructive drinks annually to the amount of £1,220,833 6s. 8d. But as the Scotch drink more whisky, and the English more ale, than the Irish, it might be well, so as to put the matter beyond the possibility of dispute, to cut down the average to £2 for each adherent of the Assembly, or £10 for each family, allowing an average of five to a family. That would still make the total annual expenditure £1,000,000.

“This amount expended annually by the adherents of the General Assembly would enable her to support—

2,000 Ministers in Ireland (an average of 500 for each Province), at a salary of £200 per year	£400,000
200 Missionaries to the Jews, at £300 per year	60,000
200 Do. to the Heathen, at £300 per year	60,000
400 Do. to the Colonies, at £300 per year	120,000
2,000 Schoolmasters for Ireland, at £50 per year	100,000
64 Professors for 4 Colleges, at £1,000 per year	64,000
Bursaries for Students of same	8,000
Expenses for Deputations, Committees, Secretaries, Treasurers, Assistant Clerks, Printing, &c.	6,000
“It would enable her to build, in 10 years, 4 Colleges—one for each Province—at £30,000 each	£ 120,000
1,500 Meeting-houses—500 for each of the other three Provinces—at £1,000 each	1,500,000
2,000 School-houses—500 for each Province—at £100 each	200,000
	£1,820,000
This amount divided by 10 would give an average for each year of,	182,000
	£1,000,000

On this proposal the editor of the British Banner, in a recent number, remarks thus:—

“What say our Irish Presbyterian readers to these things? Is not the matter very clearly put? Is there any error in the statement? If there be, let it be pointed out. Is there any flaw in the conclusion? If so, let the objector put his finger upon it. Granting, then, what it will be difficult to disprove, that it is, in the main, correct, and rather under than over-stated, what a picture does it present of the Irish Presbyterian Body! We say, the Irish Presbyterian Body, simply because, for the present, we confine it to them; but the case, as here put, applies, with various degrees of force, to every unendowed portion of the Church of Christ in these lands. Here, then, a plan is set before the Irish Presbyterians, whereby they may, in the short space of a single year, raise the magnificent sum of a million of money!

“We like to contemplate the subject of Total Abstinence, in the light of our author. The idea of a great community giving up the use of intoxicating drinks, simply for the sake of the gospel, is transcendently grand. Let the case be calmly considered—What is the thing to be done? Simply to abstain from intoxicating drinks, which can only be viewed in three lights, as a luxury, a beverage, or a medicine. As a medicine, they cannot be required by a large number; nor by them in large measures, which were to kill rather than to cure. As a beverage, a thing not necessary to the maintenance of health and strength, they cannot be contended for; the idea is alike repudiated by science, experience, and observation. There is no fact in human affairs more fully established; the mass of the people, actually in the enjoyment of health, and who use such drinks, are so, not through but in spite of them. This brings us, then, at once to the matter of luxury, a point on which few will feel disposed to contend, in the face of virtuous and reasonable men, and one that we shall not dwell upon.

“Is this all, then, that the Reformer has to encounter? If so, his hopes are bright. But it is otherwise: there stands in his way a threefold power, which it will be difficult to overcome—that power comprises custom, habit, and appetite—custom, which is tyrannical; habit, which is second nature; and appetite, which is insatiable. These three elements combined constitute a power which can be broken only by bringing to bear upon it the most potent resources of reason, religion, and humanity; but by these every man may be more than a conqueror. We are satisfied the more the matter is looked at, investigated, weighed, and reasoned, the more will the conviction grow, that since, in this way, so much might be done, something ought to be done.

"The path to immortal fame is now before the Rev. Dr. Cooke. If he will take the lead, as he is invited, in this movement, and work it up to the pitch here set forth, and thereby realise a million per annum for the purpose here stated, he will achieve a renown which will transcend all Greek, all Roman fame."

DENMARK AND BRITAIN CONTRASTED.

MR. ROBERT CHAMBERS is giving a series of interesting papers in Chambers's Edinburgh Journal, entitled, "Tracings of the North of Europe," an extract or two from which will not be out of place in the pages of a temperance publication.

After referring to the appearance of the Danes in Copenhagen, their habits, and so forth, Mr. Chambers remarks:—

"While, however, I remark an inferiority to England in so many respects, I am forced to confess in one important particular a comfortable superiority, and this is in the aspect of the humbler classes. Here, as in most other continental towns, there is scarcely any trace of that horde of abject miserables which is so prominent in every British city. The labouring people are generally clad decently, many of them, particularly the peasant women, gaily. As a matter of course—as, indeed, the grand cause of this peculiarity—there is no drunkenness seen amongst them. On the whole, the Danes, as seen in their metropolis, appear an innocent, amiable people—a little stolid, perhaps, but remarkably inoffensive and respectable."

Mr. Chambers describes a Sabbath evening in Copenhagen as follows; and while the statements made regarding the scenes of amusement there witnessed may surprise the religious portion of society in this country, yet, when the circumstances are explained, those scenes will contrast favourably with the scenes of drunkenness beheld on the same day in England and Scotland, which, alas! awaken no painful emotions in the minds of many, very many:—

"A Sunday evening which I spent in Copenhagen, on my return from the north, afforded me an additional insight into the habits of the Danes. Sunday, it must be premised, is held all over Scandinavia much less strictly than in England, and its religious character is considered as terminating at six in the evening. What I had seen in Norway made me not quite unprepared for what I found at Copenhagen; nevertheless it was somewhat startling. The evening being fine, the whole of the broad, shady walks between the west gate of the city and the palace of Fredericksberg, two miles off, were crowded with groups of people in their best clothes; not merely peasants and artisans, or even shopkeepers, but persons of superior condition, though perhaps not in such great proportion. The peasant women, with their gaudy gold-laced caps and ribbons, gave a striking character to the scene. There were no drunk or disorderly people—all perfectly quiet and well-behaved. Along the side of the road are numerous tea-gardens, some of them having little theatres, others merry-go-rounds and nine-pins, and so forth. These were all in full operation. It was astounding to see old women, identical in aspect with those who in Scotland sit on pulpit-stairs, and spend the Sunday evening over 'Boston's Fourfold State,' and 'Crook in the Lot,' here swimming along in the circular railway to the music of a band. I tell, however, but a simple fact, when I say that such was the case. Scores of little parties were enjoying themselves in the recesses along the walks. I observed that many of those were family parties, whose potatoes consisted only of tea.

"As the only variation to a laborious life for a whole week it must have been intensely enjoyed. In one garden connected with a third-rate tavern there was a dancing saloon, with a clarionet, two fiddles, and a bass, to which a few lads and lasses were waltzing; and this seemed no solitary case. There was evidence of enjoyment everywhere, but not the slightest symptom of a sense that there was anything wrong in it. All seemed to be done openly and in good faith. I could not help contrasting the scene with the Sunday evenings of my own country. There the middle classes spend the time at least quietly, if not religiously, at home, and having the power, use it to forbid all public or acknowledged means of amusement to their inferiors. It is well known, however, that the taverns frequented by the common people are very busy that evening.

"It has been stated that in Glasgow, on the evening of the Sunday on which the Communion was administered last winter, one thousand and eighty public-houses were found in full business. The difference, therefore, between Denmark and Britain is mainly this: that in the one country amusements of a comparatively innocent nature are partaken of without a sense of guilt, while in the other enjoyments of a degrading kind are enjoyed clandestinely, and with the feeling of a reprobation hanging over them which must add to their anti-moral tendency. We must pause, then, I conceive, before we express the feelings which are most apt to arise in our minds regarding the Scandinavian mode of spending the Sunday evening."

TRUTHS FOR THE YOUNG.

MY DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS.—I want you all to become Teetotalers. I want you all to become Christian Teetotalers; and in order to induce you to sign the pledge, I shall tell you a very shocking, but very true, story.

I was visiting some time ago in an alley which few respectable people would like to venture into; they would be afraid of being insulted or robbed; but the people there have known me so long that the worst amongst them look upon me as an old acquaintance, and would not allow me to be insulted. A drunken man caught hold of me roughly, and wanted me to treat him; but four costermonger women came round him, and abused him so that he was glad to retreat. The next time I found him sober he was very sorry for it. Be kind to the worst of people, as your Saviour was, my dear young friends, and the very worst will respect you. One reason why many professing Christians are not more respected than they are is, because they do not live up to what they profess. They care more about being imposed upon than about getting Christianity a good name. I am very sorry to say it, but some people who do not profess to be Christians are more humane and charitable than some who do. If you know any such, show them Matt. xix. 16-22, and respectfully ask them to explain the verses to you. You must mind and not only say you are Christians, but be so in spirit and in truth. Well, to my story, and a sad one it is!

In the alley I have mentioned, I once was sent for to visit a poor woman who was very ill. I did so, and read the Scriptures and prayed with her. The next time I visited her she was much worse; she could not lay still, and had a dreadfully bruised eye. Her husband was earning very good wages, but he was a great drunkard. She laid upon a few rags on the floor. It was cold weather, but there was little fire; the children were crying for bread, but there was none to give them. The next time I visited her, cold and heat, want and plenty, were one to her—she was dead! Whilst dying, her husband came home drunk and beat her dreadfully; I suppose I might say—killed her. The poor little children now have no mother to care for them or send them to school, and they are growing up like little savages.

Now, listen! if all were Teetotalers, such dreadful doings could not happen. Beer is one principal cause of drunkenness amongst such people. Some mix beer and gin, which they consider a quicker way of getting drunk; but many prefer to get drunk with beer alone, because they think it does not hurt their stomachs so much.

The next time your fathers or mothers offer you beer think about this poor woman and the little children (all covered with dirt—no relations to kiss them and love them on earth—no mother to teach them their prayers), and tell your fathers and mothers about it. I hope they will not then force you to drink. Pray to them not to do so. When I see spirits, wine, or beer near me I seem almost to shudder; I can't help thinking about HELL! Thousands of people die drunk. Shall I tell you about one? Another time perhaps I may, for I would not distress your little hearts too much.

THE MONTHLY MEETINGS IN EXETER HALL.

THOSE friends to the Temperance movement who have kindly sent in their names as Subscribers to the above meetings, are requested to forward the promised amount to Mr. John Cassell, the Treasurer, 80, Fenchurch-street. The sum required to complete the whole project is not yet provided for. Additional subscriptions will be thankfully received. The large audiences that have hitherto attended, and the extensive circulation given to the proceedings through the medium of the London daily and weekly Press, as well as a large portion of provincial papers, have rendered these meetings at once an economical and effective mode of diffusing information as to the principles and tendency of the Temperance movement. In addition to the hire of Exeter-hall, and the expense of advertising, posting-bills, &c., many hundred copies of the Reports, as furnished in the daily and other papers, have been forwarded to ministers, magistrates, Sunday-school superintendents and teachers, and others, whom it was thought by the Committee desirable to interest in the Temperance movement. The example thus set in London has exerted a beneficial influence, not only on the local metropolitan societies, but on many societies in various parts of the kingdom.

Particulars of the next meeting will be seen in an advertisement on the first page of this number.

MONTHLY TEETOTAL CONFERENCE.

The next meeting will be held at Mrs. Watt's Temperance Hotel, Catherine-street, Strand, on Wednesday evening, January 2. The attendance of secretaries of societies or members of committees is highly desirable, as the subjects usually discussed at this Conference are intimately connected with the prosperity of the Temperance cause. The members of country societies will always be welcome.

IMPORTANT PHYSIOLOGICAL ESSAY.

WE are informed that the premium of ONE HUNDRED GUINEAS, offered by Joseph Eaton, Esq., of Bristol, for the best Essay on the Physiological Properties of Alcoholic Drinks, has been awarded to W. B. CARPENTER, M.D., F.R.S., F.G.S., &c., and that it will speedily be published. Those who are in the secret speak of it as a first-rate performance, and one eminently calculated to confirm and edify Teetotalers, to convince the sceptical, and to promote the Temperance reformation.

TEMPERANCE ALMANACK FOR 1850.

THIS very cheap Almanack is already in great demand. It is spoken of in terms of unqualified praise by numerous reviewers.

HOW IS THE PLEDGE TO BE VIEWED? 1. As an assent to principle. 2. As an acknowledgement of obligation. 3. As a bond of union. 4. As a proof of sincerity. 5. As a promise of co-operation.

THE WAY TO PAY RENT.—A blacksmith, in the city of Philadelphia, was complaining to his iron merchant that such was the scarcity of money, he could not pay his rent. The merchant then asked him how much rum he used in his family in the course of the day? Upon his answering the question, the merchant made a calculation, and showed him that his sum amounted to more money in the year than his house-rent. The calculation so astonished the mechanic, that he determined from that day neither to buy nor to drink any more rum or spirits of any kind. In the course of the ensuing year, he paid his rent, and bought a new suit of clothes out of the savings of his temperance. He persisted in it through the course of his life, and competence and respectability were the consequence.

THE DRINKING SYSTEM AND SABBATH-SCHOOLS.

THE Standard of Freedom of Dec. 8, besides giving a tolerably full report of the recent meeting at Exeter-hall, has an able article, nearly four columns in length, upon the above subject. A portion is here subjoined:—

"We do not pronounce Sabbath-schools, or the mode of instruction adopted by their conductors, as perfect; but we cannot forget the boon which they have conferred upon society. Let those who look coldly on, or speak of their inefficiency, reflect upon the condition of society when the first Sabbath-school was opened. The people, neglected alike by the Church and the Government, were in a most degraded and abject state. They were not only left in ignorance, but actually considered as too vile and mischievous, or as having too little capacity to be instructed.

"Let us go down to the manufacturing population, and we shall find that thousands have had no instruction but what the Sabbath-school afforded. Many we could, if necessary, point to—men of intelligence and position both in the Church and the world, who ascribe all they possess of usefulness and character to the aspirations awakened in their young minds by the zealous, often ill-taught, but sincere, self-denying, and devoted Sabbath-school teacher. We glory in these institutions for the good they have done, and for the proof they have furnished of the practical efficiency of voluntary effort!

"We admit that the Sabbath-school is not so efficient as it might become. We have had repeatedly to express our sense of the evils which impair its usefulness and which blight the ripening fruit. Again and again have we felt it our duty to show that the Christian Church, which has exerted fond and parental care over the school, has also given countenance and encouraged practices which have pulled down much of what they have built up. They have tended and nurtured the flower, but they have also fed the worm which was eating at the core. We have one more admonition and exhortation to offer. It shall be given in plain argument and fact.

"First, as we believe the Christian world have no adequate conception of the amount of evil following in the train of our drinking system, we will present our facts in relation to Sabbath-schools. The question that would naturally occur to every well-wisher of these institutions is simply, what is the future fate of the youth educated in them? The importance of the question will at once be felt when we look at the numbers of pupils and teachers—usually estimated at one million of children, and above 200,000 teachers. These comprise the flower of our youth. This juvenile population are placed under the care and guidance of maturer age at a time when the mind is facile, and the disposition tractable. They have to become the parents of another generation. They have the opportunity of reading or hearing the Scriptures—the admonition of the teacher, the counsel of the pastor. From such a field of labour we should reasonably expect a rich harvest for the Church. The mind will be startled by looking at the results of inquiries made on this very head. We can only present examples of the evidence before us. The governor of the Edinburgh prison thus writes:—

"That of 170 juvenile prisoners who were examined on admission, it was ascertained that 121 had been connected with Sabbath-schools."

"In a letter addressed to Lord Ashley, by the committee of a London Temperance Society, the following instances are given:—

"A warm friend of Sunday-schools and the temperance cause stated some time ago, as a solemn fact, that, in a town in Lancashire, no less than four "unfortunate females" were seen together in the street, every one of whom had once been a TEACHER in a Sabbath-school. In another place they refer to the great number of scholars who are dragged from our Sabbath-schools. The first instance they quote is from the "Temperance Intelligencer," where, out of one hundred boys taken from the school register, ninety-one were known to be open drunkards.

"A similar investigation took place in Launceston, and the result proved, that, in a well-conducted Sabbath-school, one hundred names of boys were taken as they stood on the register, and, out of that hundred, twenty-six had left the neighbourhood and were unknown; of the remaining seventy-four, forty had been overcome by drunkenness.

"A Sunday-school teacher of York, Mr. T. B. Smithies, recently visited one of the prisons in York Castle, in which were fourteen convicts, principally young men under twenty-five years of age. On conversing with them, he found that thirteen of them had been Sunday-scholars, and ten out of the thirteen had acknowledged that "drink" had brought them there.

"A schoolmaster took the names of one hundred and thirty of his old scholars, then grown up and living in the village, and, upon inquiry, found ninety-one open drunkards.

"Of sixty scholars in a Sabbath-school, thirty were found to have been ruined through drink.

"Out of a list of eight Sabbath-school teachers, seven were found to have been ruined through drink.

"Out of fifteen young men professing piety, and teachers in the Sabbath-school, nine were ruined through drink."

The statistics furnished by Mr. Smithies, which will be found in our report of the meeting, then follow, and the writer proceeds:—

"We cannot add to the force of these naked figures. We turn to the correspondence which accompanied the statistics. Mr. Field, of Reading, remarks upon the defective character of school education—heads; 'I find that many reported to have been at school (either at Sunday or day schools) were there only for a few months, and very many left before they were ten years of age. I lately reported that of 686 persons committed within a certain time 394 had either never been at school at all, or had been for a shorter period than two years. I pray that God's blessing may attend your labours to improve our Sabbath-schools; at the same time, I trust that they are very great means of good at present. When I consider the numerous temptations to crime in our country, and the awful extent to which vice has been propagated within our prisons, I thank God for his forbearance in sparing us as a nation; but I cannot wonder at the wickedness of our people, even those who have been to some extent instructed in Sunday-schools.' Mr. David Price, of Brecon, says that 'The statements of prisoners, for the most part, are calculated to mislead rather than to enable us to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion as to their previous habits and manners.' The Chaplain of the County Gaol, Cambridge, says: 'No one can suppose that a sound moral structure can be raised by devoting three or four hours on the Sunday to that purpose, when during the whole of the remainder of the week influences are at work of a directly opposite tendency.' The Rev. John Clay, of Preston, says: 'I have long been aware that even the best Sunday teaching is of little avail when opposed by the bad example at home for the rest of the week.' The Chaplain of the County Gaol at Bury St. Edmund's says: 'I fear that the cause of crime will not be found so much in the deficiency of Sunday-school education as in the want of domestic training, or the seconding Sunday-school instruction by parental discipline and example.' The Chaplain of the House of Correction at Brixton says: 'Almost all the instruction which the prisoners have received has been received at a Sunday-school. . . . Notwithstanding the painful fact that so many should fall, yet the Sunday-schools are productive of the greatest good, as those who have been in them are much more easily and more frequently led to repentance.' These extracts represent the views of nearly all those who have written on the subject. They prove that children are more generally prevented from going to school by the indifference or vicious habits, than by the poverty of their parents. Those who are sent there—so feeble is the sense of duty as to the education of children—are withdrawn on any slight pretext; and, in the case where they continue at school for any lengthened period, the few hours once a week devoted to mental, moral, or religious culture, are insufficient to contend with the evil influences to which they are exposed under the parents' roof, or among their companions in the street. What conclusion does this lead to? Simply that we need other instrumentalities in addition to the machinery of the school. Such facts teach us that we not only need an enlargement of the quantity, but an improvement in the quality of education; and that we have not only to combat the ignorance of the child, but the carelessness, the selfishness, and the vice of the parents. The majority of parents spend more upon drink than would pay for the education of their children; and many others send their children at an early age to toil, while they spend more than their earnings in the gratification of this pernicious appetite. This will not be disputed even by those who contend that intemperance is the result of discomfort, ignorance, or neglect, rather than the cause. But, besides depriving the child of the chances of instruction, the drinking system has the direct effect of destroying the fruits of what education the poorer classes of children have been able to procure. Nor is it confined to the working classes. Those who will take the pains, as we have done, to ascertain the growth of habits among our skilled workmen, will need no illustration of the subject; those who look merely at the surface may profit by a few instances:—

"In the valuable Report of the Rochdale Total Abstinence Society, for the year 1847, this is made a prominent feature in the report. It will supply at once a commentary upon the startling fact stated above:—"A few months ago a member of committee visited one of the singing-saloons in Rochdale, and on a Saturday evening, about eleven o'clock, he observed sixteen boys and girls, seated at a table in front of the stage; several of the lads had long pipes, each with a glass or jug containing intoxicating liquor, and no less than fourteen of the number were members of Bible classes in our different Sunday-schools. There they sat, listening to the most obscene songs, witnessing scenes of the most immoral kind, and spending the interval in swallowing liquid fire." It is added:—"These sinks of iniquity are thronged with old Sunday-scholars, especially on Sabbath evenings, and not unfrequently until twelve o'clock." Still further it is said:—"The appalling results of the drinking system are not wholly confined to the children in our schools; many a promising teacher has fallen a victim."

"Look at the operation of this one species of enticement—our drinking-houses and singing-saloons. In every large town they have multiplied of late, and while they indicate some improvement—inasmuch as they show a decline of that sottish drinking which was the disgrace of the last generation,—they have surrounded drinking-houses with an attraction infinitely more mischievous than ever known before. One of the serious evils of the day is that of protracted hours of business. A youth is confined to a manufactory or shop for undue hours, with little to employ the mind or excite the fancy. He breathes a tainted atmosphere, and issues forth at an hour when the members of well-regulated families are gathering round the evening fire. He is exhausted in body and mind. He looks out for excitement. On passing along the streets he is invited by an announcement, 'A concert here;' and, while attracted by the glare of light, the sounds of music greet his ear, and in a few minutes he is in the midst of the bustle and gaiety of a dancing or singing saloon. From an occasional visitor he sinks into a regular attendant. Employers who have to complain of the dishonesty of their servants would find, on inquiry into all the circumstances, that habits of dissipation, begun by attendance at these houses, have led thousands of well and honestly-disposed boys to ruin. An employer, the other day, in a populous part of London, said to us: "I never had to complain of any irregularity until two or three of these saloons were established within a short time of each other in the neighbourhood. Since then my young men have kept late hours, and shown other symptoms which are painful and embarrassing to me." If these attractions are sufficient to seduce the youth of the well-educated and the better disposed, is it not certain that the effect will be infinitely worse upon those who have neither had the tender care of parents nor the kind counsel of the teacher—who have had few opportunities of any kind. In imitation of the larger houses, the beer-shops adopt every kind of attraction suited to their means and the tastes of their customers. We give the following from a great mass of evidence of a similar kind:—

"In Sheffield.—The Rev. Mr. Livesey, the minister of St. Philip's, having a population of 24,000, consisting almost exclusively of the labouring classes, gives in evidence—"Moral condition of children...in numerous instances most deplorable....On Sunday afternoons it is impossible to pass along the highways, &c., beyond the police boundaries, without encountering numerous groups of boys, from twelve years and upwards, gaming for copper coin....the boys are early initiated into habits of drinking. But the most revolting features of juvenile depravity is early contamination from the association of the sexes. The outskirts of the town are absolutely polluted by this abomination; nor is the veil of darkness or seclusion always sought by these degraded beings. Too often they are to be met in small parties, who appear to associate for the purpose of promiscuous intercourse, their ages being apparently about fourteen or fifteen." The Rev. Mr. Farish states, "There are beer-houses attended by youths exclusively, for the men will not have them in the same houses with themselves." Hugh Parker, Esq., a justice of the peace, remarks:—"A great proportion of the working classes are ignorant and profligate,....the morals of their children exceedingly depraved and corrupt,....given at a very early age to petty theft, swearing, and lying: during minority to drunkenness, debauchery, idleness, profanation of the Sabbath, dog and prize fighting." Mr. Rayner, the superintendent of police, says, lads from twelve to fourteen frequent constantly beer-houses, and have even at an early age their girls with them, who often invite them to commit petty theft,....vices of every description at an early age,....great number of vagrant children prowling about the streets....these corrupting other children,.... The habits of the adults confirm the children in their vices,....George Messon, a police officer, adds: There are beer-shops which are frequented by boys only,.... As early as thirteen years of age,.... The girls are loose in their conduct, and accompany the boys. Mr. Abraham remarks: "There is most vice and levity and mischief in the class between sixteen and nineteen. You see mere lads between seventeen and nineteen with dogs at their heels and other evidences of dissolute habits." Mr. James Hall and others of the working people say: "The morals of the children are tenfold worse than formerly,....There are beer-shops frequented by boys from nine to fifteen years old to play for money and liquor." Charlotte Kirkman, a poor woman of the operative class, aged sixty-eight, observes: "I think morals are getting much worse, which I attribute in a great measure to beer-shops,....There were no such girls in my time as there are now; when I was four or five and twenty my mother would have knocked me down if I had spoken improperly to her.... Many have children at fifteen." The evidence, says the Sub-Commissioner, with very few exceptions, attests a melancholy amount of immorality among the children of the working classes."

"In addition to this, we may quote the following passage from one of the letters on Labour and the Poor, now publishing in the Morning Chronicle:—

"Another evening I went to a favourite musical place in another part of the town, at the corner of the Oldham-road. Unhappily I had mistaken the harmonic night; but the landlord, to whom I explained my business, showed me the curious arrangements by means of which he manages to have the same performance in two rooms at once. There are two spacious apartments directly over each other. The floor of the upper, and the ceiling of the lower, are perforated with a great square aperture like a hatchway in a deck. This vast trap can be covered or revealed by two flaps, which, when they are lifted, are secured back to back in the centre. In the upper room, upon a little platform on the brink of the gulf, the vocal performers stand, so as to be seen by all the audience in their own room, and by about one-half of those in the lower room, in which again, just beneath the feet of the artists, is placed an extremely handsome barrel organ, the front consisting of plate-glass and exhibiting its musical snuff-box-like machinery, and which can be seen by all the guests in the lower room and a few of those in the higher room. Thus the musical attractions are made as impartial as possible. The organ cost £194. The landlord wound it up for my benefit, and it went off with good effect into the overture of "William Tell."

"On my way home that night, I looked into two additional places of popular amusement. One was a sleight-of-hand exhibition in a small room up a rickety flight of stairs. The charge was 2d., and the benches were occupied principally by young men and women, evidently mill hands. One boy, not above sixteen, sat between two girls, with an arm round each of their necks; while the Sultan, who were evidently jealous, exchanged scowling glances as they cracked the hazel nuts which all three were occupied in demolishing. The others of the company sat quietly enough. There were two elderly women, in faded shawls and limp bonnets, gravely discussing how the magical tricks were performed. Near them sat two young women, nursery maids apparently, with young children on their knees; and a sprinkling of grown-up men, with folded-up carpenters' rules protruding from their pockets, and bespeaking their occupation, formed a party of their own. There was music, in the shape of a flageolet and fife, blown by two men seated at the end of the audience benches, while a lout of a boy in shoes, with wooden soles an inch thick, danced a Lancashire clog hornpipe, keeping up a monotonous rattle with his wooden-shod feet. At first I looked upon the young gentleman as an amateur, his performance being conducted in the audience part of the room; but, from the unvarying clatter which he produced during any interval between the sleight-of-hand, I found he was one of the artistes of the establishment."

The subject is to be resumed in the Standard of Freedom, with a practical application of the facts adduced. We shall make further extracts.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

The third monthly temperance meeting was held on Monday, December 3, in Exeter-hall. The subject appointed for the evening's discussion was, "The claims of the temperance movement upon the teachers and friends of Sabbath-schools." A portion of the 172d hymn of the Temperance Society was sung; after which a letter of apology from the Rev. Dr. Campbell was read, regretting his absence from the meeting, expressing his high approbation of the objects and importance of the movement, and suggesting that the temperance principle should be incorporated with the education of teachers and others in Sabbath-schools.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cassell) then addressed the meeting. The object of temperance reformers, both under the moderation system and the total abstinence system, had been the removal of drunkenness. The total abstinence movement went a step higher—they sought to prevent the moderate from becoming immoderate, as well as to reclaim the drunkard. It was to the Sabbath-school teachers to whom they looked for the accomplishment of the former object. The fact was, that now one day in the week the children of the labourers imbibed religious instruction; but on the other six they were exposed to the disgusting scenes of drunkenness and vice. In workshops the younger apprentices were continually sent out for intoxicating drinks, and at the public-houses and gin palaces became inured to scenes of a most ugly character. The usages in workshops were such as to lead young men into drunken habits, by which the Sabbath evening, too, was polluted. He had personal knowledge of many instances of the complete degradation of Sabbath-school teachers, entirely traceable to drinking in public-houses on a Sunday evening. It was in the power of Sabbath-school teachers to do immense good by bringing the total abstinence principle well before the minds of those whom they taught. At present the habits of many of the working classes were such as to frustrate the efforts of Sabbath-school teachers. Upon them much must depend, by making the temperance principle a part and parcel of the education of the children committed to their care. Many of the teachers, who were teetotallers, were engaged in workshops, and he besought them to exorcise the same influence there which they had in the Sabbath-schools.

The Rev. Dr. BURNS, who was most cordially received, said: There were a few questions which he thought would assist them in showing the absolute importance of introducing the principle of temperance into the Sabbath-schools. From whence did the necessity for Sabbath-schools arise? He believed the Divine law meant that parents ought to train up their own offspring; therefore it was that in Holy Writ they found no mention or account of Sabbath-schools. But the fact was, there were thousands of the young who were in the track of vice, and they must be lost if it were not for the exertions and examples of others, because the parents had not taught or instructed their children in the fear of God. Then came the question, how was it in this country, enlightened as it was, that so many parents should neglect the education of their children, and throw it upon the Sunday-schools? The answer to this was, that the parents were unfit for their duty—many of them were mentally and morally prevented from bringing up their children religiously; and whence did this unfitness arise? He had no hesitation in saying that, so far as the want of pecuniary means was concerned, the parents of these children daily spent several times more in drink than would give their children a respectable and moral education. The great source of the evil was the drunken habits of the people. It might be said that parents generally could not afford the expense of instructing their children during the week, and yet if they examined they would find that the parents of the children at Sabbath-schools spent more money on drink than would suffice to give them sound moral and intellectual education (hear, hear). There was nothing so calculated to harden the heart, pollute the soul, and defile the conscience, as drink. And if Sabbath education must be continued, could it be said that it was a full and soundly-moral education if the teachers did not warn the children against the evils and snares, not only of drunkenness, but even of moderate drinking. They all knew that the evils of idleness, lying, swearing, and filthy communications, follow in the wake of drunkenness; and unless the Sabbath teachers warned their pupils against the cause as well as described the effects, they could not be said to be fully discharging their sacred duty. But in order that he might inculcate the principle of total abstinence, he must establish it by example as well as precept; otherwise he would not thoroughly fulfil his duty to the children under his care (hear, hear). If he drank a little his pupils would be justified in drinking a little. There was no reason why the pupil should be better than the teacher. Sabbath teachers, therefore, must become total abstinence men (hear, hear). He believed there were as many as 253,000 Sunday-school teachers; but he would take the number at 250,000. Supposing all these teachers to be what were termed moderate drinkers—he meant to say men who were so moderate as to drink only one pennyworth per day—this penny a day consumed by 250,000 Sunday-school teachers would amount in one year to £375,000. Suppose there were 750,000 children required to be instructed, this penny a day consumed by the Sunday-school teachers in drink would employ 6,000 teachers at £75 per annum, by which the 750,000 children would be educated every week.

The Rev. J. SHERMAN, of Surrey Chapel, began by declaring his high respect for Sunday-school teachers as a body in three great characteristics. First, they were a generous body—they were unpaid. In the next place, they were a devoted body, who were seldom to be found in the upper ranks. They were composed, generally, of those men and women who worked hard the six days, and devoted the seventh to the instruction of children. And another thing which entitled them to great respect was the fact that they were chiefly spiritual persons, who were devoted to Christ's interest, and were firmly attached to his cause on earth. He thought it was a matter of great importance that they should gain over to the total abstinence cause such a valuable body of individuals. Let it be recollected that the Sunday-school teachers necessarily had great influence on the minds of those whom they taught; and, in proof of this, it was only necessary to see the attention which the children paid to their teachers if the teachers would attend to them. Then, next to the Sunday-school teachers, the hope of the world must be with the young children especially. Upon them depended the hopes of the teetotallers (cheers). A great effort must be made to emancipate those children from the thralldom of strong drink. The question had been asked—what became of the senior scholars of these schools? In the schools belonging to his own church the number of scholars was 3,000, with 400 gratuitous teachers; but he was bound to say that few of those children became members of his church after leaving the schools. Where did they go? Many of them would be found, as soon as they arrived at the age of fifteen or sixteen, to become apprentices: and, by the pernicious system which prevailed among the working classes so situated, they grew up, many of them, to be drunkards and to be a disgrace to themselves and the neighbourhood. A teacher of a class which was called the vestry-class, had collected the statistics in respect to that class, consisting of 46. He was induced to examine what were their habits in regard to temperance during the preceding seven years, and the result was—drunkards, 13; occasional drunkards, 9; steady characters, 13; unknown, 3, &c. Other calculations were read by the rev. gentleman, showing the great amount of drunkards, of persons of decidedly intemperate habits, and the number of deaths from drinking intoxicating liquors. These young men were driven to the public-houses, where they found a comfortable fire and warmth which they could not find in the house afforded them by their drunken parents. Now, if the Sunday-school teachers were not convinced of the efficacy of the teetotal principle, let them take care how they spoke of it—let them pause a little and examine for themselves before they dared, in the presence of their classes, to ridicule men who adopted it or the system which was adopted. He thanked heaven this teetotal movement had taken a strong hold on public opinion, and people might as well attempt to lift Clifton rock and throw it into the Severn, as to attempt to stifle that movement (cheers). He conjured the Sunday-school teachers to join in this movement for total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks. If they did this could there be any doubt but that their example must have a most blessed effect on their pupils?

Mr. SMITHIES (late of York), after stating many important facts which had come under his own knowledge as to the close connexion between intemperance and crime, said that he had the week before addressed letters to the governors of 100 prisons in England, Scotland, and Wales, requesting to be informed how many prisoners they had at the present time under their charge, and how many of them had been Sunday-school pupils. To this might be added the observation of Judge Pattison to the jury, at the Norwich assizes, a few years since: "If it were not for this drinking, you and I would have nothing to do!" (cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN said he believed that when these statistics went forth to the world, they would produce a profound impression (hear, hear).

Mr. ASA MAHAN, President of Oberlin College, United States, said he did not know how many of those present were Sabbath-school teachers; but he presumed there was no one present who did not now feel that every Sabbath-school teacher ought to be a teetotaler (hear, hear). If a Sabbath-school teacher ought to be an example to children, all present ought to be examples to Sabbath-school teachers; and if the evening were one for resolutions, he would move the following:—"Resolved—That it is the duty of every man, woman, and child, in this meeting, never again to touch an intoxicating beverage" (loud cheers). No one could be neutral in this great cause, if he would. He who was not for it was against it. No one, he presumed, could contemplate the condition of this country—its poverty, its misery, and its crime—without feeling his responsibility in reference to it; and that the existing evils were owing, in a very great degree, to intemperance, was almost universally admitted (hear, hear). The only real question, then, was, what was to be done. What had been witnessed in this country during the past year? An expenditure of at least £52,000,000 on intoxicating liquor. There had been 600,000 drunkards; and of these, 60,000 would probably, by the close of the year, be in the drunkards' grave. Let them suppose the 600,000 men and women collected together; let them imagine the treasures expended on drink heaped before them, as well as the 90,000 licensed breweries and distilleries;—what impression would a view of all this make upon their minds? Would they not all exclaim that something ought to be done? (hear.) There were two courses before them: one, that of total abstinence—the other, that of temperate drinking. He maintained that total abstinence was the only effectual principle. Until that principle were adopted nothing effectual could be done. If the Government decreed temperate drinking, the drunkard could not obey the decree. The drunkard must become a teetotaler, or he would die a drunkard. What would be the influence of such a decree upon temperate drinkers? They would reply, that they acted already upon the principle of temperance. Thus no effect would be produced upon either of the classes concerned. But suppose the ministry and the church took the opposite course and became teetotalers; suppose Sabbath-school teachers and church members became teetotalers—they would then plant themselves on ground which would support the feet of the drunkard himself (hear, hear). The question had often been argued, whether the Bible sanctioned the use of intoxicating drinks. There was one passage which, to his mind, settled the question. He would admit, for the sake of argument, that, under some circumstances, wine might be a good thing. He did not believe it (cheers); but still he would suppose it. Inspired wisdom told them that it was good neither to eat meat, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby a brother was offended, or stumbled, or was made weak (hear, hear). If they stood in a relation to a fellow creature in which they could not drink without tempting that fellow creature to his ruin, it was their duty to abstain (hear, hear). Such was, he maintained, the relation in which the church stood to the world in general (cheers). They ought not to set an example to the 600,000, the following of which would ruin them. On this ground teetotalism was the true principle of action. Drunkenness would be diminished in proportion as the principle of teetotalism was carried out by the nation. If there were no temperate drinking, there would be no drunkards; and so long as it continued it would be impossible to arrest this tide of death. The ranks of drunkards, however they might be thinned, would soon be filled up; the evil would be interminable. Let them, therefore, resolve as Christian men and women, that thenceforth they would not touch or taste intoxicating beverages (cheers). He concluded by moving the resolution which he had stated to the meeting.

The Rev. I. DOXSEY seconded the resolution, and expressed his conviction that an influence would go forth from that meeting which would tell upon all teachers of Sabbath-schools and ragged-schools. Within five miles of the General Post-office there were 12,000 persons, male and female, engaged in Sunday-school teaching, having about a quarter of a million children under their instruction. Did all these persons pledge themselves to total abstinence, it could not be doubted that a vast impression would be made upon the drinking part of the community (cheers).

The CHAIRMAN briefly expressed his belief that if Sabbath-school teachers generally adopted the principle of total abstinence, an impression would thus be produced on the ministers of religion, many of whom, he regretted to say, were even hostile to the movement. As regarded the resolution proposed and seconded, though it had been determined not to have any resolution, he should have no objection to put that which had been submitted.

The resolution was then put and carried, with one dissentient, the party dissenting being a female.

The meeting then dispersed.

HARP-ALLEY, FARRINGTON-STREET.

On Monday evening, Nov. 19, the twelfth anniversary meeting of the Farringdon Temperance Society was celebrated in the London Mechanics' Institution, Southampton Buildings, Holborn. The chair was occupied by GEORGE CAWKSHANK, Esq. A report of the operations of the society, and an address founded upon it, was read by Mr. J. W. GREEN, and was received with very decided marks of approbation.

The CHAIRMAN, after pronouncing an eulogy on the report, as recommending a practice which would contribute greatly to the happiness of the community, remarked on the influence of intemperance to render the community unhappy. Evils of the most fearful kind were constantly occurring, crimes the most frightful were constantly committed, and that in a country called Christian. Murders and suicides were events of common occurrence; and it could not escape notice, how strong drink was employed as an excitement or auxiliary. Rush could not go out at night to watch for his victim till he had taken gin or brandy in his tea. The Mannings were constantly drinking themselves, and plying their victim with drink. An eminent surgeon (Mr. Morton) had recently committed suicide—he was evidently another victim to strong drink. He had got hold of the glorious idea of abstinence, but could not muster sufficient moral courage to adhere to the only practice which could have saved him. His life was a constant struggle against temptation, and a constant overstepping of the bounds he had prescribed to himself. The result was a lamentable suicide. Those were a few of the public cases that were made known; but if the private history of individuals could be made known, the public would start astonished at the disclosures. The Chairman referred to the subject of private executions, and to the letter of Mr. Charles Dickens on that subject. He pronounced a warm eulogium on Mr. Dickens; but as it was evident from the accounts given of the recent executions, and of executions which he (the Chairman) had witnessed, that drink was the cause of most of the crimes which brought men to the gallows, as well as the cause of gross indecencies at executions, he would say, Do away with the drink, and then you will have few or no executions, and, of course, no drunken mobs to witness them. Two persons who had been found guilty of murder, recently, were recommended to mercy by the jury, on the ground that the crime was committed under the influence of strong drink. Judge Colman gave the jury credit for humanity, but said that he could not recommend the prisoners to mercy on that ground. "Drunkness," the judge said, "was a crime in itself, and that which led to the commission of almost all the crimes of which society had to complain." The address of the Chairman was much cheered.

R. KEMP PHILP, Esq., moved the adoption of the report. He said that a man who could say he had abstained from strong drinks for ten years, and was still attached to the principle, was a speech in himself; and that was his case. He had ascertained the principle to be sound. It was not necessary to turn over a number of ancient pages to ascertain its truth; it was a matter of fact and of experience; and if men could be brought to think about it, they would very soon adopt it. But the temperance principle had not had fair play, either from the pulpit, the press, or the pencil. To the latter, however, there was one glorious exception. The chairman had treated the subject in his best style, and his delineation of the evils of intemperance would remain as a monument to his genius and benevolence when he was laid in the grave (much cheering). After further remarks on the soundness of the total abstinence principle, Mr. Philp referred to the case of Mr. Morton, observing that there seemed to be more of the medical profession addicted to the use of strong drinks than of any other profession, showing that it was not quite safe to rely upon doctors for the formation of an opinion. Doctors might do abundant good by bringing science to bear on the practice of using strong drinks—much more good than they could effect by all their medicines. Mr. Philp concluded an excellent address by presenting a sovereign to the funds of the society.

Mr. T. B. SMITHIES, in seconding the resolution, referred to the state of his own health, which at present was somewhat impaired. A medical adviser at York had recommended the use of wine. To this he objected, and on coming to London and consulting another doctor, he was told that his habits of abstinence would greatly facilitate his cure. Mr. Smithies proceeded to illustrate the connexion between the use of strong drink and crime, and especially murder, by relating some cases which had come under his own knowledge. He concluded an impressive address by expressing his belief that the time was come when the total abstinence advocates must direct their battering-ram against the pulpit and the press, and bring them to adopt and recommend the beneficial practice.

The CHAIRMAN confirmed what had been said about the injudicious advice of medical men by a reference to his own experience. He had refused to follow the advice to take wine, &c., and he stood before them that evening in better health, and with clearer powers of perception, and greater enjoyment of existence than he had ever before known. He believed that many doctors, though unintentionally, were doing much harm; and therefore such cases as had been referred to that evening ought to be extensively published.

Mr. SMYTH, from Canada, supported the resolution, and furnished some interesting instances of firm resistance of temptation on the part of some Red Indians, total abstainers.

The Rev. J. DONSEY moved a resolution expressive of the duty of all genuine philanthropists to promote the Temperance movement in every possible way. This he enforced with much eloquence by a variety of important considerations.

The Rev. W. McCREE seconded the resolution. He thought that the advocates of the temperance principle had not availed themselves of the strongest argument in its favour. They had dwelt too much upon it in reference to the mere temporal benefits it conferred. It was true that the practice was eminently calculated to better the condition of those who adopted it, but those advantages were as nothing compared with the spiritual good it was calculated to communicate, and to prepare for. The principle was valuable, as it gave the Christian philanthropist greater power over the drunkard. No moderate drinker of strong drink could exert such influence over a drunkard as the man who totally abstained. Besides, self-denial for the good of others, was a duty enjoined by the Saviour, and enforced by his example, and by that of his most devoted followers. If the advocates of temperance took the cause up on those grounds, they would remove a host of objections from the minds of Christian professors and ministers, and the cause would advance with far greater rapidity.

Mr. J. H. ESTERBROOKE moved, and Mr. J. W. GREEN seconded, a resolution of cordial thanks to the Chairman for his kindness in taking the chair that evening, and for the eminent services he had rendered the temperance cause, both by his able advocacy and by his inimitable pencil. This vote was carried with great cordiality, and was acknowledged by the Chairman in an address replete with humour, and with kind and courteous feeling.

READING, BERKS.

We have had an excellent meeting in our Town-hall, Nov. 21. It was not announced as a temperance meeting; the chief subject being the "Model Parish," and the speakers announced being the Rev. W. Wight, B. Rotch, Esq., and Major Hughes, a very large company was attracted, who were taken by surprise at finding that temperance was not the chief theme of discourse. B. Rotch, Esq., occupied the chair. Mr. Wight then explained that the object of the projectors of the "Model Parish" was to form a sort of colony, free from all the evil which resulted from the use of strong drinks. He went into the details of the proposed scheme, and stated that the improved health, the superiority of the Model Parish over the people of other parishes, in their physical, social, moral, and religious condition, would afford a practical proof to the country at large of the great advantages of abstinence over the drinking system. Major Hughes, late Deputy Judge-Advocate of the general army in Scinde, followed in an excellent speech on the evils he had himself witnessed to have resulted from the use of intoxicating drink, and the meeting was finally addressed by Mr. Rotch on the same topic. At the close, a collection was made in aid of the funds for carrying out the project.

WORKING MEN'S DEMONSTRATION, BRISTOL.

An interesting meeting, numerously attended by the working classes, was recently held at the Tailors'-hall, when several addresses were delivered on the excellency of teetotalism, by men of various trades and occupations.

SAMUEL CAPPER, Esq., being called to the chair, said, the object contemplated by holding that meeting was to furnish several working men with an opportunity of giving their testimony in favour of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors; and it afforded him peculiar pleasure to attend such a meeting, inasmuch as he had always taken an interest in the welfare and prosperity of the fundamental and practical classes of the community. It appeared to him of great importance that men who worked hard, at their different callings, should be able and willing to testify to the advantages which they had experienced in abstinence from those drinks which were so injurious to vast numbers of their fellow men. It was from such testimonies that others were induced to try the principle, and prove the benefits which resulted from its practice.

JOSEPH HIGNELL, steam-engine maker, said that though he had only been a teetotaler for sixteen months, he had derived much benefit from being such. He had been a great drinker all his life, and a drunkard for forty years. He had been twenty-three years a soldier, and had greatly indulged, especially in the West Indies, in the use of intoxicating liquors. During the period in which he had abstained, he found that he could work a great deal better without strong drink than he could with it. He was much better in every way than he used to be, and his only regret was that he had not signed the pledge many years ago.

JAMES WEBB, plasterer, had been a drunkard for twelve years, respecting the misery and wretchedness of which he could say much; he rejoiced now in being a teetotaler, and as such he could testify that he was better able to do his work without beer than with it. He felt he was a very different man since he had sustained, healthier in his body, calmer in his mind. He was convinced that teetotalism was, to many, the stepping-stone to morality and religion. He had experienced it to be such in his case.

THOMAS OLIVER, shoemaker, observed that teetotalism had benefited both his body and mind, and had enabled him to follow his employment better than when he was in the habit of drinking.

CHRISTOPHER WEBLEY, collier, said, that in his time he had drunk too much strong drink.—His labour underground was hard, but he could do easier without beer than he used to do with it. Had he always been a teetotaler he was convinced that he would, in every way, have been a far better man. He had given up drink, and had attended to the welfare of his soul, which he now saw was of more value than he used to think it was, and his determination was never to taste intoxicating drink again.

CHARLES SCOTT, fireman, was a teetotaler of four years' standing, and could testify to his ability to do his work, which was of an exhausting nature, better than when he was a drinker. In the works where he was employed there were twenty-one teetotalers. When he used strong drink he often had a great difficulty in walking home at the end of his day's labour, he was so much fatigued, but now he could go home cheerfully, wash himself, and go to a teetotal meeting, or attend some place of worship, with much pleasure.

HENRY CAVIL, plasterer, said that during the years he was a drunkard he never knew what happiness was, but it was different now. He could now go to a place of worship and listen to the word of God with delight. He could follow his calling better, and with more comfort to himself and satisfaction to his employers than when he was a drinker. His son, who had been a teetotaler eight years, though only twelve years old, used to say to him when he was sick after some debauch, "Father, why don't you sign the pledge and be a sober man?" Thus his little boy presented to him an example which, as a parent, it was his duty to have manifested to his child.

HENRY HARMER, labourer, after being a drunkard for nine years, thought it was time to turn about and follow a different course, and hence he became a teetotaler, and it was a good thing he had done so. He had been delivered from the delusion that strong drink was beneficial to his body, and was now in excellent health without it. It was his conviction that had he persisted in his former courses he would not have been there to tell of the advantages connected with a sober life. He advised every working man to give up the drink, and he would find to his joy that its use was a delusion, and that the money which he earned would be better spent in providing the necessaries of life than in the purchase of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. J. RUSSELL observed that the temperance reformation had, in its commencement and progress, met with opposition from various quarters, and amongst others, with not a little from the working classes of the community. It had been objected that abstinence from intoxicating drinks might do very well for some persons, but it would not suit men who worked hard. This notion had, however, been again and again refuted; and the refutation had been repeated that evening. Experience supplied us with abundant proof that all kinds of work could be done without strong drink. Men of sedentary occupations, others of more active employments, the sailor on the deep, the traveller in the torrid or frigid zones, the peer of the realm, the commoner, the divine, the magistrate, the old and young, the rich and poor, the hardy and feeble, men and women, numbering thousands, nay, millions, testified that strong drink was not essential to health, strength, comfort, happiness, or usefulness. From the statements which they had heard that evening, all reasonable persons must be convinced of the desirableness of promoting the extension of principles which conferred so many blessings upon their fellow-men, and which produced so much of comfort to their families, and increased their usefulness to the community.

Mr. S. NAISH, commercial traveller, confirmed several of the statements which had been made by the preceding speaker.

The CHAIRMAN concluded this interesting meeting with some appropriate observations, after which several signed the pledge.

HUDDERSFIELD.

Mr. T. A. Smith, of London, delivered two lectures in the Philosophical-hall, on the 10th and 11th ult., to a numerous and respectable company. In the first lecture, Mr. Smith began by stating that our knowledge of Nature was acquired by observation, experiment, and analogy. It was by these means only that we could acquire a knowledge of the properties of intoxicating liquors. By observation we might learn the colour, flavour, and odour of these liquors; that they produced peculiar effects on those who drank them; that they produced poverty, crime, disease, and death. But if we wished for further information, we must have recourse to experiment. By chemical analysis we may learn the composition of these drinks, and their operation on animal bodies. It was by a carefully-performed quantitative analysis alone that a correct estimate of the amount of nourishment contained in any article of diet could be ascertained. It was absurd for a medical man, or any one else, to talk of the nutritious properties of articles of the constituents of which they were ignorant. The lecturer then stated the various uses of food and drink, in supplying materials to form the body, compensation for waste, producing heat, and generating electricity. An abundant supply of materials for all these purposes could be obtained without intoxicating liquors, whilst these liquors could not be used without producing physical and moral evils. The lecturer proceeded to describe the structure and functions of the organs of digestion, referring occasionally to a number of large drawings, which were hung up behind the platform, as well as to a human stomach which he held in his hand. In this part of the subject he also exhibited drawings, illustrating the effects of different poisons on living animal substances; and, after tracing the effects of alcohol on the various processes connected with digestion, concluded by adverting to the many advantages resulting from teetotalism.—The second lecture was on the circulation of the blood. The principal points of the lecture were: the uses of the blood; the organs for its circulation; the forces which cause it to circulate; the effects of alcohol on the action of the heart exciting and depressing, and also retarding the decarbonizing action in the lungs, and thus producing disease. The lecturer also briefly adverted to the effects of alcohol on the brain and nervous system, and concluded by appealing to all classes to co-operate in the work of temperance.—The society in this town has engaged a missionary, and will begin the new year with increased energy.

MALTON.

Two lectures on the physiological properties of intoxicating liquors were delivered here on the 13th and 14th Dec., by Mr. T. A. Smith, of London. The lectures were illustrated with anatomical drawings of various organs of man and other animals. The subjects embraced in the lectures were, the nature of intoxicating liquors, and their effects on digestion, respiration, and nutrition. In this town we have many difficulties to encounter, but our friends are resolved to persevere.

GUERNSEY.

We have lately been favoured with a second visit from Mrs. Stamp. As on her former visit, the meetings, religious and temperance were well attended; hundreds have hung with delight upon the truths advanced by her. During her stay, two public tea-parties were held, at each of which about 300 persons partook of tea, &c., by which £18 clear profit to the society was realised. Guernsey is indebted to this lady for such of its teetotal prosperity, and we can conscientiously recommend her to societies who have not had the pleasure of hearing her.

WHAT IS TEMPERANCE IN THE USE OF DRINKS? The free use of such as promote health, and entire abstinence from all that intoxicate.

WHO SUPPORT INTEMPERANCE? Six classes, namely: 1. The consumers of strong drink. 2. The vendors. 3. The manufacturers. 4. They who furnish the materials. 5. They who legalise the traffic. 6. They who remain silent and inactive.

DRUNKENNESS, MADNESS, MODERATION, AND MR. WAKLEY, THE CORONER.

BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.

A REMARKABLE REPORT of an inquest held by Mr. WAKLEY, the Coroner for Middlesex, appeared in the Daily News, of January 7, 1850, stating that on the previous Saturday the jury sat in the Thatched House, Lower Road, Islington, to inquire relative to the death of Edward Wilkinson, aged 49; who was evidently brought to his end by drunkenness. His wife stated that he had been a drunkard for more than twenty years. Previous to his dissolution, he behaved in such a strange manner that his wife became alarmed, and desired to have him under control. Probably he was labouring under delirium tremens, but the surgeon would not certify, and therefore he was kept at home, where he soon died.

The following conversation occurred between the coroner and Mr. Pearse, the parish surgeon who attended Wilkinson:—

MR. WAKLEY (seeing that medical gentleman present): "Why did you not give a certificate of the unsoundness of the man's mind?"

MR. PEARSE: "I never noticed a deficiency of intellect, although I saw him almost daily during his illness."

MR. W.: "His wife has sworn that he was a drunkard, and I hold that all such characters are mad, and ought to be placed in confinement. No one possessed of a rational mind will get intoxicated."

MR. P.: "If I were called on to certify, in such cases, there would be a clearance of half the neighbourhood."

MR. W.: "The evil is great, and to be sorely lamented. However, I have no hesitation in saying, that such unfortunate individuals ought to be confined and treated as lunatics."

MR. P.: "I don't know what sort of building you would construct, or where you would find space enough to erect one."

MR. W.: "Punish them for a few days, and diet them on salt and water."

MR. P.: "You must bear in mind that if I were to certify unjustly in a case of insanity, I should make myself liable to a penalty of £100; which I am sure would be enforced were I to do as you wish."

MR. W.: "I contend that you would be justified."

Here we have several startling opinions and facts:—1. That drunkards are mad. 2. That they ought to be confined as lunatics. 3. That they should be dieted on salt and water. 4. That if this were done half the neighbourhood of Lower Islington would be confined. And 5. That you could not find space to erect a building large enough to hold the vast multitude that would have to be incarcerated.

1. "ARE DRUNKARDS MAD?" Such is the heading which the Daily News gives to the report of this remarkable inquest; and were all the follies, cruelties, and crimes committed by men and women under the influence of drink to be recorded, we should have an array of facts which would far surpass the deeds of common lunatics and madmen. To the question asked by the Daily News, and so confidently affirmed by Mr. Wakley, no one will demur. Every drunkard is mad. His reason is gone, his passions are on fire, and, in a vast number of cases, it is dangerous for such a man to be entrusted with his liberty. No one would think of reasoning with him. To attempt such a thing would lay one open to the charge of corresponding insanity. Here, then, is a fellow-immortal needlessly, recklessly, and willfully bereft of that divine lamp which our bountiful Creator placed in the soul to guide its footsteps. All the divine attributes of the mind are, for a while, destroyed, and the man is sunk infinitely below the beasts that perish. But this is not all. In many instances you have, instead of reason, all the rage of a fury. No one is safe in the presence of the inebriate. The wife of his bosom is levelled to the ground with a blow, and then cruelly beaten and kicked, so as perhaps to be disabled for her domestic duties, and sometimes crippled for life. His children flee at his approach, and are not only deprived of food and clothing, but most unmercifully handled. The furniture of his house is smashed to pieces;—in a word, nothing is safe in his presence. You cannot trust him with anything. Who would give him a purse, a razor, or a candle? He is just ready, with the madman of Solomon, to cast abroad firebrands, arrows, and death. Tigers are no where found maltreating tigresses; furies wage no war with sister furies, nor demons with demons; but here is a being, "created in the image of God," so far maddened by liquor as to surpass the wild monsters of the wood, the furies of heathen pandemoniums, and even the malignant spirits of the bottomless pit. If this is not madness, where shall we find any? What, then, must we say of the wickedness and cruelty of those who manufacture, or sell, or give away, or use, or recommend, a beverage which is thus capable of completely defacing the image of God from the soul, and transforming it into a compound of folly, fury, cruelty, sensuality, and madness, unparalleled and unequalled in the records of the universe! Hardly a moment's thought, then, is necessary to furnish an affirmative answer to the query, "Is drunkenness madness?"

2. MR. WAKLEY asserts THAT DRUNKARDS OUGHT TO BE CONFINED AS LUNATICS, and that a medical man would be justified in giving a certificate accordingly. We will presently say a word or two about the almost insuperable difficulty of this proceeding; here we shall merely notice its absurdity and folly. The simple fact is this:—We most gratuitously and wickedly manufacture and dispense a liquor which robs our fellow-creatures of their reason, and then we talk about confining them for being mad! Every person who makes or distributes intoxicating drinks is a "lunatic manufacturer!" This, we have said, is done most gratuitously, wickedly, and wilfully. That intoxicating drinks are superfluous, is now demonstrated by the fact that millions live without them, and do so with immense advantage to their health, their pocket, and their comfort. These Teetotalers have the same constitutions as other people, and in their number may be found all ages, occupations, professions, and conditions in life; and therefore it is now as clearly demonstrated as any question in physics, that these drinks are not necessary to any persons either in health or sickness, and therefore it is a gratuitous work to manufacture or use them. But it is also a most wicked employment to produce drink or distribute them. If it is wicked to injure our own health, intellects, and morals, and to poison the bodies and minds of others, then it is a wicked thing to make or dispense what will produce these mischievous effects. The more we look at this subject the more convinced do we feel, that there is not a more crying sin in the country than that which is involved in the production and use of these poisons.

The Mannings are hung without mercy. They committed murder for the love of money. Why are strong drinks made, but for the love of filthy lucre? And who destroy the most bodies and souls, the Mannings and Rushes, or the distillers and brewers? We tremble at the thought of the interview that in eternity must take place between Rush and his victims; but surely there is a more awful meeting coming, when your large brewing and distilling firms must face the thousands who have been slain by the poisons which, for the love of gain, had been generated in their vats, and hoarded in their cellars! The crime now also is most wilful. The alarm has been sounded, the temperance trumpet has been blown through the land, and those who will not take warning must bear their iniquity. It is no use to say, "It will be a loss to give up the traffic;" all persons who set their minds on the money of others, deem it a loss to be deprived of the object of their wishes. Rush felt it a loss not to have the estate of Mr. Jermy; Mrs. Manning was very uneasy at the thought of not securing the property of O'Connor; and brewers and distillers may think it desirable to have in the hands of their bankers the wealth which ought to be spent in procuring food, clothing, comfort, and education for the people; but then, without a large amount of self-sacrifice, there can be no humanity, patriotism, or religion. No one can follow CHRIST unless he is willing to deny himself. All great philanthropists have made great sacrifices. Howards are not produced without immense cost. Fowell Buxton owes none of his fame to his brewhouse. The fact that his drinks made thousands of slaves, detracts not a little from his reputation as the friend of Africa. Columns will never be erected to the heroes of the mash-tub or the still.

Seeing then it is both unnecessary and wicked to make a liquor that drives men to madness, why not give up producing, selling, and using the poison, instead of proposing to lock up in lunatic asylums those whom, for caprice or the love of gain, we first drive to madness? What an infatuation, to make our fellow-mortals maniacs, and then, as a remedy, incarcerate them in madhouses! We have never heard that Mr. Wakley is a Teetotaler, though the facts that have come before him should have induced him long ago to join our ranks. Every Coroner has had before him the most appalling examples of the deadly effects of intoxicating drinks, and therefore has had more warnings than most men; and instead of proposing so dire a cure as the lunatic asylum, ought to practise and preach TOTAL ABSTINENCE. Only let these beverages be abandoned by all, and then we shall no more hear of the madness, the cruelties, and suicides of drunkards.

3. MR. WAKLEY'S "DIET ON SALT AND WATER" would be but a poor remedy. We query whether it would not increase the thirst of his patients, and when liberated, the poor culprits, in most cases, would return to the bottle. However, the disagreeableness of the prescription may remind us of those nauseous draughts which drunkards and moderate drinkers are so often compelled to drink. The pleasure of the glass is not without alloy. Many a bitter phial has to be emptied, powders and pills of the most unpleasant taste have to be swallowed, to patch up the frame which stimulants are destroying. The dose of strong drink at night must be followed by bitters in the morning, or else there is no appetite for breakfast; and a nauseous dinner pill must be forced into the stomach to torment it into activity to do anything towards digesting the meal that is to follow. Every drinker of any standing, if he would speak the truth, must own that the pleasures of his favourite beverages are more than counterbalanced by the pains. And now, forsooth, "salt and water" are to be used! Why not give up the bane? And then the physic, the confinement, and the regimen proposed to counteract its ravages or cure its madness, might be dispensed with.

4. MR. PEARSE tells us that if drunkards were to be sent to lunatic asylums half the neighbourhood of Lower Islington would be confined. There may be some exaggeration in this; but still this medical gentleman is doubtless a man of some knowledge and experience; and, from his words, we may safely conclude that the number of inebriates in the locality is awfully great. According to his showing, you have hosts of persons whom strong drinks periodically afflict with the worst kind of madness. We have always heard that ISLINGTON is a highly-favoured district for Gospel truth. Churches, chapels, and evangelical ministers abound; yet crowds of the inhabitants are maddened with liquor! We have reason to believe that the worshippers of Bacchus are, after all, more numerous than the worshippers of CHRIST, and destroy many more souls than the ministers of religion save. And we need not wonder at this, seeing so many of the professing people so regularly, two or three times a day, pour out their libations to the God of drunkards! CHRIST and Bacchus are now sought to be reconciled; and though the Christian professors may not be actually inebriated, yet, in using the poisoned chalice, they commend a liquor which is death and everlasting destruction to thousands! ISLINGTON is a proof that the Gospel can be most effectually opposed by strong drinks! When will ministers of religion and others feel this truth, and ABSTAIN?

5. It was said by MR. PEARSE, that you could not erect a building large enough to hold these insane culprits. For ISLINGTON alone, it seems, you would want a larger edifice than any that at present exists in the country. And if for Islington so much space is required, what sort of an asylum would be necessary for the drunken maniacs of London, and, still further, for the country at large? What myriads of madmen reel home every night from the beer-shops, gin-palaces, and taverns of the land; and how many of these daily enter an eternity for which they are unprepared! Could one assemble in some vast plain all the drunkards of the country, and bring with them their miserable families; could we only witness the blasphemy, vulgarity, filthiness, rage, and madness of this wretched throng of men and women created "in the image of God,"—what a counterpart this living hell would be of the place of torments! and what man, after beholding this scene of crime and woe, could dare lift the glass again to his lips, without feeling in his conscience that this one act deprived him of all right to call himself a Christian?

True, MR. WAKLEY! drunkenness is madness, and moderation is the high road to this soul desolation; and our DOCTORS, CORONERS, MINISTERS OF RELIGION, and PROFESSORS OF CHRISTIANITY, do more than any other persons in the land to make this path to death and destruction PLEASANT and inviting.

CONSUMPTION.

BY H. MUDGE.

THIS name is given to a disease which is in reality a slow inflammation of the substance of the lungs, because there always accompanies it a remarkable wasting of the body. "Its amazing prevalence and almost uniform mortality entitle it to the fullest attention," says Dr. Gregory, of whose article on the malady, in his "Elements of Medicine," we shall avail ourselves in the present paper. The deaths throughout England by consumption are calculated at one in five, or about fifty-five thousand annually: they constitute one in four of all the deaths in London.

We shall select some of the observations recorded by physicians, and see whether they fairly lead to the conclusion that alcohol is a suitable drug in the treatment of this disease, and whether we can rationally expect its administration to prevent or to cure it.

1. Note its distinguishing appellation—Phthisis, Consumption, or Decline. Here of course there is a wasting of the solids of the body, and the question arises, Can alcoholic drinks repair this waste? An answer to this question may be found in the popular works on physiology, recently published, where it is asserted and proved that alcohol cannot minister to any of the solids of the body (if we except fat and possibly nervous matter), because it is a non-azotised substance, and so supplies no nitrogen, which is believed to be the basis of the animal tissues.

2. Consumption is a febrile disease; but spirituous stimulants excite feverishness, rather than allay it.

3. It occurs in the scrofulous habit of body, which is characterised by a delicate organisation of blood-vessels, and exhibits, therefore, a strong disposition to the spitting of blood. Alcohol, when drunk, soon finds its way into the blood; and, being there, it is of course applied all along the inner surface of the delicate blood-vessels: thus it injures their coats, and leads to such fissures in them as allow the blood to ooze through, and the red fluid is soon recognised in the matter coughed up from the chest.

4. The great and peculiar feature of consumption is its connexion with tubercle of the lungs. Tubercles are rounded, firm, white bodies, varying from the size of a pin's head to that of a garden pea, frequently found interspersed through the whole substance of the lungs. They soften, become cheesy, coalesce, and the lung breaks down, and is spit up, mixed with pus, till not enough is left to support life. What tubercles are, and where they come from, is much matter of speculation; but the chief causes are thought to be improper diet, impure air, and deficient out-door exercise. Now, alcoholic liquors contribute to these causes, both directly and indirectly. In themselves they help to make up an improper diet; they blunt the feelings which otherwise would prompt instinctively to the admission and inhalation of the purest atmosphere; and they destroy, by enervating the system, the disposition to get out, while they consume time, in luxury and dissipation in-doors, which is needful out of doors for health.

5. Hectic fever, with expectoration of pus, designates confirmed consumption. There is a daily paroxysm of hectic, beginning with chill and ending with profuse sweat. Now, as alcohol passes (in part, at least) out of the body undecomposed, it accompanies the perspiration in its passage through the skin, and increases its quantity. Nature thus striving to eject it, just as a purgative will pass off by the bowels, and carry liquid matter along with it, it cannot surely be right to add an alcoholic sweating to the already too profuse one of fever.

6. Internally there is irritation too; the lining of the stomach and intestines reddens, inflames, ulcerates, and sends on their contents by what is technically termed colliquative diarrhoea (two words which mean looseness of bowels melting away the body). Alcohol irritates and annoys the alimentary canal, and greatly adds to the "inward heat" of which the patient complains.

7. The pulse will commonly be found at the earliest period somewhat too frequent, while later they will keep at from 120 to 150 beats in a minute for weeks together; the natural standard being between 70 and 80. Alcohol is a stimulant, exciting the heart and arteries to a more rapid pulsation than would occur without it; in fact, these vital parts strive to eject the offensive matters which are in the blood from diseased lungs; and when fiery, spirituous particles are thrown into the already vitiated current, of course there is more work to be done to get it out.

8. The patient dies with the senses entire; but alcohol in the brain is apt to interfere with this desirable state, and to give rise to distressing hallucinations, gloomy forebodings, and trying fretfulness. In fact, a tendency is set up, and a perceptible, though it may be slight advance is made towards the "horrors" of the drunkard! I stop here this month, as I think the treatment of consumption will supply materials sufficient for another paper.

THE CONTRAST.

A TEMPERANCE MELODY, BY J. H., HEXHAM.

AIR—"Mary's Dream."

Young Day peep'd o'er the eastern hills,
And Night fled o'er the western sea,
While Riot stagger'd to his lair,
And Temperance op'd her healthy e'e:
A drunkard dozing in the ditch,
His BETTER REASON all at sea,
When, loud and clear, a voice he heard
Sing, "Filltub, brew no more for me."
His dizzy head he wildly rais'd,
And blink'd from out his bloodshot e'e;
When, lo! a blythe Teetotal chiel
Tripp'd lightly o'er the flow'ry lea;
His face was fair, his voice was clear,
And aye he sang sae merrily—
While echo answered, far and near—
"O Filltub, brew no more for me."
"Beast that I am!" the toper cried,
"How wretched I—how happy he!
Can I God's image thus degrade,
Nor fear a dread eternity?
Then, henceforth let me be a MAN,
And let these words my motto be,
Though landlords frown, and drunkards ban,
'O Filltub, brew no more for me.'"
'Tis said—'tis done—he signed the Pledge,
An alter'd man I trow is he;
No more he sleeps behind the hedge,
Nor wakes in felon's dormit'ry;
His step is firm—his eye is bright,
His head erect—his reason free,
And friends now hear him with delight,
Sing, "Filltub, brew no more for me."

WINE AT DINNERS.—A custom has long prevailed in this country of drinking wine while at dinner. This is downright pampering. It vitiates the taste, and destroys healthful appetite. The custom ought to be proscribed among all religious people immediately.—Wesleyan Methodist Magazine.—This recommendation seems to imply that wine may be innocently taken at other times. Teetotalism "proscribes" the use of wine, not only "while at dinner," but before and after dinner, both in the parlour and in the vestry.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

EXETER-HALL.

The fourth monthly meeting in advocacy of the temperance cause, was held on Monday evening, January 7. Mr. Joseph Sturge, of Birmingham, was voted into the chair on the motion of Mr. Charles Gilpin, seconded by Mr. George Cruikshank. The attendance was exceedingly numerous, owing, in part, to the fact that the speakers announced for the occasion were all teetotalers of the working classes, who could, from their own experience, advocate the principle which was to form the subject:—"Intoxicating liquors not necessary for working men, either to assist them in their occupations, however laborious, or to promote their health or happiness."

In opening the proceedings Mr. STURGE said: If I were as well qualified to address a public meeting as I am deficient, it would be very much out of place in me to occupy your time at a meeting convened for the express purpose of hearing working men's opinions as to the necessity of intoxicating liquors; and especially as I find there are no less than thirteen speakers of that invaluable class on the list to address you this evening. Had I been invited to take the chair at a meeting where the speakers were to have been of the aristocratic, or even of the middle class, I should not have hesitated in declining to come; but when I heard they were to be all of the labouring classes I did not hesitate to come upwards of 100 miles to be present. Indeed, I feel it to be a great privilege to preside at such a meeting as this, and although having been a teetotaler more than twenty-one years myself, and having declined to give intoxicating drinks to my guests for more than seven years, still I have not given teetotalism so full a test under hard labour as some of our friends who will address you; I have tried it by sea and by land, and in different climates. In the West Indies, where the use of intoxicating drinks is generally considered indispensable, I found I could sustain bodily and mental labour for twelve or fourteen hours a day on cold water; and am convinced that the proverbial unhealthiness of the climate is more to be attributed to the drinking habits of Europeans than anything else. It is, however, to the silent and all-powerful effects of example that we must look for the progress of this great cause. He then stated an instance of an acquaintance of his, who was a moderate drinker himself, but who had two or three of his sons who gave way to intemperate habits; and on their father's becoming a teetotaler, an abstainer from intoxicating drinks, the whole family had followed his example. He impressed upon the audience the importance of using every exertion to induce all the rising generation to adopt the practice, and said, it was to them that we must look for the support of the cause when we were "gone to that bourne from whence no traveller returns;" that at Birmingham, for the last three or four years, they had adopted the practice of assisting the juvenile teetotalers to go on an annual railway excursion together; that they had commenced with about 1,000, but this year there were more than 2,000, and that, though some were supposed to take the pledge for the sake of the excursion, on a careful investigation they were found not very ready to break it; indeed, experience had proved that the juvenile teetotalers had kept the pledge more faithfully than the adult. We justly condemned the Americans for holding near 3,000,000 of their fellow-countrymen in slavery; but on the question of abstinence from intoxicating drinks, they were now far in advance of us. Twenty years ago he believed even in the Northern States intoxication was more prevalent than it was here; but in 1841, when he was there, some of the largest hotels in cities he had visited, entirely excluded intoxicating drinks from their houses. This was not the place to make any political allusions, but he might state that one of the dearest wishes of his heart was to live to see the day in which all his fellow-countrymen, irrespective of the possession of property, would enjoy equal political rights, because he believed it would greatly promote their moral elevation; but there was a reform of far more importance than this within their reach—that of becoming a strictly temperate people, and he could hardly desire political equality without this, for if the windows of heaven were opened to pour out its blessings upon Britain until it became a Garden of Eden, an intemperate people would soon convert it into a desolate wilderness. He then observed that since he had entered these premises, a French friend of his, who was then on the platform, had told him, that at the present moment the use of intoxicating drinks in Paris was the greatest obstacle to the progress of true liberty there. He then read a letter from Mr. Mayhew, of the Morning Chronicle, which was received with great applause, and the substance of which will be found in the resolution subsequently proposed by Mr. Cassell.

Mr. PARKER, a coach-joiner, next addressed the meeting. Theirs, he said, was no mere political movement; they put forward no religious theory, no religious dogma. On such points they had agreed to differ, but in one thing they were unanimous. They all believed that intoxicating liquors formed their worst political enemy, their greatest religious antagonist. He had been twenty-six years in one employ—that was a guarantee for his sobriety. Why, then, it might be asked, was he a teetotaler? Because he wished to keep his mind clear for thinking, his body in health for working. He once loved water-drinking. He gave it up, but the year after—the year 1836—he returned to temperance. He attended a working man's temperance meeting in that year, and ever since had been in principle and practice a staunch teetotaler. Having always been a temperate man, he could not say that any material improvement had taken place in his circumstances, but he had a happy home. He owed no man anything. He had a library of useful books, which cost him about seventy pounds. He advised all drunkards to become teetotalers; and then, instead of wanting amusement away from home, they would convert their homes into an earthly paradise.

Mr. M'CORMACK, blacksmith's hammerman, a particularly strong, hearty-looking man, next addressed the meeting. He said he was the son of very humble parents in the West of Ireland, and he had had no opportunity of obtaining education, so they must excuse him if he made a blunder; but if he had been making blunders all his lifetime, he had made a good one when he signed the pledge (cheers and laughter). Some sixteen years ago he had the honour of knowing their chairman, as it happened that when he left his native home, Birmingham was the place where he put up. He was then a very temperate man; and, even two years ago, little did he think that he should ever be addressing a temperance meeting. When he took intoxicating drinks he was bad—he wasn't able to do his work; but he didn't get drunk now—he never had since he had signed the pledge, and he was now able to do his work as well as any blacksmith's hammerman in London, he didn't care who he was. Some friends who used to know him said, "What! is that M'Cormack, that used to get so drunk?" Yes, that's the very man—teetotalism had done for him beyond all imagination. The man that had not a place to lay his head, had now a good house of his own. He owed to teetotalism such a debt of gratitude as he could not find words to express. He used to think that he had nothing to do but to work, drink, and sleep; but now he had found that God had given him a mind, and that it was his duty to cultivate it (cheers). He could not write his own name when he joined the teetotalers, about eighteen months ago; but since then he had sat up night after night to improve himself; and now, what did they think the teetotalers had done for him? Why, they had made him a secretary to a teetotal association (cheers). He had been working hitherto for the publican and the publican's wife; but now he worked for himself, and for the beautiful system of teetotalism, and there was not a happier man in England that day than their humble servant, M'Cormack (loud cheers). After alluding to the laborious nature of his occupation, and the alternations of heat and cold to which he was subjected, M'Cormack wound up by expressing his conviction that work, and hard work, too, could be much better done without intoxicating drink than with it.

Mr. WEST, fellmonger, or skinner, next presented himself. He owed, he said, a deep debt of gratitude to teetotalism, not for reclaiming him from intemperate habits, but for preventing him from ever becoming the subject of intoxication (cheers). He signed the pledge eleven years ago, not because he was a drunkard, but because he feared he might become one, and because he saw the benefit of temperance. As a husband, he felt that he was bound to provide as good a home for his wife as that from which he had taken her. He viewed the question, too, in a pound, shilling, and pence light, and finding that his wages would not allow him to keep two houses—one for the publican and one for himself—he resolved to become a teetotaler (cheers). He wished to direct the attention of the meeting to the odious system of "fines" and "footings" which prevailed in workshops of almost every description where a number of men were collected together. Let them endeavour by all means in their power to abolish that horrible system, for he believed that it presented one of the greatest obstacles which they had to encounter (cheers). Before the people of England cried out for reform, let them reform their own bad habits. The government had never imposed such bad laws upon them as they had imposed upon themselves in the shape of fines and footings. He called upon the working men of England to abstain from intoxicating drinks. They would then learn to respect themselves, and just in proportion as they respected themselves would be respected by those above them (hear, hear). He remembered to have heard a bacchanalian song sung at Nottingham, and at the close of it the singer hiccupped out the following toast or sentiment, as it was called: "May poverty ever be a day's march behind us." He could not help thinking that if they wished to realise that sentiment they must ever keep teetotalism in advance (cheers). Another toast he remembered to have heard the same evening, which puzzled him a good deal at first: "May the three best friends of the working man fall never to rise again." He was naturally surprised at this toast, and he inquired what were the three best friends alluded to. He was told that they were bread, beef, and beer. As far as the bread and beef went he heartily responded to the toast, but the beer had, in his opinion, much better have been left out. He was glad that there was a financial reform movement going on throughout the country; but the first financial reform for the working classes must be teetotalism. They had only to sign the teetotal pledge, and they would have financial reform on the very first Saturday night afterwards, and they would pocket the benefit (cheers).

Mr. M'LACHLEN, glass-blower, then addressed the meeting. He stated that he was a native of Scotland, that he was the offspring of low and humble parents, and that he had had to struggle with the world ever since he was nine years of age, wherefore his education had been extremely limited. When he arrived in London at the age of about eighteen, he launched out into the drinking customs of society, and was taught to believe that unless he took a certain portion of strong drinks he never should become a man or a workman. He had now been a pledged teetotaler six years. The business he belonged to was a very hot one, and of course the throwing off of perspiration engendered thirst; but he worked harder and for more hours now than ever he had done. He did not wish to make a boast, but he would state the fact, that since he had been a teetotaler he had worked sixty hours at a stretch, without once laying his side upon a bed (cheers); and his wife, thank God, and his family, seven in number, were all teetotalers, and he did not know that there was a man in that assembly who had greater cause to be thankful than himself. His circumstances were materially improved under the water system, and he called upon his fellow-creatures, as they wished to be happy, to be free, to be philanthropic, to do good for themselves and their families, to set their seal to the principles of total abstinence (cheers).

Mr. PETERS, a tailor, had no doubt that, after the statements of those engaged in laborious pursuits that they needed not the aid of strong drinks, it would appear far less called for that a tailor should drink. He was often told by working men that it was all very well for him to abstain. He was not exposed to the changes of the weather. He underwent no exhaustion. His employments were sedentary and not fatiguing. But to this a drinking tailor might reply, I am compelled to drink. Here am I sitting in an unnatural position, breathing an impure atmosphere, taking no exercise; does not all this make me the man most in want of stimulants? And so was this vice defended on all hands, whilst those who talked of "bad ventilation," might be seen hurrying from their workshops to enjoy a purer air—in the tap-room! He owed his own adhesion to the cause of temperance to the circumstance that the wife of a friend of his had once, when her husband was inquired for, replied, "that she could not say, for he was out with a drunken tailor." He was determined no longer to deserve the epithet. He attended the meeting at Kennington-common, and was the first to receive the blessing of the Rev. Father Mathew. He enjoyed strong health. His home was more comfortable. His fortunes were improved. He owed all this to temperance.

Mr. Mc CURRIE said he had been a bricklayer forty years, and at one time was very intemperate, and in very sad plight indeed. He used to work hard, drink hard, lived hard, and if it had not been arrested by the principle of total abstinence and the grace of God, he should have died hard, and have gone to hell at last. He had now been a teetotaler twelve years, and fortune had smiled upon him. From being a journeyman bricklayer, he took to building houses—first one, then two, then four, then eight, and at last a whole street. In addition to that, he had now got a good house of his own; he owed no man anything; he had £500 to lay his hand on when he wanted it; and he had all the comforts which health and a good conscience could impart (cheers). Well might he exclaim at this season of the year, when he reflected how many poor masons were out of work, and who, though they had been earning 30s. a week during the whole summer perhaps, had not now a feather to fly with—

"When winter, with its frosts and snow,
Sheds darkness o'er the scene,
I feel how happy I am now
To what I once have been.
And when I hear the orphan's cry,
Or the craving of the poor,
I give as much as I can spare—
I cannot well give more.
Now surely this is better far,
Than drinking ale or wine;
And, if you wish for happiness,
I pray you come and sign."

(Great applause.)

Mr. JOHN CASSELL next addressed the meeting in an interval allowed for a collection. He had a resolution to propose, which he thought would be unanimously adopted:—"That the thanks of this meeting are due to the proprietors of the Morning Chronicle, for the investigations they have set on foot in reference to the influence of teetotalism to improve the physical, social, and moral condition of the working man, and pledges itself to promote the object recommended by Henry Mayhew, Esq., namely, to aim at the abolition of the system of subjection to publicans by which ballast-heavers and others are held in such miserable bondage, and by which the labourer is degraded and his family made wretched." He was sure that those teetotalers who had read the Morning Chronicle could not but feel gratified that this investigation had been set on foot, for it not only demonstrated the efficacy of teetotalism for elevating the labourer in the Metropolis, but the Correspondent in the manufacturing districts also bore testimony to the fact that teetotalism was there raising the artisan. He recommended his hearers to look at the Morning Chronicle of last Friday, and there learn the abject state of slavery to which ballast-heavers were subjected by the publicans, who allowed them long scores in the week, only to send them home with sadly-diminished wages at its close. There never was a publication more likely to awaken the sympathies of the upper classes for the lower than the letters of Mr. Mayhew, a man who evidently sympathised with the Temperance Movement because it had a tendency to elevate the working classes morally, socially, and politically. The ballast-heavers laboured hard for the wages which should support their families; but on Saturday night, when they went to the publicans to be paid, they would not have more than five shillings. What could be done for them? If they became teetotalers, they lost their employment. Then, he said, all at the meeting must back up the efforts of the proprietors of the Morning Chronicle, and unite with them, or any one who would assist them in the emancipation of the working classes from the bondage in which they were held. Their thanks, then, were due to the Proprietors, as they were to the Special Correspondent of the Morning Chronicle; and he would further propose, that the resolution before them should be advertised in the columns thereof.

W. JANSON, Esq., seconded the motion. He was glad to see a newspaper throwing off the character of Whig or Tory, and giving up partizanship, to devote itself to the promotion of social reforms and the good of mankind at large.

On the resolution being put, instead of the ordinary holding up of hands, three cheers for the Morning Chronicle expressed the unanimous approbation of the audience.

Mr. STEARNE, shoemaker, then addressed the meeting. He worked in a stall under a public-house window, and he had worked there for the last twenty-four years—for the last twelve as a staunch teetotaler. He had been one of the bitterest opponents of total abstinence; but since he had signed the teetotal pledge he had found it a most beautiful thing; and truly glad he was that he had given up for ever

LABOUR AND TEMPERANCE.

THE LONDON COAL-WHIPPERS.

AMONGST the men employed in this branch of labour drinking usages prevail to a terrible extent. By some of them it is declared to be an absolute necessity of this kind of work, that men engaged in backing coals from the hold of a ship, though only earning twenty shillings per week, should spend at least twelve shillings of that sum in intoxicating drinks, to stimulate them for the work. Nay, this is said to be a moderate amount to be thus expended, most of the labourers devoting fifteen shillings of their wages weekly to the purchase of beer and spirits. If this representation is a correct one, it follows as a melancholy fact, that the men engaged in this, the most severe and trying of all labour, and that which most speedily cripples and lays them aside, are able only to carry home to their families, or devote to their own actual support (if they have no families), and preparation against old age, which comes on them prematurely after an average of from twelve to twenty years' labour, the miserable pittance of from five to eight shillings weekly.

The necessity for drinking is described by those amongst them who say it is impossible to do without beer, to arise from the profuse perspiration which streams down their foreheads so rapidly, that it often gets into their eyes before they have time to wipe it off—and frequently runs into their shoes—and especially from the excessive thirst occasioned by the coal-dust entering their throat, and nearly suffocating them; this dust they say can be scraped off the tongue with the teeth, and such is its effect that it is impossible to get the least moisture into the mouth. Such is the excessive fatigue, too, induced by this labour, that many of the men are scarcely able to crawl up the ladder out of the hold after the day's work is over. The words employed by an advocate of the drinking customs were, "Our labour is peculiar. The air is always full of coal-dust, and every nerve and muscle of the body is strained, and every pore of the body open, so that we require some drink that will counteract the cold."

Now, seeing the terrible consumption of wages involved in this practice, and (looking at it only in one point of view) the sad and fearful influence this must have upon the material comforts of the poor man's home and family; it becomes a question of unspeakable importance to him and them, whether the view is a correct one, borne out by experience and facts, that stimulating drinks are necessary for the performance of severe labour. If in the case of the coal-whipper of London, evidence can be adduced to prove the contrary, evidence of the the most satisfactory and unquestionable character, there is no other class of labourers in the kingdom who will be able to plead necessity as an excuse for drinking, for there is no other class whose toil is more, or perhaps equally severe. These men have to carry up on their shoulders from the hold of a vessel, by an almost perpendicular ladder from thirty to forty steps high, continuous loads of two cwt. and more, throughout the hours of a long summer's day. What evidence, then, on this subject will be esteemed the most convincing? We presume the testimony of men engaged in the work, whose occupation it has been for many years—who have been accustomed to it under all its vicissitudes, and who are also extensively acquainted with the circumstances and experience of their fellow-workmen. Some such witnesses were examined by the commissioner of the Chronicle, and we have briefly given above the substance of their views—men who drank, and who declared that with the work they had to do they could not do without drink. But there were others—men who had experienced the self-denial of forsaking the public-house, who had steadily abstained for years, and who in their uninterrupted health and strength, and in their happy and cheerful homes, found reason to bless God that they had done so. We feel a pride in transferring to our pages some extracts from their testimony.

Our readers will recognise in it the simple language of humble but intelligent and honest-minded men. One said: "I can say this from my own experience, that it is not necessary for a working man, during the very hardest labour, to drink fermented liquors. I was an up and down man for two years without tasting a drop of beer or spirits. I have helped to whip 189 tons of coal in one day without any, and that in the heat of summer. What I had with me was a bottle of cocoa, and I took with that plenty of steak, potatoes, and bread. If the men were to take more meat and less beer, they would do much better. It is a delusion to think beer necessary. Often the men who say beer is necessary will deliver a ship, aye, and not half a dozen half-pints be drank on board. As far as I am concerned, since I have been a teetotaler, I have enjoyed a more regular state of health than I did before. I have got a ship "in hands" going to work on Monday morning. I shall have to run backwards and forwards on a one-and-twenty foot plank, and deliver 300 tons of coal, and shall do that upon water. "That man," pointing to a teetotaler with him, "will be in it, and he'll have to help to pull the coals twenty feet above the deck, and he'll do it all upon water. Water allays the thirst more than anything. If it didn't allay the thirst I should want to drink often; but if I take a drink of water from the cask I find my thirst immediately quenched. Many of the men who drink beer will take a draught of water afterwards, because the beer increases their thirst and heats them,—that, I believe, is principally from the salt-water in it. In fact, it stands to reason, that if beer is half brine, it cannot quench thirst."

The evil effects of the habits of drinking are seen not only in the quantity of beer taken by the men during the hours of labour, under the impression of its being necessary to support their strength, but in the pints drunk on shore after the day's work is over, merely to gratify the appetite for drinking or for the sake of convivial companionship. Thus the man whose words we have last been quoting, says—"The great quantity of drinking is carried on ashore. The men generally drink twice as much ashore as they do afloat. Those who drink beer are always thirsty. Through drinking over their work aboard a thirst is created, which they set to drinking when ashore to allay, and after a hard day's labour a very little overcomes a man. One or two pots of beer and the man is loath to stir." The houses of some of these men, whose testimony against the necessity of stimulating drinks was so clear and decisive, were visited, and presented pictures of cleanliness and humble comfort, which were a sufficient proof of the advantages of temperance. How different the following scenes to those presented in the dwelling of a labourer of the same class who spends twelve or fifteen shillings of his weekly wages in drink! "Choosing an hour when there could have been no preparation, I found the whole family assembled in the back-kitchen, that served them for a parlour. As I entered the room, the mother was busy at work, washing and dressing her children for the day. There stood six little things, so young that they seemed all to be about the same height, with their faces shining with the soap and water, and their cheeks burning red with the friction of the towel. They were all laughing and playing about the mother, who, with comb and brush in hand, found it no easy matter to get them to stand still whilst she made the parting."

Next, the sleeping-room was examined. "I was much struck with the scrupulous neatness of the apartment. The blind was as white as snow, half rolled up, and fastened with a pin. The floor was covered with patches of different coloured carpet, showing that they had been bought from time to time, and telling how difficult it had been to obtain the luxury. In one corner was a cupboard, with the door taken off, the better to show all the tumblers, teacups, and coloured glass mugs, that with two decanters, well-covered with painted flowers, were kept more for ornament than use." Shells and China shepherdesses and lambs, a stuffed canary in a glass case, water-coloured drawings of the husband and wife, pictures of bright-coloured ducks, and a print of Father Moore, the Teetotaler, were amongst the other ornaments that attended the power of temperance to make the working man healthy and happy, and his home cheerful and attractive, however severe the kind of labour in which he is employed. The facts and testimony we have quoted are indeed significant. No witnesses could be better qualified to speak, no evidence more clear and decisive.

Another man, who is described as having been an inveterate drunkard in his time, made a long and interesting statement, from which we make a few selections. After a most affecting description of his previous habits, and the misery and destitution to which it reduced himself and his family—his rags, his pawning everything he could get at, and withal, his being always thirsty, his mouth dry and parched, as if a burning fever was on him—he says: "Now my home is happy, all my children are teetotalers. My sons are as big as myself, and they are at work carrying 1½ to 2 cwt. up a Jacob's-ladder thirty-three steps high." Witness continues: "When I was drinking beer at my employment, I used seldom to exceed three pints of beer a day—that is what I took on board. What I had on shore of course was not to help me to do my labour. . . . The great quantity of drinking is carried on on shore. I should say the men drink, generally, twice as much on shore as they do afloat. Those who drink beer are always thirsty. Through drinking over their work aboard a thirst is created which they they set to drinking, when ashore, to allay, and, after a hard day's labour, a very little overcomes a man. . . . What I should do if I drunk I don't know. I got £1 for clearing a ship last week, and I shan't get any more till Monday night, and I have six children and a wife to keep out of that. For this last fortnight I have only made 10s. a week, so I am sure I couldn't spare 1s. a week for drink without robbing my family."

GENERAL LAFAYETTE.—EXTRACT FROM HIS LIFE, BY M. JULES CLOQUET, M.D., HIS PHYSICIAN.—"He dined at home as much as possible, and his frugal meal invariably consisted of a little fish, and the wing of a fowl; he drank nothing but water. I have not the least doubt that his sobriety and temperance, and the regularity of his regimen greatly contributed to exempt him from the infirmities of old age." In another place he says: "Lafayette had banished from his table silver covers, and rare and expensive dishes, and wines; his habits of temperance forbidding him to waste his time and destroy his health in protracted and sumptuous dinners." A.

BEER-SHOPS.—Houses have been legalised to traffic in a commodity which ever produces pauperism and crime to multitudes, and the neighbourhoods of such houses have been surrounded with an atmosphere strongly impregnated with a moral malaria. And how long is this polluted current to send its fetid waters into the midst of society, to the destruction of property, character, home, and every think else worthy of retention, and even of life itself? It cannot surely be said, that that which works private ill can be productive of public good. That can never be good for the whole that rots the parts of which that whole is composed. No! assuredly not.—Russon's Prize Essay.

THE ENEMY TO EVERYTHING GOOD.—Every intelligent and discerning person must admit the demoralizing influence which beer-houses exercise upon their keepers as well as upon such as frequent them; and our streets, our newspapers, our courts of justice, our workhouses, and our prisons, are ever ready to supply abundant and painful proof of the evils engendered by these dens (beer-houses) amongst vast numbers of our countrymen. No one will now attempt to deny that poverty, misery, disease, crime, and often premature death, are the sad fruits borne by this upas tree. To change the figures for a moment, it must be confessed that this enemy to everything good has not only overpowered the outposts, but has entered even into the citadel of society, and is vigorously using its dreadful power to destroy the entire fabric.—Russon's Prize Essay.

AN OFFER TO SOCIETIES THROUGHOUT GREAT BRITAIN.

A FRIEND to our cause, anxious to promote amongst members of the faculty the circulation of the excellent tract, entitled "Temperance and Teetotalism" (being an essay on the use of alcoholic drinks in health and disease, which appeared some time back in Dr. Forbes's "Medical Review"), makes the following offer:—

Any secretary of a society or other individual sending the names of members of the medical profession, in any district, may be supplied, gratis, with a copy for each of them on application to Robert Rae, 30, St. Enoch-square, Glasgow. The party so applying to arrange about forwarding the same, and to pay the carriage. In most parts of England they could probably best be forwarded through the London booksellers. In cases where only a small number may be wanted, it is suggested that the work had better be sent through the post, the cost of which will be two-pence each; in nearly all cases, it is believed, the essay would be better received when thus forwarded anonymously, and this mode of transmission is earnestly recommended. Two postage-stamps to be forwarded for each essay so ordered, to pay the expense of postage. It is also suggested that the several societies, forming an association, would have their parcels made up into one large parcel, and thus greatly reduce the expense of carriage.

HOUSELESS WANDERERS AND STRONG DRINK.

THE City Missionaries of the Field-lane and Cow-cross districts, Messrs. Tomkins and Vanderkiste, both staunch teetotalers, have lately been instrumental in the formation of a very excellent and philanthropic institution, an account of which appeared in the "Ragged-school Union Magazine" for December last.

It appears that large numbers of houseless lads were found by these missionaries congregated under arches in the line of new street leading from Holborn to Saffron-hill. Several inspections of these strange sleeping places and their wretched tenants were made at night, on one occasion accompanied by Lord Ashley. The result has been the formation of a refuge in Fox and Knot-court, Snow-hill, a house having been taken, and these poor wanderers employed in wood-chopping. Previous to these exertions being made, several lads were found in a state of insensibility under these arches, from the combined effects of hunger and foul air, from which by medical aid they were with difficulty recovered. We are informed by one of these missionaries, that from the particulars of the history of between thirty and forty lads which were taken down, strong drink appears to have had much to do, directly or indirectly, with their ruin.

The refuge alluded to, which is conducted by the committee of the Field-lane Ragged-school, supplies fire-wood in bundles, in any quantity, delivered at the residences of customers, at the ordinary charge; and our readers would be doing a very great act of charity to many houseless wanderers by favouring the institution with orders.

A SUITABLE TEXT.—A distiller in a neighbouring State went to hear a reformed drunkard, thinking to browbeat him by his presence. The reformed man, with much eloquence, compared alcohol to Juggernaut, and said he had a temple in that place (pointing to the distillery), whose floor was strewn with human bones, and if he had a chance he should like to preach a sermon there. On coming out, the distiller said, "So, old fellow, you would like to preach a sermon in my temple, would you? When will you come?" "As soon as you get a congregation together," said the reformed man. "And what will be your text?" was asked. "Out of the belly of hell cried I, and thou heardest my voice." The distiller was posed.—American Temperance Journal.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

that drink which caused his head and his heart to ache, and his mind to wander (cheers). He was now twelve years older in point of age than when he signed the pledge, but he did not hesitate to say that in elasticity of temper and feeling he was twelve years younger than then (cheers). Not only was he himself, but he rejoiced to say that his wife and family also were all teetotalers (cheers).

Mr. WOOD, stonemason, said he was twenty years of age when he signed the pledge. He was now thirty-three, and during those thirteen years, he had never been professionally attended by a doctor. He had been married more than half a score years, and he said that the best thing a husband and father could do was to set his children a perfectly sober example (cheers). He wished his father had been a teetotaler, and then he might have walked about with a coat on instead of being obliged to tuck up his sleeves to work. But he was not too weak to work. (He is an extremely muscular man, and this observation caused considerable merriment.) Neither was he too proud or too lazy to work; and if he were possessed of anything in the world, his horny hands had caused it, and he had to thank no man for the bread he ate (cheers). He was not an employer, nor did he suppose that everybody could be an employer, else where would be the journeyman? As Southey had expressed it—

"When Adam dug and Eve sown,
Where was then the gentleman?"

He was not the advocate of teetotalism because it enabled men to do more work. He was one of those who wished to shorten the hours of labour. He wished to see mind-developed—see man walk erect, displaying all the magnificent and transcendental powers of his soul. Some people thought that men who worked for their bread and cheese had no souls. But he felt that he had a soul. He loved liberty—he hated tyranny and despotism; and if every man would become a teetotaler, despotism and tyranny of every shape and form would reel to its very centre (great cheering).

Mr. ROBINSON, paper-stainer, delivered a very sensible and telling address. He had been a hard drinker for many years, and had brought himself and his family into circumstances of deep misery. He was often visited with strong remorse of conscience, and had fits of delirium tremens. During one fit of illness, while upon his bed, his children amused themselves by playing at "father and mother." The boy, who personated "father," began to imitate the reeling and staggering of a drunken man, upon which his sister, who personated "mother," said, "Oh! but fathers shouldn't be drunkards." That expression cut him to the heart, and he resolved to be a drunkard no longer. From that time happiness began to dawn upon him. He removed from a miserable dwelling, and had now a comfortably-furnished one. His wages had been increased. He had applied himself diligently to the cultivation of his mind, and had a number of useful books. He now felt that he was a man, and was endeavouring to act as became a man. It was utterly impossible for him, he said, to describe the feelings of gratitude and joy with which he contrasted his present happy condition with his former state of misery and degradation (much cheering).

Mr. MANN, a farrier, expressed himself with great energy and eloquence in favour of the teetotal system. The labour he had to perform was great. He was exposed to great heat, and had to do with powerful horses, who were not always very easily managed. But he was stronger and better in health than when he used strong drink. After walking to and from his place of labour, and working very hard, he frequently went some distance to speak at some public meeting, and when he got home late at night, he often spent a couple of hours in reading and writing, with a view to the improvement of his mind.

Mr. REYNOLDS, a native of Ireland, was announced as a "bricklayer's labourer," but he stated, in very racy style, that soon after becoming a teetotaler he had abandoned the hod, and had engaged in something more profitable. He had been a very hard drinker for many years, during which period he lived in a miserable hovel, and had only a little straw to sleep upon. During that period, also, he might often be seen leaning against a public-house wall with a short pipe in his mouth. Now he had a comfortable house, a good bed, a spring wagon with two horses, he had men under him, and was, in more senses of the word than one, a respectable man.

He accounted the day he was induced to take the pledge from Father Matthew, the happiest day of his life. That pledge had made a man of him (cheers).

Mr. GROVE, formerly a mariner, but now a coal-whipper, gave a pleasing account of the results of his adoption of teetotalism as to himself and family. The coal-whippers, he said, had charged him to state to that meeting how completely, under the present system, they were at the mercy of the publicans, who accounted him the best man who spent most of his wages in strong drink. By that drink they were not only made drunkards, but, such was its quality in general, they were seriously injured in their health, at the same time that their families were kept in a state of destitution. Those who had the courage to become teetotalers were exposed to great persecution, and it was their earnest prayer that, on their own account, and on account of their fellows who were in bondage, an effort might soon be made for their emancipation.

A vote of thanks to the chairman was then passed with acclamations, and the meeting separated.

Fair reports of the above meeting appeared in the Morning Chronicle, the Daily News, the Patriot, the Standard of Freedom, and several other papers.

WATERLOG-ROAD.

A very interesting meeting was held in Hawkstone-hall, Waterlog-road, on the evening of New-year's day. Tea, coffee, and other refreshments were laid out with considerable taste, and a crowded party partook of them with evident satisfaction. At the head table were the Revs. Dr. Burns, J. Sherman, J. Stevenson, A.M., and Messrs. Cabell, West, Green, Campbell, Dr. Lovell, Purvis, &c. While the tables were being cleared, Mr. T. A. Smith delivered a familiar lecture in the room below, to a crowded audience, on "The Chemistry of the Tea-table," with numerous illustrations and experiments. At seven o'clock the company were arrayed in the hall, and, in the unavoidable absence of John Cassell, Esq., who had been announced as the chairman, the Rev. Dr. Burns was called to that office. On taking it, he humorously remarked that he had to take the chair on the site of a castle (Cassell). A temperance hymn was then sung by a powerful band of vocal and instrumental performers, composed of one of Mr. Hullah's upper classes, and some gentlemen and ladies, members of the Sacred Harmonic Society. A musical entertainment then commenced, according to a published programme, in three parts, consisting of recitatives, airs, duets, and choruses, selected from Hayden, Jarman, Calcott, Horne, Rossini, Webbe, Reading, Grast, Lee, &c., concluding with the National Anthem. The whole were executed much to the satisfaction of the audience, at whose urgent request many of the pieces were encored. The performers received the very cordial and unanimous thanks of the audience at the close. Between the first and second part, an address was delivered by the Chairman. Remarking on the concert, he said, it was gratifying to him to listen to such a sweet demonstration of the power of the human voice. He had heard of the notes of a doting drinker's voice, and the still less pleasing notes of a raving drunkard's voice; the screams of an abused wife and the cries of his starving children; but not all the voices brought into exercise by drunkenness could ever produce harmony. He thought, however, that teetotalism would set all these voices right. Men would then speak rationally—the madman would become reasonable, kind, and benevolent; the screams of the wife would no more be heard; and the wails of children would cease. Thus an end would be put to much misery, and a source would be opened of real and pure pleasure. It was that evening demonstrated that teetotalers were able to get up an interesting meeting without any aid derived from strong drink, and he thought it would be well if similar meetings were got up more frequently. If they would put down a vile and dangerous excitement, let them try to produce an excitement that was pleasant and salutary. Dr. Burns concluded by reciting some lines which he had written in answer to the question, "Can it be right to use intoxicating drinks?" The second part of the concert was then given; and at its close Mr. T. A. Smith delivered an address on the influence of the drinking customs to injure society; on the influence of moderate drinking to perpetuate those customs; and on the influence of teetotalism to abolish those customs and to benefit the community. The third portion of the concert was then given; and the meeting broke up about ten o'clock, all parties appearing to be well pleased with the engagements of the evening.

WOOLWICH.

Believing that juvenile Total Abstinence societies are eminently calculated to accomplish results of momentous importance in the moral and social regeneration of our land, the committee of the Woolwich Temperance Society established a "Juvenile Band of Hope," on the 6th of December last, which has already enrolled upwards of 400 members, and given an impetus to the spread of Total Abstinence principles throughout this town and neighbourhood. In many instances parents have been influenced by their children's example, and have connected themselves with the adult Society. Great was the delight experienced by our Band of Hope at their first general meeting on New Year's-day, which event was celebrated by a tea-festival. Long before the appointed hour, groups of smiling children, clean and neatly clad, with the Band of Hope medal suspended from their necks, came to the Temperance-hall, where 250 members partook of tea. After tea, the public being admitted, several gentlemen delivered addresses, to which the children listened with attention. During the evening several melodies were sung. All children under sixteen years of age are eligible as members of this Band, the consent of their parents being first obtained. In the case of infants, the parents sign the pledge on their behalf, and promise to see it kept until of age to act for themselves. As many hundreds of the children of this garrison town are destined to become soldiers and sailors, and may visit, for good or evil, the four quarters of the globe, the importance of early indoctrinating their minds with the principles of morality and religion, and especially that of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, will at once be seen. A. STEVENSON, Secretary.

BLACKBURN.

On New Year's-day a festival was held in St. James's School-room, by the members and friends of the Temperance Society. A principal object of the meeting was to present Dr. R. B. GRINDROD with a testimonial of esteem for his laborious and successful exertions to promote the Temperance principle. The token of esteem was decided to be a splendid anatomical model of the human body. James Simpson, Esq., of Foxhill Bank, ascended the platform, in James-street Chapel, followed by Joseph Brotherton, Esq., M.P.; the Rev. Thomas Simpson, M.A., vicar of Parmal, near Arrogate; Alderman Beaumont, of Bradford; the Rev. J. H. Bayley, of Accrington; Mr. H. S. Clubb, of Accrington, &c. In the body of the meeting we also recognised friends of Temperance from Colne, Burnley, Clitheroe, Bolton, Manchester, Accrington, Preston, and other places in Lancashire. The model was placed on the left hand of the chairman. It is five feet nine inches in height, and stands on an iron pedestal, in an erect position. On one side the figure represents the muscles and vessels of the superficial layer, on the other the muscles and nerves of the inner layer and portions of the bones laid bare. The organs are also shown with great accuracy and distinctness, coloured as in their natural state. The calvarium or skull-cap is easily removed, and the brain displayed, which may be taken into a variety of pieces, exhibiting its more minute structure, as for example its cavities, bloodvessels, and the origin of the spinal marrow. The cavities of the chest and abdomen can also be exposed with great facility. In the chest you can perceive the heart in situ and the lungs—the one lung in its complete form and the other with the bloodvessels—displayed in their minute ramifications. In the abdominal cavity, the stomach, the liver, the gallbladder, the pancreas, the small and large intestines, and other organs, are exhibited with beautiful precision. Most of these organs and parts can be removed from their natural position and examined in their more minute details, as for example the heart. The model, which is a very remarkable specimen of artistic skill, was prepared under the direction of an eminent physician in Paris, Dr. Auzoux, member of "the Legion of Honour," and of various learned societies. It is composed of papier maché, and is consequently comparatively durable in its texture.

JAMES SIMPSON, Esq., having taken the chair, delivered an excellent introductory address, in the course of which he contrasted the sums spent in intoxicating drinks with those spent on philanthropic and Christian objects.

The Rev. F. SKINNER, of Mount-street Chapel, followed in an eloquent speech, at the conclusion of which he proceeded to present the testimonial to Dr. Grindrod, who had, he said, laboured hard for many years in advancing the Temperance Movement, and had been instrumental in bringing many thousands to sign the Temperance pledge.

Dr. GRINDROD acknowledged the gift in an appropriate speech.

JOSEPH BROTHERTON, Esq., M.P., bore testimony to the successful exertions of Dr. Grindrod, and proceeded to enlarge on the folly and wickedness of the people of this country in spending such large sums upon intoxicating drinks. He believed that the sum spent in Lancashire alone amounted to, at least, one pound sterling per head for the whole population.

Mr. ALDERMAN BEAUMONT, surgeon, of Bradford, expressed the pleasure he had in attending that meeting, because it was convened to do especial honour to one of the greatest benefactors of the human family. For while by continuing to devote himself to "private practice" he could only benefit a very limited number, by his noble and disinterested devotion of his life to the advocacy of the principles of Temperance, he was not only removing disease from the multitude, but he was prescribing health for the masses! His friend, Dr. Grindrod, had magnanimously sacrificed himself, and all professional and personal interests, to avert one of the most awful and desolating of human calamities—intemperance! But whence did the love of strong drink arise? Not from the tavern or the beer-shop; the appetite for intoxicating drinks was not acquired at the public-house. It was acquired AT HOME, where, through a dangerous error in the training of families, by the ordinary process of domestic and dietetic education, our children were initiated in the drinking of intoxicating liquors; and the appetite having been created at home, its gratification was sought at the tavern or the beer-shop! The origin of the entire evil was, therefore, to be found in the homage which is paid to intoxicating liquors by all ranks and classes of society. To turn the tide of public opinion by moral and physiological arguments has been the incessant and arduous occupation of his learned and estimable friend, and all honour be awarded! He then entered upon a consideration of the nature and properties of alcoholic liquors; showing by argument, and proving also by reference to facts and the highest practical illustrations, that they are unnecessary for persons in health; that in cases of disease they are of very rare and equivocal advantage; whilst, from the consideration of their actions upon the human system, they not only did produce an immense amount of disease, but that in the very nature of things it could not be otherwise. Mr. Beaumont expressed his deep regret that, as a class, medical men had neglected to give that serious attention to the subject of Temperance, as carried out by the "Total Abstinence" principle, which its importance demanded of them; and on this account, although he should have been proud to have congratulated the learned author of "Bacchus" (cheers) on again carrying away the prize on this momentous subject, yet he was rather glad that a man so eminent as Dr. Carpenter, who is known throughout the empire of medicine as the most eminent English physiologist, should have proved the successful competitor, as from this fact he argued the most favourable results, in diffusing sound information through all grades of the medical profession. He had not failed to bring this subject under the notice of his medical brethren in Bradford; and on one occasion, at a meeting of the Medical Society, he had startled some of his friends by the views which he felt it his duty to propound, not only on the ravages inflicted by the agency of alcoholic preparations, but also on the injury done to society by the ignorance and prejudice of the medical profession upon a subject which they were bound to investigate, whether as philosophers or as philanthropists; and especially denounced the conduct of those medical practitioners who so far tampered with the welfare and happiness of reformed drunkards as to prescribe to such the use of intoxicating liquors! No greater cruelty could any medical man be guilty of! Mr. Beaumont referred to a long and interesting discussion which followed his reading a paper on the "Actions of Alcohol" before the Royal Medical Society of Edinburgh, and also to conversations with the most eminent physicians of that city on the subject of Total Abstinence, and he had no doubt but the time was not very distant when this subject would be understood and supported by every practitioner of the healing art. The delivery of this speech occupied nearly an hour and a half.

The Revs. J. BAYLEY and E. JUKES, and others, moved and seconded resolutions of thanks, which were duly acknowledged, and the meeting broke up about eleven o'clock.

YORK.

The second anniversary of the Bond of Hope was held last month in the Lecture-hall, Goodramgate, when upwards of 700 children were assembled in the body of the hall; the boys on the right and the girls on the left hand. The gallery was occupied by the parents and friends.

Mr. T. MONKHOUSE, in an excellent address, commenced the meeting, and on resuming his seat, he called on

Mr. JOHN LEAK, the secretary, to read the report, which stated that monthly meetings of the children are regularly held, and addresses delivered. The number of members at present on the registry exceeds one thousand.

Appropriate addresses, interspersed with anecdotes, were delivered by Mr. T. B. SMITHIES, late of this city, Mr. CRATHORNE, and Mr. HOOD, which were listened to with marked attention. During the evening fruit was distributed to the children, and at intervals recitations were delivered by the juveniles, and Temperance melodies sung. After singing the National Anthem the meeting separated highly delighted with their evening's entertainment.

SHEFFIELD.

NEW-YEAR'S DAY SOIREE.—Sheffield has been visited by that talented advocate of Temperance, E. Grubb, Esq., late of Belfast College. He has been addressing delighted audiences, in a course of four lectures, in a manner peculiarly his own, and in a style unequalled by any living orator. On Tuesday a soiree was held at the Athenæum, at which nearly 1,000 persons partook of tea and other refreshments. During the evening powerful addresses were delivered. The chair was taken by J. Cassell, Esq., who spoke to the relation of temperance to the moral and social progress of the people. He was followed by Laurence Heyworth, Esq., M.P., J. Teare, and E. Grubb, Esq. The speeches produced a powerful impression, and the meeting did not break up until past eleven o'clock. Altogether it was one of the pleasanter and most telling meetings that have been held for some time in Sheffield, and no doubt that the result will be a fresh impetus to the cause.

CROMFORD, DERBYSHIRE.

The Cromford Temperance Society have had a course of lectures given by Mrs. Theobald, of Ochbrook, near Derby, and four hundred and forty have signed the pledge. A great deal of good has been done by this lady's exertions in that neighbourhood.

DUNSTABLE.

On Christmas-day the friends of the Temperance Society held a meeting and tea festival in the Temperance-hall. In consequence of the liberality of R. Gutteridge, Esq., many were gratuitously provided with tickets for the festival. The juvenile portion were in high glee, and their friends and parents clearly evinced that they could spend a merry Christmas without the use of intoxicating drinks. In the evening a public meeting was held, when the hall and platform were crowded in every part. The chair was taken by R. Gutteridge, Esq., who expressed his pleasure at seeing such a large and respectable assembly. He avowed his firm attachment to the temperance cause, and recommended all parties to give it a fair and candid trial.—Mr. Adams, of Luton, gave one of his peculiar speeches, which contributed to the mirth of the assembly.—Thomas Room, a hard-working man, gave his testimony in favour of temperance, and declared that he could work better in the hay and harvest time without any kind of intoxicating drinks.—After this testimony, the Chairman said that if such would not convince parties, he was at a loss to understand what would. He had now the pleasure, though he could not describe his feelings, of calling upon his grandson, Mr. R. Gutteridge, student of Stepney College, to address the meeting, who commenced by passing a high eulogy upon the principles of temperance. Though young, he was happy to say he was older than his grandfather, he having signed the pledge first. He dwelt upon the duties we owe to each other, and warned the tectotolers not to entangle themselves in useless argument. The evil was before them, and we are commanded to love our brethren; and that love should induce us to abstain from those drinks which are doing so much mischief and causing so much misery. We are all responsible for our actions; drinking was a dangerous practice. All those who drank were in danger; and, therefore, he would urge them at once to fly from the temptation.—Mr. J. Inwards then addressed the meeting for a considerable time, during which the attention was unremitting. Altogether the society is making progress, and many have been reclaimed. The disuse of strong drink would give an impetus to commercial enterprise, improve the morals and exalt the minds of the people; for before the people can be happy or truly independent they must be sober. Altogether this Christmas gathering was an exceedingly happy one in the neighbourhood.

LEICESTER.

After fourteen years of persevering effort, the cause of Temperance here has attained an attitude which distinguishes it as one of the most successful and useful of the philanthropic institutions of the borough. The number of enrolled abstainers is between three and four thousand; and it is believed that there are in the town an equal number unpledged who adopt the abstinence practice. Two meetings are held weekly in the Town-hall, which is generally crowded. For the more popular occasions and festivals there is not a hall in the town capable of accommodating the vast numbers that throng together; and this fact led to the consideration, at the commencement of last year, of a scheme for the erection of a Temperance-hall on a very large scale. An appeal has been submitted for subscriptions and shares, which has resulted in a gratuitous fund of £450, and shares to the amount of upwards of £4,500. A site, embracing 2,800 yards of ground, in the most public thoroughfare, has been purchased, and ere long a hall, capable of seating some 1,800 persons, is to be erected. The cash account of the past year shows an income and expenditure amounting to near £400 in the general operations of the society. On Monday, the 24th ult., George Greig, Esq., of Leeds, delivered a lecture on the ravages produced by strong drink, and the means by which those ravages may be repressed, and their effects removed. On Wednesday about 500 of the friends of the movement assembled for tea in the largest public hall of the town. Tea was served from a large and beautiful plated urn, the property of the society, which is capable of providing simultaneously for 1,000 persons. The urn is placed at the head of the party, and from it a tube of about seventy feet, with taps projecting from either side, extends to the bottom of the hall. The tea is made in the urn, and by a valve and index the party in charge of it can regulate the supply to almost any extent; and the great advantage of this tea-making machine, is, that the strength and heat of the liquid are uniformly secured to the whole party, besides which there is no loss of time nor perplexity in the supply of hot water to a hundred teapots; the cups are filled from the taps by ladies who have charge of them, and the rate of supply is quite equal to the demands of the most rapid consumers. After tea the hall was crowded almost to suffocation, and a running fire of speeches, songs, glees, and performances by an excellent brass band, was kept up for about four hours. A man of colour, of the tribe of Narragauset, the son of a chief of that tribe, was unanimously voted to the chair; and another coloured man of African pedigree, who effected his escape from New Orleans at the age of fourteen or fifteen, also addressed the meeting. The chairman, Mr. Benjamin Benson, proved himself to be a man of considerable mental power, and his statement elicited much applause. Mr. Thomas Irving White, the Temperance town missionary, made a speech, in which he warmly extolled the ennobling and elevating tendencies of the Temperance movement. He was followed by Mr. Greig, who showed the unity of the Temperance movement with other popular movements of the day, urging in an especial manner the claims of this cause upon the attention of those engaged in promoting Peace, Sanitary Reform, Financial Reform, and kindred agencies. On Thursday evening a meeting was convened in the Town-hall, for the especial purpose of affording to the two men of colour an opportunity of fully detailing the circumstances of their lives. Long before the hour appointed for commencement, every nook and corner of the hall and the Mayor's parlour, a sort of wing to the hall, in which the council meetings are held, was filled. Mr. Greig occupied the chair, and, with a suitable address, introduced to the meeting Mr. John Williams, who, in broken English, with great modesty and evident truthfulness, narrated the principal events of his life. He told of what he had seen and what he had experienced, of the bitterness of American slavery. The circumstances of his escape, by the aid of British sailors, were interesting, and tended to show, forcibly, how extremely difficult it is to fly from the vigilance of cruelty and oppression. Mr. Benson followed, and gave a variety of particulars of his tribe, the means employed to evangelise them, the destruction wrought amongst them by the 'fire-waters,' their renunciation of strong drink after its deplorable effects had been made apparent, his own career as a sailor in an English man-of-war, the prevalence and ruinous effects of drinking habits in the navy, and the deplorable state of English seaport towns. On Friday evening another meeting was convened in the Town-hall, for the purpose of affording to Mrs. Carlisle, of Dublin, an opportunity of addressing children and parents on the claims of Temperance. Saturday evening brought to a close this series of engagements, and the large public hall was again filled. Mr. Jabez Fryer was called to the chair. After giving information of the commencement and success of Washingtonianism amongst the reformed tipplers of Baltimore, Mr. Fryer called successively on several persons present to furnish their testimony in favour of the cause by which they have been so signally benefited. The various statements of the speakers were listened to with much interest.

HRYESBURY, WILTSHIRE.

The sixth annual tea-meeting of the Total Abstinence Society took place here at the Wesleyan Chapel, on Christmas evening, when Mr. Edward Muspratt, late of London, occupied the chair, and opened the proceedings by an excellent address; after which Messrs. B. Jennings, J. Shepherd, William Ellaway, Wm. Barns, and T. Wiltshire, addressed the meeting, and we are happy to say that at the close several names were entered in the pledge-book.

DEVONPORT.

We are informed that Mr. SIMON SMITHARD, late of Hull, has accepted an engagement with the Devonport Society as missionary for that town, in conjunction with Stonehouse, and that he has already entered upon his labours. We trust that he will be the means of effecting great good in that important district. He held a similar situation in Hull for four years, and a number of competent judges bear testimony to his high excellence as a temperance advocate and missionary, as well as to his general character and deportment. The sincere good wishes of those among whom he has lived for the last six years follow him to his present field of labour.

MORLEY.

On Wednesday, December 26, 1849, public services were held in the Rehoboth Chapel, Morley, in connexion with the recognition of the Rev. Jonah Reeve, late of Uppermill, Saddleworth, as pastor of the church.

The Rev. R. Martin, of Heckmondwike, introduced the morning service by reading a portion of Scripture and prayer.

The Rev. Thomas Scales, of Leeds, delivered a very luminous discourse upon the constitution of the Christian Church.

The Rev. H. Bean, of Heckmondwike, asked the usual questions, and offered the designation prayer. The Rev. G. H. Condor, of Leeds, delivered a very beautiful discourse upon "The distinguishing characteristics of the Christian ministry."

A very excellent dinner was provided by some friends of the church and congregation, to which all ministers and friends from a distance were invited, and about 150 partook of the hospitality. The newly-elected minister being a total abstainer from all intoxicating drinks, no beverages but water were to be found upon the well-furnished tables, the absence of which gave an additional interest to the deeply interesting engagements of the day.

It will be a happy time for the Church of God when everything like intoxicating drink is abandoned, and all occasion of offence from this source is taken out of the way.

In the evening, the Rev. R. Skinner, of Huddersfield, delivered a very appropriate discourse from 2 Thess. iii. 1.

TEMPERANCE IN SCOTLAND.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have just read, in the Daily News of yesterday, the report of your Fourth Monthly Meeting in Exeter-hall, and I cannot go to bed without expressing my delight at the success which has attended your wisely-conceived and admirably-executed Great Meeting Scheme. Such meetings give our cause its right place among the noble movements of the day, and shed the light of temperance across the entire empire. Even in this northern region its vivifying influence is felt. May you be sustained by all the right-hearted friends of the cause; and, as I heard it expressed at a missionary meeting to-night, "may faith be no longer held in bondage to finance;"

—that is, may the want of the means no longer deter us from the measures which the times demand, but, assured that the cause is of God, rest in the conviction that He, who has given forth from the bowels of the earth the implements of husbandry, will give forth from the hearts of his people the means of tilling the moral soil.

I am happy to say that the cause of Temperance advances most satisfactorily in Scotland. The Scottish Temperance League is doing its part admirably in supplying literature and lectures. The three greatest religious bodies in the country have taken the subject up. The Church of Scotland has just issued a Report, received at the last meeting of their assembly, on the subject of intemperance and its remedy. It contains returns from 478 parishes, and confirms the worst things that have been said as to the mischief drinking customs are doing everywhere. Not a few of the returns bear testimony to the efficacy of total abstinence, but others exhibited the most lamentable ignorance and prejudice with respect to true remedial measures. The report will, however, direct the attention of the Established Church to the subject, and that is no small end gained. The Free Church is also moving. A society has been formed with the view of promoting abstinence within its bounds; and already fifty ministers, with the Rev. Drs. Grey and Guthrie of this city, have headed the movement. They are issuing admirable publications on the subject. The United Presbyterian Church is, however, foremost. A society, consisting of ministers and elders, has lately circulated 25,000 of an able address on "The Harmony of Total Abstinence with the Spirit and Design of Christianity." In addition to the names of 238 elders, it has also appended to it the names of 130 ministers, which is a fourth of the entire number connected with the body. In this city we have a society, consisting of church members, the object of which is to bring the subject under the consideration of religious people. Last week we had a most effective meeting, a large audience being present, consisting of the class whose influence is most potent. By employing only the best advocates, we are doing not a little to secure for our principle a candid hearing. As to myself, I am doing all for the cause that the limited time I can command will allow. On Sabbath evening I preach (D. V.) in Dr. Wardlaw's chapel, Glasgow, on the subject. Perhaps you may have seen the prospectus of a new work. I am engaged with it. I have long felt the need of a thing of the kind, and it promises to take well. Our general society here is in a most healthy condition. They now employ three missionaries in visiting the drunkards in their houses, and their weekly meetings are crowded and enthusiastic. I suppose it is to you I am indebted for the London papers, giving reports of your Exeter-hall agitation. Many thanks for your kindness; and believe me, my dear Sir, most cordially yours,

WILLIAM REID.

7, Montpelier, Edinburgh, Wednesday, Jan. 9, 1850.
To John Cassell, Esq., London.

AMERICA.

MY DEAR SIR,—It has been with much interest and thankfulness to our Heavenly Father that I have watched and followed you in your recent movements; especially in your great meetings at Exeter-hall. I hope and trust you will rouse the British nation to a sense of the wrongs she is suffering from manufacturers and venders of alcoholic drinks; and I hope you will have a grand Cobden reform, extending to all classes—I cannot but feel that it is to be so. It seems to me that England cannot go on under her present burden, three-fourths of which come from the use of intoxicating drinks. Be of good heart, my friend. You are taking in your speeches noble and expansive views of things, and you have but to persevere and you will see the overthrow of the drinking usages and the curse of Britain.

In the good providence of God we are holding on to the good cause in America, and rather reviving; though our labours are not, as with you, appreciated fully and rightly by many of the influential classes. I receive regularly the Teetotal Times, and make copious extracts from it for my journal. I received also, by last steamer, the Standard of Freedom. It would much gratify me if I could receive it regularly.

When will you come to this country? or are you too deep in business to think of it? We should be very happy to see and hear you at our anniversary in May next, second week. Please let me hear from you. Yours in the good and great cause,

New York, Jan. 8, 1850.

JOHN MARSH.

To Mr. John Cassell, London.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE DWELLINGS OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

A VERY large meeting was held in Hull last month, convened by the Mayor, on a requisition, signed by upwards of 200 of the gentry, magistrates, bankers, clergy, professional men, merchants, tradesmen, and other inhabitants of the town, "deeply impressed with the injury to the health, morals, and social condition, which results to the labouring and indigent classes from the defective arrangements and overcrowding of their dwellings, and anxious to apply a remedy to the great and increasing evil."

The chair was occupied by the Mayor, who explained, at considerable length, the objects of the meeting, and enforced the claims of the working classes to the sympathy and exertions of their richer brethren.

The Rev. J. H. Bromby, M.A., remarked on the evils physical, social, and moral, which resulted to the labouring and poorer classes, from the defective arrangements of their dwellings.

Dr. H. Sandwith followed on the same topics.

The Rev. Newman Hall, B.A., while enlarging on the evil complained of, and urging the application of suitable remedies, said: There is another great cause—the chief cause of poverty, disease, and wretchedness among the working-classes, and little will be the advantage of model lodging-houses and improved dwellings if this is not checked. A drunkard can make a hell of a palace, and I think the very chief exertions should be put forth for the moral reformation of the people. But what is the fact? A larger number of low dram-shops are licensed in Hull in proportion to the population than in any other town in England save one. I highly approve of the object of this meeting; most heartily I hope it may be carried out; yet I also say, that unless we are consistent in our benevolence, and assail the chief foes to health and sobriety—unless fewer licences are granted to those centres of demoralisation, pauperism, and disease—unless the upper classes come forward more heartily to discourage intemperance—and unless other reforms are promoted in connection with this one, I much fear that model lodging-houses alone will be regarded as the puppet and the plaything of a benevolence more spurious and ostentatious than real.

The meeting was further addressed by Dr. Cooper; Mr. Jalland; Mr. J. Beeton; Mr. Tottie, of London; the Rev. C. Prest; Mr. H. Blondell; Mr. L. West; Mr. G. Thompson; the Rev. J. Scott, and other gentlemen. The meeting lasted nearly six hours.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

THE SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE LEAGUE REGISTER, and Abstainers' Almanack for 1850. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

THE Register and Almanack for 1849 we strongly recommended, as the best thing of the kind ever published; the one now before us is in every respect superior to the last. The Register relates chiefly to Scotland, and gives the professions, trades, and residences of the members of the Scottish Temperance League, 1,888 in number—including, however, members, by subscription, who reside in various parts of the kingdom. In addition to this Register, there are nearly fifty closely-printed pages of valuable statistical matter, historical notices, opinions, testimonies, &c.; twelve pages of the calendar, full of chronological notices, with valuable foot-notes, all bearing more or less on the Total Abstinence question. It is compiled with great care and industry, and is a valuable compendium, either for the use of Teetotalers and teetotal advocates, or for the information of those who know but little of our principles and operations.

THE TEMPERANCE CYCLOPÆDIA. By the Rev. W. REID, Edinburgh. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

WE have before us the first number of this Cyclopædia. The name of the compiler will be regarded by most Teetotalers as a guarantee for its utility and excellence; but, so far as we can judge from this first number, it may well be allowed to rest upon its own intrinsic merits. We believe it will be, when completed, all that it promises to be, namely, "an assistant in the public and private advocacy of Total Abstinence from intoxicating liquors." It will form a neat pocket volume, describing the nature and properties of strong drinks; the causes, history, and evils of intemperance; the remedies proposed for its cure; and a copious account of the principles and operations of Total Abstinence. We sincerely wish the rev. author health and strength to complete this important undertaking.

TRACTS, LETTER-PAPER, BROADSHEETS, &c., for Wesleyans. London: W. Symons, New Bridge-street, Vauxhall.

WE cordially recommend these for circulation among Wesleyan Methodists, though they are equally suitable for circulation among professing Christians of any denomination. The tracts are nearly forty in number; the topics discussed in them are all of high importance, and well calculated to convince Christian professors, and ministers, of the necessity that is laid upon them to promote the Total Abstinence movement. The letter and note-paper is very neat, and has a portrait of John Wesley, and some appropriate sentences for a heading. The broadsheets also have a portrait of John Wesley, and are very suitable either for posting, or for the walls of schools, factories, workshops, &c. We should be glad to see one of these posted in every vestry.

ABSTINENCE FROM THE ORDINARY USE OF INTOXICATING DRINKS A CHRISTIAN DUTY, in the present state of British Society. Edinburgh: Zeigler, South-bridge.

THIS tract is specially addressed to office-bearers and members of the Free Church of Scotland, by some of their brethren. But it contains such an admirable compendium of all matters connected with intemperance and Total Abstinence, that we cordially recommend its circulation throughout the religious community.

BRITISH FOLLY; or, the Patchwork Institutions of Great Britain. By a CLERGYMAN of the Church of England. London: Wertheim, Paternoster-row.

WE wish that a copy of this remarkable tract could be placed in the hand of every would-be patriot and philanthropist. It demonstrates the folly of those who aim to relieve the physical, political, or moral distresses of their countrymen, and yet at the same time oppose, or neglect to advocate, the principle of Total Abstinence from those drinks, the use of which is the chief cause of the evils they deplore.

BREWERS AND RAGGED SCHOOLS.

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

As we were walking through some of the streets of a large city, the other day, there was a handbill announcing that a meeting to support Ragged Schools was to be held in a certain school-room, and that a brewer, who was carrying on an immense business, was to take the chair. A friend who was with us was scandalized at the announcement. "Is it right or decent," said he, "that a brewer should preside over a Ragged School Society, or, indeed, any other moral or religious institution? These men," continued he, "with their eyes open, manufacture a liquor which produces nine-tenths of the poverty, crime, and disease in the land; and, therefore, it is almost like inviting Beelzebub to take the chair at a missionary meeting, or Tom Paine to be the president of a Bible Society."

I told my friend that I greatly differed from him as to the brewer and the Ragged School meeting, because the brewers have always been, not merely the patrons, but the producers, of raggedness. This they know full well. It is true their fathers may not so well have understood the matter, because there had then been no Mr. Buckingham to institute a "Parliamentary Committee on Drunkenness;" nor had there been any "Course of Britain," "Temperance Tracts," or "Prize Essays on Drinking and Total Abstinence" published; and the brewers were rather in the dark on the subject. We say "rather in the dark," because we cannot help thinking that if the great anti-slavery philanthropist, FOWELL BUXTON, had given one tithe of the attention to the white slavery produced by his vats that he did to black slavery in the colonies, he would have perceived that the former is the greater scourge of the two. Who would not rather be a Teetotaler in chains than a free Englishman under the tyranny of strong drink? And we have a strong impression that a Christian of the enlarged benevolence of the late Fowell Buxton, had he turned his mind to the evils occasioned by his brewery, would have abandoned the traffic, and preferred dying in the union, to being the cause of so much misery, crime, slavery, and ruin. Coaches-and-four, livery servants, large wealth, and lofty titles, weigh as nothing when we have in the opposite scale criminals, old and young, male and female, gaols, wretched homes, wives and children starved and houseless, husbands, fathers, and mothers, changed into demons, homes into living hells, and souls sent prematurely to the bottomless pit. 'Tis a poor apology for a man to say, "I obtained my carriage, my fortune, my title, by this desolation, and therefore I demand that while you weep for the woe of these victims, you will sympathize with my gains and ambition!"

But whether we excuse our fathers or not, there is no shadow of extenuation now. The evils are brought forth in the light of day, and "God commands all men everywhere to repent." However, we must not forget the Ragged School meeting and the brewer. Breweries, we have said, have always been productive of rags; and ragged people, in drinking countries, have generally been the patrons of brewers. We should like for another Hogarth to give us a modern "March to Finchley," to consist entirely of brewers and distillers in their coaches-and-four, as the leaders, and their poor, miserable, poverty-struck, bloated, emaciated, quarrelsome, swearing, low, vulgar, obscene, debauched, uneducated, demonised supporters, in the rear. What a ragged regiment there would be! Perhaps we might say, that on this side perdition it would be difficult to produce such a moving mass of wretchedness, crime, profanity, and desperation. The inflamed and haggard looks—the filthy and tattered garments—the coarse and polluted tongues—the vile and malignant tempers and passions—would present such a series of portraits and pictures, that, we believe, it would be impossible for any one but Lucifer to produce their counterpart. We should like to hear one of these gentlemen harangue these outcasts, thank them for their disinterested support, and dwell with becoming pathos on the depth of that affection which led the infatuated creatures to clothe themselves in rags and their destroyers in robes, to go bareheaded and barefoot, and, with their fool's pence, provide mansions, luxuries, and titles for the men who have opened gin-palaces and ale-houses to decoy them to death. To any man with a very small portion of commiseration, would not such an assembly be the most heart-rending that we can imagine? And perhaps, also, our pity should be the deepest for the man who, with a callous soul, could look on all this woe and wickedness, and say, as Demetrius of old did, "Ye know that by this craft we get our gain!"

The Ragged School chairmanship filled by the brewer may appear to some to have one redeeming quality. We love to see men acknowledge their obligations; and a very small sum, when paid, is sufficient to prove a debt. The brewers, we have said, owe a large portion of their wealth to their ragged regiment, and therefore seem quite in their place when presiding at "a Ragged School." On such occasions they pay back a peppercorn rent of what they owe. Nothing could be more easy than for one of these gentlemen to make a speech at such a time. He might say: "Ladies and gentlemen,—I never felt more happy* or more at home than now. The ragged people of this great city are my best supporters. The ultimate end of brewing and distilling, as far as multitudes of our customers are concerned, is disease, poverty, and rags. The history of drink is as marvellous as it is ancient. Under its influence, men, in the olden time, dared the Eternal to the face when he threatened the earth with a deluge; for 'they drank until the very day' that the patriarch entered into the ark. Noah even surpassed these dear ragged people of your city; for he, under the influence of intoxicating liquor, refused to be clothed at all. You all remember the words—'He was uncovered in his tent.' Our friend Lot went still farther. But I will not tire your patience with details with which you are all so perfectly familiar. In modern days, history is full of the narratives of persons who have been brought to rags by our liquors. Many a lady well educated, and born to a fortune, is now in rags through these beverages. Thousands of promising youths, members of Sabbath-schools, some united to churches, and there have been even those who have preached the Gospel, who by the potency of our wares have been brought to poverty, disgrace, and rags. I had almost said that ours is a ragged history indeed; and therefore you may suppose that these Ragged Schools are especially dear to my heart, and, as I said at the beginning, that I feel especially at home here. Drinking has always led to rags. Rags, therefore, have contributed, if not directly, yet indirectly, to my present honourable position among my fellow-citizens. My wealth has placed me in this chair to-day; for you all know that in this era of respectability, even an archangel would not be invited to fill the post I fill, unless backed by wealth or the wealthy. And, therefore, you may suppose that I feel no common degree of interest in these ragged children;—they are the offspring of my best friends. Thousands of their fathers and mothers have stripped themselves of everything and every hope here and hereafter, and thus have enriched me; and, therefore, long as memory holds her seat in this not distracted, but grateful, brain, you will find me the patron of Ragged Schools. Indeed, after having spent so many thousands on our drinking palaces, to make the outside fascinating by plate glass, classic architecture, and other tasteful expedients; and, with the venerable drinking people of antiquity, having added the harp, the viol, and all kinds of sweet music, to induce people to spend their money, and bring themselves and their families to rags, you may justly suppose that we cannot withhold our patronage and humble mite from Ragged Schools. It is allowed that we do more than any other class of tradesmen to obtain the wealth of the land. The butcher, the baker, the grocer, the draper, &c. &c., employ no fiddlers, pipers, harpers, box-organs, and hurdy-gurdies, to sell their goods. These charms to enchant their customers are chiefly confined to brewers, distillers, and the men that traffic in their drinks; and, how well they have succeeded, is now demonstrated by the thousands that attend Ragged Schools. I am, ladies and gentlemen, most happy to meet you to-day, and very cordially thank you for uniting with us brewers in patronising Ragged School Institutions!"

We cannot enlarge on this topic, or else we could show that all who sell, all who buy, all who distribute, and all who recommend intoxicating drinks—whether professing Christians, ministers of religion, doctors in divinity, doctors of physic, or common sinners—are all the patrons of RAGGED SCHOOLS; and until Total Abstinence shall prevail, they will be needed in great abundance.

* * It is stated in the British Banner of February 20, that Mr. Beaufoy, the great distiller of South Lambeth, has erected, at his sole expense, at a cost of upwards of £3,000, a magnificent school, covering an area of 1,230 square yards, affording ample room for the instruction of one thousand ragged children.

SUICIDE.—Drunkenness is nearly allied to suicide. It is an equally certain means of shortening life. What is appropriately called suicide, is a sudden and immediate termination of life; drunkenness brings it gradually to an end. The destruction in both cases is equally certain, and not materially different in the degree of turpitude. — Dr. Dwight.

TESTIMONY OF A MISSIONARY.—We glean, also, from the example of Mr. Williams, a pattern of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks. "Having satisfied himself by the experience of many laborious years," says his friend and biographer, Mr. Prout, "that such stimulants were not essential to health or energy, and having seen at the islands of Borabora and Raiatea, their fatal influence in frustrating the objects which he most ardently desired, he could not in after years be induced to make terms with what he deemed and denounced a fell destroyer. Hence, while he resided in the islands, and after his return to this country, both in public and private, he avowed his convictions in favour of total abstinence from these beverages, because he accounted them inimical to human happiness, and a grievous impediment to the Gospel of Christ." I shall, perhaps, be pardoned in adding, that the last eight years of my life have been years of total abstinence from all intoxicating beverages, and that those years have also been esteemed by me the happiest and most useful portion of my existence.—From a Lecture on the Life and Martyrdom of the Missionary Williams, by R. W. Vanderkiste, Missionary.

THE WIFE'S INTREATY, AND THE HUSBAND'S RUIN.

A THRILLING NARRATIVE.

MR. WILLIAM D— was a young man of promising character. As his parents were in good circumstances, he received a liberal education, and was called from school at the age of eighteen, to assist his father, as clerk to his business. Two years and a half after this, he received a heavy stroke by the death of his father, who was addicted to drink to excess, and was found dead in bed one morning, being drunk the night before, and thus met a drunkard's grave! As William was the only son, he succeeded to his father's business, which he conducted with order and propriety; and the business flourished and increased. Being pious and generous, and a superintendent in a Sunday-school, he built a school at his own expense. He married a pious young lady, who was also a teacher in the Sunday-school. As I had business to transact in the town where he resided, I arrived there one morning very early, and as I was going to his residence I met him with his fair companion on their morning's walk; and the thought struck me that if ever a couple on earth had good prospects before them, it was they; for he was religiously, morally, and intellectually wise, and his companion was in no sense behind him. I stopped with them as long as I could conveniently, and left them with the impression that I had never seen two human beings enjoy more felicity.

Alas! this fair picture had to be blurred; and now it must be shown in all its deformities.

A short while after I left them I went to Spain, where I continued for eight years. On my arrival in England, I made my way towards the place where they resided, and arrived at a town within 27 miles of it, one Saturday night. As I made it a practice not to travel on Sundays, I put up at the Temperance Hotel. The Sunday morning was a sharp, frosty morning, and the people were muffled up in their winter costumes. As I was going to the House of God, my thoughts fixed on my friend; I saw him, in imagination, in the Sunday-school, with a number of young men and women who had been trained up in the fear of God by him, and who were now his assistants as teachers; when my attention was suddenly drawn to a wretched female, with two children, sitting on the stone steps of a warehouse, shivering with cold, and asking charity of the people who chanced to pass; her two little children were crying for bread, and when I approached her she asked me for a trifle, to get some bread for the children, for they had not had anything to eat for nearly twenty-four hours. She was in such a wretched condition that I could not speak, but stood looking her firmly in the face. She burst into tears and fainted; I immediately procured assistance; conveyed her and the children to an adjoining house, and got a medical man to attend to her. As soon as she recovered, and saw me enter the room, she hid her face in her hands and wept. I approached her and told her, not to make herself uneasy, but to tell me how she had become such a wretched object. She said it would be ingratitude in her to deny my request, after behaving so kindly towards her. She then asked me if I had no remembrance of her? I answered that I had never seen her before that I knew of; and I asked her name. Judge of my surprise, reader, when she told me her name was Mrs. D—, the wife of my former wealthy and generous friend. She stated that for four years after they were married they lived, as I had seen them, in peace and happiness. "My husband," she said, "had always a strong aversion to intoxicating drinks, and I often rallied him about it, and told him it was a foolish notion he had got into his head, and that a little wine would cheer him and make him more fit for business; but he always refused to take any. One day, however, as he was out of the town on business, it rained heavily, and he came home wet through. I again rallied him, and told him that I would not take any supper with him, unless he would take a little wine! Alas! I succeeded. He drank until he was quite drunk, and I gloried in conquering his foolish notions, as I called them. But when I retired, and reflected that I had made a kind husband and father drunk, and that I had no guarantee that he would not become a confirmed drunkard, my mind shuddered at the prospect before me. Everything in the future looked gloomy, and I for the first time in my life felt the awful responsibility I had incurred. I cannot tell you all my sufferings for a period of five years; my husband turned out, as I had that night feared, a confirmed drunkard; his business was neglected, and he was prohibited from teaching in the very school which he had built. His character was no longer esteemed, and he was shunned by the very men who before courted his society. When he saw himself thus an outcast, he gave himself up entirely to drink, and for the space of seven weeks he was drunk every day. One night, after we had put him to bed, he grew delirious; and he who before this, and even in his drunken state, had never spoken a cross word to me, now cursed me, and called me a fiend from hell, crying that I had been his ruin to all eternity! Alas! alas! I had to drink the cup of bitterness to the dregs. I immediately sent for our medical man, who told me that he was fast approaching his end; and in about two hours after he died in a state of delirium. From the commencement to the end it was a scene past all description. I had ruined a kind husband. I made him drink the first glass; the first glass gave him a thirst for more; and I made him a drunkard."

She now broke out again into a flood of tears, and the emotion of my mind was so great that I shed tears with her. I consoled her as well as I could; and after a pause she proceeded:—"At my husband's death the business was sold to meet the demands of our creditors, which were so great that the furniture and every article of value in the house was sold before they were satisfied. This so much affected me that I made up my mind to beg my bread from door to door, in some strange place where I was unknown, for I could not think of living in the town where I had enacted this fearful tragedy: I thought that I was pointed at by all who knew the circumstances; and I accordingly left the town one fine summer morning, and I have wandered about ever since. I came to this town on Friday, and I and the children had been without food from Saturday morning till you saw and relieved us so kindly."

Reader, my tale of misery and woe is finished. I might enlarge and comment on it; but it needs no comment, the facts are sufficient to induce any reasonable person to become a total abstainer. You may think that you will never become a drunkard; but who on earth would have thought that the subject of this narrative would have found a drunkard's grave? Oh! take warning, ye females! Your influence is irresistible, either for good or for evil. Oh! let it be for good; shun all intoxicating drinks, and fail not to let your principle be known. If you would have sober and good husbands, set them an example worthy of imitation; and you who have unsteady husbands, reason with them and aim to wile them over to the cause of total abstinence. But bear in mind that before you can consistently persuade your husbands, you must sign the pledge yourselves.

W. BROWN.

THE DRUNKARD'S CHILD.

'Tis strange that man, of all the brutes the head,
Should pine and languish for his daily bread.
The panther mother, in the forest wild,
Finds a sweet morsel for her shaggy child.
Daughter of England! pale with want and care,
Her cubs would scorn thy wretched infant's fare.
Poor child of woe! I mourn thy bitter lot,
Too oft the wretched starveling of a sot;
Thy sire, at once to sense and power a slave,
Lives but to feed the pothouse, gaol, and grave!

HENRY MENCKE.

"I CANNOT DO WITH TEETOTALISM."

The following is the substance of a letter recently addressed to a friend:—

"You once said to me, 'I cannot do with teetotalism.' I never think of you but these words appear like a dark shadow hovering around you wherever you go, and filling my mind with fearful forebodings respecting you. I wish I knew why you cannot do with teetotalism. I cannot conceive of any good reason you can have for so saying. I have carefully viewed for many years the evils resulting from the use of strong drink, and the blessings resulting from total abstinence, and I think that I have good reason for saying, I cannot do with drunkenness, nor with the custom of using strong drinks. It is a daily snare to young and old, rich and poor, learned and illiterate; and all, more or less, sustain injury from its use. Personally, you may believe you shall never be a drunkard; but how many have thought the same who have gone to a drunkard's grave! 'Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.'

"Let me remind you of the influence you exert on society. You are a family man: permit me to hope that you will not allow your children to grow up with the idea that you cannot do with teetotalism. Can you bear the idea that they should fall into the snare of the devil through the use of strong drink. You would not like to see your child playing on the brow of a dangerous mountain; much less would you like to see it play at rolling down that mountain, if a fearful gulph yawned at the bottom. Nor would you wish the experiment to be tried, in the uncertain hope that some bush on the brow might perhaps stop its fall before it had rolled down too far. And why will you allow your children to play with the drinking customs, to learn to drink, to get a taste, a liking for strong drinks, which may some day bid defiance to all those safeguards in which you fondly trusted!

"When we pray, 'Lead us not into temptation,' shall we at the same time wilfully expose ourselves to temptation? What shall be thought of the man who takes the intoxicating cup into his hand, and then prays, 'Lord, keep me from getting drunk!' While he swallows the intoxicating poison, is he sincere? And how can we teach our children to pray to be kept out of temptation, while we are leading them into it by our example?

"Let us beware how we allow our prejudices to hold us in thrall, preventing us from recognising and acknowledging truths of such intense interest to ourselves and those around us. "L. WHITE."

A DRUNKEN FOOL.—Among the "drunk and disorderlies" brought before the magistrates last week, was one Alfred Byng, described on the police sheet as "a gentleman." Among other mischievous pranks was that of breaking the crockery of a woman who kept a coffee-stand. It appeared that he had bargained with the woman for 2s. 6d. to have a smash at her cups and saucers. He had been drinking freely at some Scotch stores, and had treated various persons with drink. He was fined 20s. for being drunk.

A DRUNKEN LIBERTINE.—Last week Robert Legget, a leather merchant, of Bermondsey, was charged with having assaulted, and used very indecent language to a young lady of unquestionable respectability. The charge was fully proved before Alderman Carden. The defendant said, "I assure you, Sir, I was so drunk as to have no idea of what took place. A friend and I had dined, and taken four bottles of wine, in the tavern near the spot." The alderman remarked on the atrocity of the case, and sentenced him "to be imprisoned seven days in the House of Correction." The defendant appeared shocked at this judgment, and offered to apologise to the lady, and to pay any amount of fine the court might think proper to inflict. His friends interceded for him, but the alderman refused to make any alteration in the sentence, and he was removed to the House of Correction. It is to be hoped that this justly-merited punishment will induce this "four-bottle" man to become an abstainer.

JOTTINGS ON ANGER.

THAT which involves our common interest demands our common study; indeed, if we diligently employed ourselves in looking into those things which tend to our elevation or debasement, happiness or wretchedness, much mutual advantage might result.

In order to revive attention to one enormous evil, I shall offer a few remarks on ANGER. Our subject may possibly give greater uneasiness than pleasure, but that affords no reason why we should forbear the scrutiny;—it is only by probing to the quick, that the surgeon often can arrive at a proper understanding of the malady, and it is by similar dealing with the conscience that we can attain due knowledge of a spiritual distemper and its cure. Whence prevails such rampant ignorance? For the most part, from dislike to the contemplation of unpalatable truth. Now, this is injudicious acting: men should not fear the truth, but look at it, and, looking at it, love it.

In a social point of view, ANGER is undeniably a scourge, a pestilence, pervading every age and clime. Who would willingly possess a bombshell friend or consort? With an individual prone to anger, one must be always on his p's and q's, as, even in the most trivial matter, offence is taken when actually none was intended; but to attempt persuasion of this at the time seems well-nigh needless;—he storms and will not hear.

ANGER truly is, as the youthful classic gleans, a gust of madness; for, during its duration, reason faints, and the defences of the mind are broken down. The maniac speaks and acts foolishly, degrades himself, and injures others: so does the wrathful man, but without excuse—he chooses madness. Yet, overlooking this, how often do men urge, in extenuation of misconduct, that it was committed under the influence of drink or rage! Very frequently, too, the one excess is made to serve as scapegoat to the other. "I was tipsy, and thus became outrageous;" or, "I was angry, and so got drunk!" Let us ever hold in remembrance that neither inebriety nor passion legalizes sin, as will be found at heaven's tribunal. The effects of anger on the framework of society are as easily perceptible, would men but look, as those of lightning on the crackling forest. If we trace its ravages at the family hearth alone, sorrowful alarm will seize us. Rumour acquaints us with an animal—the salamander—which, once let loose, spreads devastation in its course. Is it hardihood to hint that of this terrific creature the furious man proclaims himself vicegerent?

Then, by the mouth of physiology, we learn that anger is the parent of disease. This single fact might teach us to beware of giving way to angry feelings, lest while we scheme the chastisement of others, we, Haman-like, chastise ourselves. Under the indulgence of this passion the human system is entirely shaken; the brain is stimulated and deranged; the heart palpitates, and circulates a darker fluid; the lungs refuse to play, except with irregularity; and the liver, by producing a vitiated quality and an excessive quantity of bile, sometimes causes jaundice to step forth and embellish the complexion with a golden smile. This is an imperfect table of the ordinary dues, or tribute, which the choleric subject has to pay. How frequently does a passionate explosion hurry its victim through the Pass of Death! "Envy and anger," warns the proverb, "shorten life;" and a small amount of observation attests its truthfulness.

Another startling, though inferior, motive why an irritable temper should be dreaded, is the distortion which it gives to the features—a distortion, mark you, apt to remain after the departure of the ruffling breeze. Physiognomists affirm that the face, in general, supplies an index to the mind; that those things in which the latter habitually engage leave their impress on the former. Now which of us, my reader, would like to have his or her countenance stereotyped in anger?

Really if a person in a wrathful state chanced to behold his visage reflected in a mirror, he would, if he had any remnant of decorum, be constrained to question his identity, and, horror-struck, re-echo the bewildered woman in the song: "Ou! this is nae me!"

Moreover, how exceedingly uncouth in speech and gesture is the fiery will! Discarding reason, he makes use of wind for argument, and enacts gratuitously the part of a buffoon. While in this condition, that he may perceive his folly, and that corresponding conduct from infection may be prevented, ought he not to be accounted dangerous and avoided? Were the passionate man thus treated, he would probably soon learn the policy, if not the virtue, of restraining anger. Many will lament that they have used restraint so laxly, and that they have on more than one occasion uttered unadvisedly harsh words they would recal; but, alas! these poisoned shafts too often lodge in the wounds they make, and will not come away. Some, however, cling to the strange idea, that without outbursts of anger things would not prosper—that their dignity, honour, and veracity could not be upheld; therefore they articulate as through a speaking-trumpet, and to invest an opinion or command with weight and power, employ majestic oaths or imprecations. Monstrous delusion! it is only by exercising courtesy, honesty, and kindness towards all, whatever be the relative position, that esteem possessed of any value can be looked for or retained. Oh, yes; it is in governing one's spirit that true dignity consists; for "mightier," says the wise man, "is he that does so than he that takes a city"—yea, than he that conquers nations, rides in a triumphal car, and drags unnumbered captives in his train.

The vice of passionate indulgence, whether in thought, or word, or deed, receives but a slender portion of that consideration to which it is entitled. Even when its consequences are, in some measure, seen and felt, men seem apt, at least in their own case, to regard it as a little failing, and to excuse its presence as a necessary evil, forgetting all the time its dread malignancy, and the fact that, how good or bad soever the natural disposition may be, still culture is essential to promote and to repress. How can that be a small thing which, if unchecked, embitters all the streams of happiness? Men may look upon the matter as they please, but the sin is nowise less for being thus lessened, nor its punishment less sure for being doubted. If we duly meditated on the mischievous effects of anger, both on its indulgers and on those who come within their circle, we should be impelled to seek its overthrow in every heart; and the likeliest way to impress others with our sincerity as to its odious character, would be to abstain from harbouring it ourselves: precept without example is like a charge of powder without ball. Yet what a huge proportion of those by whom "years of discretion" have been reached, might, for their wrathful ebullitions, if still in pinafore, have to renew acquaintance with the properties of birch! To repeat the common ejaculation, "Drunk as a beast!" is to utter an unthinking slander on the brute creation, for they are models of sobriety; but "furious" may be substituted with melancholy truth—an infuriate bull, or a snappish cur, presents a striking simile. Two gentlemen, it is told, once rode in company—the one upon a horse of mettle. The animal's high spirits being thought rather troublesome, its hot-headed rider began to spur and lash, and the horse to plunge convulsively, till the other equestrian, fearful of a serious termination to the scene, called to his companion: "Be quiet, be quiet, and show yourself the wiser creature of the two." Certainly a piece of counsel worth remembering, and capable of extensive application on this brawling planet.

In order to discern aright the impropriety of a passionate career, let us go to the clear light of Scripture. If it is base and unseemly in the worldling, how much more so in the professed disciple of that heavenly Teacher whose commandment is, to bless when cursed, to love when hated, and to forgive when used despitefully! True, all anger is not sinful; for we have permission to be angry, in some cases, if we sin not. But considering that sin, eager to combine, presses so closely in the wake of anger, that sinful anger is the general rule, and anger free from sin the rare exception; and that we are so liable to err, is it not prudence to endeavour, with divine assistance, to curb all angry feelings at the outset? Though anger occasionally arises in the bosom of a wise man, only in the bosom of a "fool" is it allowed to dwell. Such is the plain doctrine of the Bible, which also gives a solemn warning that the votary of spirituous or passionate indulgence need not look for an inheritance above. Ye who "nurse your wrath to keep it warm," ponder the apostolic message to the Galatians. Beneath the rays of the meridian sun, ice soon changes into water; so, under the influence of a more effulgent sun, the Christian's anger is, as with the martyred Stephen, speedily converted into sorrow. Forgiveness is indeed a noble exercise to which the Christian is daily called, seeing that he is taught to pray and hope for mercy in the same measure that he metes it. Besides, what has a worm to do with thoughts of vengeance? God claims it as his own, and will not suffer his prerogative to be invaded.

If testiness of temper is thus prolific of danger and of woe, how intently should all guard against it! In the discussion of disputed points this caution is especially needful; for the cause of truth cannot in the least degree be served by rage and clamour. These may confuse, inflame, disgust, but not convince. Therefore, amid every provocation, let the advocate of right ever cherish charity and patience, guided by the Psalmist's precept: "Cease from anger!" Falseness may shelter in violence; but truth should dwell with gentleness.

The following anecdote vividly illustrates the unloveliness and inconsistency of peevishness. A fond mother was attempting to imbue the infant mind with thoughts of heaven, when the child, naming a religious but crusty relative, inquired, with evident anxiety, "And will he be there?" "I hope so, my dear; but what troubles you?" "Oh! I'm afraid grandpapa will be angry if he sees me in heaven, and ask my business there!"

Many are the badges of distinction, many the professions, with which men covet to invest themselves, and smooth their path through life; but let us prize above all that ornament, in the MASTER'S sight so precious—a meek and regulated spirit, and seek it at a throne of grace.

WHAT CHILDREN HAVE DONE.

A little girl in the town of C——, in the State of New York, aged six years, went one day to a neighbour, and said, Mrs. N., I want to join the Temperance Society. Thinking her too young to understand the subject, Mrs. N. told her as well as she could what she would be expected to do if she joined. She said she knew all that and was willing to do it. Mrs. N. having obtained the consent of the parents, put her name upon the constitution. The child then procured a copy of the pledge, and in a few days she obtained to it the names of more than one hundred of her mates and companions.

The child has not lived in vain, even if she should die now. Her efforts will doubtless save many feet from falling, many eyes from tears, and many souls from death. Her example, the example of a mere child, ought to put to the blush, thousands of the members of temperance societies. They have been members for years, have talent and influence, and time and opportunity, and yet they never have been, perhaps, directly instrumental of a single individual's taking the pledge of total abstinence from ardent spirits.

A little boy in the village of R——, recently united with the Temperance Society, since which he has procured the names of one hundred and forty children to the pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks. The example of this little boy, too, is worthy of imitation, and affords also a reproof to those who are his seniors in years, but not equal in active exertions and persevering labours.

Many persons have doubted the utility of encouraging or soliciting children to join in the temperance reform, alleging that they were not able to comprehend the nature of the pledge, and understand the meaning and force of the covenant. But we think the objection gratuitous; for it require no very great maturity of mind, or strength of intellect, to comprehend that ardent spirit is a poison, and that its use is both injurious and unnecessary.

In the whole subject of temperance there is nothing abstruse, metaphysical, or difficult to be understood. Children can understand that poison will kill. They can understand the obligation of a promise. They can comprehend why it is that a man who drinks ardent spirits, becomes a drunkard, and why a drunkard becomes poor and disgusting, and his family wretched; and they can perfectly understand that the man who uses no strong drink will never disgrace himself and his friends, and his country, by becoming a sot.

And then their influence over others—it is immense—often irresistible. Indeed we doubt not that the children alone, provided no counteracting influences were exerted, could in ten years time complete, or nearly complete, the temperance reform. This may appear extravagant; but let us consider that in ten years' time, the children who are now six years of age, will be coming on the active stage of life—that the present race of drunkards will nearly all be dead; that temperate drinking will scarce be known; that if the temperance reform is ever completed, it must be done by those who are now children, and finally, if the evils of drunkenness are ever perpetuated, these same children will be the means of perpetuating them. Train up the present generation of children in the practice of total abstinence, and when they come to hold the stations, possess the influence, and fill the places of their fathers, the woes of drunkenness will cease to exist. Let boys and girls do all they can for the cause of temperance.

THE BLOOD OF AN INEBRIATE.

Dr. George Stephens Jones, of Boston, communicates to the Medical Journal the following singular, though not unprecedented case of the transformation of the blood of an inebriate:—"I was called upon in great haste to see a patient who was represented to be in a dying condition, and on my arrival at the house, I really found him sick, but far from being as bad as was represented. My patient had a severe attack of pleuritis. The symptoms being very urgent, I thought proper to take blood. The peculiar odour emitted by the blood while running from the vein, together with the singular appearance it presented after remaining in the bowl some few minutes, led me to a further examination of it. One-half (that is lateral half), was of the normal appearance when drawn from a patient labouring under an inflammatory affection; the other half had the appearance of milk upon the surface, so much so, that I questioned my assistants of the fact, although I was quite positive of the vessel being perfectly clean when handed to me. I gave the bowl a rotary motion, yet the fluid would not mingle, remaining just the same as when first observed. What is still more interesting, and to which my attention was attracted, were the fumes of alcohol, which were so strong, that one would have supposed that article to have been thrown in among the blood. I did not apply a lighted taper to it, but had not the least doubt, that if I had, I should have seen it ignite, burning with its lambent flame. Is it at all strange that we find in autopsies of those persons who are in the habitual use of alcoholic liquors such depositions and concretions? Why should not their tissues be transformed when their blood has been so charged with carbon and hydrogen, which is entirely foreign to its vitality? Disease with all its concomitants, must needs make its ravages; the stomach suffering first, the functions of assimilation destroyed; the brain, from continued narcotism, softens, breaks, and the creature dies. My patient, I learned, drank New England rum in large doses, often repeated."

TEETOTAL DEMONSTRATIONS.

WE request particular attention to some announcements which appear on the front page of this number. The first refers to the SIXTH of the SPECIAL MONTHLY MEETINGS in EXETER-HALL, intended to be held on Monday next, the 4th inst. The preceding meetings have been very numerously attended, and a large gathering is confidently anticipated for the sixth and last of the present series. These meetings have proved most efficient, and have fully answered the expectations of those by whom they were projected. Suitable opportunities have thus been afforded for the promulgation of the important and salutary principle of teetotalism. Not only have the comparatively dormant energies of the metropolitan societies been roused, but in consequence of the ample reports furnished by the daily and other portions of the press, societies in various parts of the kingdom have been induced to make similar efforts, which, in all instances, have been crowned with similar success. The friends who have generously contributed to the carrying on these meetings, will, we have no doubt, consider this an ample remuneration. It now remains, however, to be considered, whether such demonstrations are to cease with the present series, or whether means ought not to be immediately devised for strengthening and perfecting the system of public advocacy which has been so auspiciously commenced. The public are evidently disposed to listen; there ought to be no lack of suitable advocacy; and the larger the scale on which this advocacy can be conducted, the greater will be the attraction, and, we have no doubt, also, the success. From the liberality with which the present movement has been supported, we have good reason for believing that the funds necessary for this purpose will not be withheld.

The second announcement refers to a meeting of a still more social and attractive character—namely, a SOIREE, to be held on GOOD FRIDAY, March 29th, in the large hall in Farringdon-street. The names of the gentlemen who are to address the company are not announced; but we understand that the committee are likely to secure the attendance of those who will be sure to interest the audience. We look forward to this meeting with considerable pleasure, as one likely to bring together many old acquaintances, at the same time, that it will introduce us to many new ones.

MONTHLY TEETOTAL CONFERENCE.

THE next Meeting will be held on WEDNESDAY EVENING NEXT, March 6, at Mrs. Watts's Temperance Hotel, Catherine-street, Strand, at eight o'clock precisely; when the attendance of every member of the Exeter-hall Committee is particularly requested, together with that of any of the Secretaries or Committee-men of the Metropolitan Societies.

* * * As the first series of Temperance Demonstrations in Exeter-hall is now completed, those friends who kindly sent their names as subscribers to the fund raised for that purpose who have not yet paid in the amounts, are requested to forward them to the Treasurer without delay.

RYDE, ISLE OF WIGHT.

A CORRESPONDENT informs us that the Rev. W. Tilson Marsh, Incumbent of St. James's Church, Ryde (late the Rev. Waldo Sibthorpe's), has determined to devote ONE POUND per month towards the purchase of Temperance publications, for distribution among various classes of persons resident there. An example well worthy imitation.

CONSUMPTION: ITS TREATMENT.

[BY H. MUDGE.]

WE have already glanced at the most prominent symptoms of Consumption, endeavouring, as we went over them, to show that they gave indications that spirituous stimulants were injurious in this fatal disease.

What is to be done? Is the case to be relinquished as entirely hopeless? By no means. Where the scrofulous constitution prevails in families, or manifests itself in individuals, preventive plans are to be uninterruptedly pursued; and where the disease is actually present, alleviating measures can be beneficially adopted.

My business is not here to describe the medicinal treatment of phthisis, but rather to show that the administration of alcohol should not be a part of it.

Tubercle, the grand seed of the malady, is foreign matter deposited in the lungs; the absorbents, therefore (or vessels which help to carry off refuse matter), must have become careless or tired (so to speak), and so have left part of their burden behind them. Now what is more exhausting or distracting to the myriads of vessels incessantly occupied in building up, taking down, and repairing the body, than a spirituous poison mixed with the vital current of the blood?

Judging from consumption being rare in mild climates, and almost unknown between the tropics, we may infer that the grosser living of our temperate latitudes is a predisposing cause, and probably light will break in some day, from the discoveries of chemistry, whereby we may be guided to a more simple diet, and be restricted, more than now, to the products of the earth for the eradication of scrofula. Added to an unstimulating diet, light and air would seem to be desirable. Experiments on animals and vegetables, kept from the light, go to show that scrofulous matter is deposited in bodies which are not exposed to its beams, and that exposure to our sun all the year round is best for destroying certain refuse in our system, which, if unconsumed, is deleterious; this is particularly the case during the period of growth; hence subdued light from veils, parasols, venetian blinds, window-curtains, window-blinds, &c., is detrimental to children, who should have the full blaze of light early and late, and be browned by the summer's sun, that the seeds of consumption may be burnt up! Next to simple unirritating diet, pure air, and unshaded light, warm and loose clothing comes to our aid as a preventive. The skin is the great helpmate to the lungs, and a daily washing will remove a quantity of poisonous waste which otherwise must be carried off through the lungs. Then, as to tight dress—the thing is an utter abomination, an insult to God, and a curse to man. Children, at all events, should be spared, for their bones are flexible, and if bound around in childhood, a diminished capacity of chest is unavoidable. When you see a lady with her bosom heaving every breath she draws, you may be perfectly sure she is laced too tight, for the motion consequent on respiration ought to go on all but invisibly, and to be performed by certain boundaries of the chest far off from the collar-bones.

To proceed with non-alcoholic treatment pending the disease. When threatened, the patient becomes generally thinner, paler, and more short-breathed than usual; seeing this, friends fly to wine, porter, or bitter ale, thereby incurring this imminent danger, viz., inflaming the deposited tubercles—an event to be soon followed by spitting of blood, and that by ulceration, hectic fever, and death. "The diet of a person," writes Dr. Gregory, "who has shown a disposition to phthisis should be nourishing, and calculated to afford strength to the system, without creating a disposition to febrile excitement. For this purpose farinaceous preparations of all kinds, with milk, should be recommended. Animal broths, with fish, and a proportion of plainly-dressed meat, may also be allowed; but all highly-seasoned dishes, and food which is difficult of digestion, fermented and spirituous liquors, are to be strictly prohibited."

Where there is ulceration, indicated by an expectoration of pus, the sores are always surrounded by a certain amount of inflammatory action, extending into the adjacent healthier portions of the lung. This action becomes more violent, and frets away the edges of the sore faster, if the parts are irritated by the presence of alcohol; hence more heat, more uneasiness, and more expectoration, an aggravation of the symptoms, and a speedier dissolution. In the great majority of cases relief to the urgent symptoms is sought from opiates. The stimulation of alcohol is antagonist to the sedative influence of the opium, and restlessness and delirium harass the sufferer.

"A circumstance well deserving of attention," to quote further from Dr. Gregory, "is the little disturbance which takes place in the functions of the brain. Delirium is very rare, except, perhaps, for a few hours before the patient's death. Even this is not constantly observed; for in many instances the senses remain perfect even to the last gasp of breath which is drawn. A degree of languor generally prevails; but in a large proportion of cases the mental faculties continue quite unimpaired."

The cases wherein most delirium occurs are those in which the matter accumulates so fast as to baffle expectation, and so suffocates the patient. Now, in these cases delirium results from impure blood; the carbon, not having met with the oxygen of the atmosphere in the lungs, has not been carried off. But alcohol is a highly-carbonized substance, and, if imbibed while the blood is not oxygenized, adds lamentably to the oppression and morbid action of the brain. The writer has seen many cases where death has been arrived at without the use of alcohol; and, as far as his experience goes, he can testify to the superior tranquillity of mind and quietude of body enjoyed by those over others whom friends have, through mistaken kindness, or reprehensible ignorance, dosed with alcoholic stimulants. Of some of the scenes at the death-bed of the non-irritated abstainer, the poet's description has been remarkably verified:—

"The chamber where the good man meets his fate
Is privileged beyond the common walk
Of virtuous life; quite on the verge of heaven."

A symptom frequently early in consumption is, suppression of the catamenia. Mothers are of course alarmed, and not unfrequently fly to a forcing treatment which entails the very evils they are anxious to avoid. I mention this only to put persons on their guard against such a delusion, and may possibly revert to this part of the subject in an article at a future day on Chlorosis.

DRINKING HEALTHS.—The custom of drinking healths appears to have been first introduced into England by Rowena, the daughter of Hengist, the first Anglo-Saxon King, in Kent, which at that time was drunk from large wassail cups, filled with spiced wine or ale. Historians relate that when Rowena was introduced to Vortigern, she presented a cup of wine on her knees, saying, "Be of health, Lord King!" to which he, being instructed in the custom, replied, "I drink your health."

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

EXETER-HALL.

The fifth of the series of monthly temperance meetings was held at Exeter-hall on Monday evening, Feb. 4—the subject for consideration being "Juvenile Depravity, its Causes, Consequences, and appropriate Remedies." The attendance was very numerous, and on the platform we observed several of the leading friends of social progress, and four or five of the county magistrates.

JOHN CASSELL, Esq., commenced the proceedings by announcing that the committee had invited Benjamin Rotch, Esq., B.C.L., to preside on that occasion, a gentleman who had greatly interested himself in the question to be brought before the meeting, and who had been the means of pressing the subject upon the attention of the upper classes of society (cheers).

Mr. ROTCH, on taking the chair, was loudly cheered. He said: The subject they had met to discuss, no one could deny, involved the question of the whole of the social happiness of this country, because they could not forget that the youth of to-day would be the men of to-morrow; so that unless they were properly trained in the way they should go, it were vain to expect them ever to become blessings in their day and generation (hear). The question had been very wisely divided in the advertisement which convened that meeting, from which it appeared that they were to discuss the causes and consequences, and, if possible, find out the appropriate remedies for juvenile depravity. It had long struck him that the only difficulty in arriving at the result they so earnestly desired, was the almost utter impossibility of inducing those in authority to take the first step (hear). Those who were prepared to believe that juvenile depravity arose mainly, and in the first instance, from—and he must be excused for putting that foremost, as the leading horse of the team—the unfortunate drinking habits of the working classes of this country, and also as somebody in the hall remarked, "the upper classes also" (hear, hear) though he must say that he cared not so much for the wealthier classes to embrace teetotalism as for the men who were doomed to earn their daily bread (hear); for it must be remembered that juvenile depravity was to be found especially, if not entirely, among the children of the labouring population. To moralise this latter class, then, must be their endeavour, if they would prevent their jails being filled with felons. There were at that moment no less than 15,000 children in the prisons of this country—15,000 learning to be thieves, to break their country's laws; whose whole art, and skill, and talents, which in many cases were great indeed, were being prostituted to the sad purpose of learning to be abandoned men; for that was all that prisons did for juvenile offenders. From his own experience he could testify that one great cause of juvenile depravity—nay, he might almost say the greatest—was the neglect of children by drunken and dissipated parents. Very recently, in the Coldbath-fields prison, there were two boys confined, the one nine and the other eleven years of age. They were the sons of a man who was employed on the Government works, and earned as much as two guineas and a half a week. His wife was dead, and he himself was an inveterate drunkard. At six o'clock in the morning, when he went out to work, these children were turned into the streets, and when at night he returned home drunk, if they happened to be on the steps they were let in, otherwise they were allowed to spend their nights in the same way. As a natural consequence they fell into vice, and became the inmates of a prison, and the associates of the worst of characters. He would tell the meeting that the juvenile depraved, when committed to gaol by a magistrate, felt himself ennobled by the situation in which he was placed—felt proud to stand in the dock, to be taken up by a policeman, to have witnesses examined against him, and to be asked if he had any cross-examination to administer; in fact, he became so exalted in his corrupt imagination, that he was fain oftentimes to cast an insult at the judge himself. Touching the expenses to the country of prosecuting juvenile offenders, he remarked that a little toy hammer which he held in his hand, the whole value of which was one halfpenny, was stolen by a lad, and cost the sum of £2 10s. to obtain a conviction upon, and the poor wretch was sent to prison to learn to practice his depredations a little more skilfully, and, consequently, more successfully. Was not the present mode of meeting such cases absolutely senseless? (hear). In other countries a proper discrimination was exercised, and it was held that a child under fifteen could not be committed to prison as a felon, but should remain in custody as an un-cared-for child, and submitted to a discipline proper for him (hear). Another most serious cause of juvenile depravity met the poor child at the second stage in his approach to manhood—that was when apprenticed out to learn a trade. The binding of a boy for seven years to a master, for the purpose of being taught some handicraft, was a perfect farce, and he would engage that there was no trade in England the principles of which could not be taught in three months. He exhibited an apparently well-made shoe, which was the work of a lad after an instruction of that period, and contended that, if such could be done, it was a gross piece of neglect on the part of those who had the care of youth not to give them some industrial education, to prepare them for going under the care of masters to whom their services would immediately be available, and who would, therefore, be disposed to treat them not, as at present, merely in the capacity of servants (hear). The country was just beginning to wake up to the conviction that an industrial course of training was in the proper sense education for the labouring classes; and that, in order to fit persons for instructors, it was not merely necessary, as it was once regarded, that they should have met with some misfortune to incapacitate them for other callings, but that masters and mistresses of schools must themselves undergo a preparatory training (cheers). The consequences of juvenile depravity were every day manifest in increased rates for supporting an army of police, to pay for the continual summoning together of juries and witnesses, and to keep these poor, wretched, depraved juveniles before and after trial (hear). What did the meeting believe that one of those unfortunate youths cost the country in his lifetime, before he was expatriated? From £300 to £500! less than half of which would educate them to be honest and useful members of society (hear). Then, as a consequence of juvenile depravity, there was the expense of continual experiments for improving prison discipline. He would consider no expense too great if they could save those poor children from that moral degradation which the present system was only perpetuating; and he was, therefore, favourable to the erection of prisons for adults, and houses of reception and reformatories for children; and he was convinced that, if this plan were followed out, there would be plenty of room to spare in all their prisons in the course of four or five years (hear). Another consequence was the immense increase of thieves, who were pilfering every day their property. This evil was not merely that there was in the country an immense mass of immoral people living by depredation, but there was an immense amount of ingenuity misapplied. The remedy for this state of things was apparent: let them not send their young criminals to prison, but educate them usefully, industrially, religiously (cheers). He honoured Mr. Monckton Milnes for presenting a bill in parliament last session, one clause of which provided that for the first offence committed by young children the parent must be held responsible (cheers). Why should not the same provision be made for juveniles as was made for a wife, who was always supposed to act under the control of her husband? and if the adult woman was saved, why not the poor child, who, in many cases, obeyed the mandate of his father or mother, "to steal to the extent of a shilling's worth, or he should have no dinner." Another remedy which he proposed, and dwelt at some length upon, was a judicious system of emigration. This he suggested in connexion with an extended plan of industrial education. The example of the Philanthropic Society, with which he was connected, showed that that could be advantageously done. During the recent disturbances at the Cape, when the colonists indignantly refused to receive the convicts which the government had sought to impose upon them, their society had sent out from their farm-school, at Redhill, 361 industrially educated boys, who were not only received, but taken into employment on the day of their arrival, and a further demand made for sixty more (cheers). In conclusion he observed, they must, as a nation, materially alter their plans for the reformation of juvenile offenders; but while the government of this great land continued to draw immense revenues for the state from the degradation and drunkenness of the people, it was a hard battle to fight, and meetings of that kind, which were called "the pressure from without," were sometimes the only way in which it could be accomplished. He hoped the present assembly would give them a good squeeze (cheers).

Mr. JACKSON, a City missionary, whose labours for some time past have been directed to this particular class of the community, the juvenile depraved, then addressed the meeting at great length, detailing some most lamentable cases of delinquency which had occurred under his own immediate observation, and the means which he had adopted for their reclamation. As to the causes of the evil, he expressed his firm conviction that they were to be found in the drunkenness of the country, especially of parents; the cohabiting of parties who were not united by marriage, and from whom no religious or moral training or influence could possibly be expected; and the erratic habits of some youths. He mentioned in the course of his observations that a poor boy, hearing of the proposed "Prize Essays on Juvenile Depravity," obtained a pen and ink, and wrote on a slip of paper the following six causes of that unhappy state of things:—1st. The drunkenness of parents and children. 2nd. The neglect of religion at home. 3rd. Bad companions. 4th. Neglect of the Sabbath. 5th. Low lodging-houses where juvenile depravity was encouraged. 6th. "Fences," or, in other words, houses which were open to the reception of stolen property, and where juvenile thieves could dispose of their ill-gotten booty. He proposed, as a remedy—Reformatories upon an extensive scale and under the sanction of the government, with officers who should not only have the power to receive the poor outcasts from society, but also to visit low lodging-houses and other places where depraved youth congregated.

THOMAS BRIGGS, Esq., followed in a powerful and telling speech. He looked with deep interest upon the rising race of the country. The hopes of England were centred in the young. With the old—those who were matured in vice and grey in crime—they could expect to do little in the way of reformation—indeed little more than to keep it in check; but there was not a young child wandering about the streets of the metropolis, in the capacity of a beggar or thief, who could not be moulded to good with the same facility as to evil, and at one-third of the expense which they would cause the country if they went into their workhouses as paupers, or into their prisons as criminals, were they, as a nation, only wise enough to use sound and proper measures (hear). He found that in 1847 there were 306 males and 50 females, under ten years of age, and that there were 3,222 males and 456 females, under the age of fifteen, taken into custody by the police of the metropolis; and he was of opinion that there could not be a more complete piece of folly than for people in a Christian age, and in a Christian country, to spend their money in keeping up the machinery of police courts and officers, and sitting in solemn judgment upon juvenile delinquents like these. How was it that in a country upon which Providence had showered so many blessings, and whose commercial relations extended to every region of the earth, that such serious social anomalies should exist? There was a kind of squint-eyed philosophy which led many to look obliquely at the question, and trace it to some defects in the education of the people by the government. For his own part, he trusted all government interference with that subject. Unless, indeed, they could show greater skill and better examples than heretofore, he only asked them to stand out of the way (hear), and to remove all obstructions (cheers). The meeting would recollect that one of the ancient philosophers of Greece—Diogenes—was visited in his tub by the mighty Alexander. "What can I do for Diogenes?" said the emperor. "Stand out of the way," replied the Cynic, "that so, by not intercepting the rays of the sun, you do not take that away from me which you cannot give" (laughter). Let the government stand out of the way, and give the people fair scope for their energies, and not talk about educating the people so long as it drew its principal revenue from their vice and immorality (loud cheers). One cause of the evil they were met to discuss was to be found in the inability of parents, to give proper education to their children, and in their intemperate and vicious habits. He looked for much of the remedy to come from the industrial training schools to which reference had been made, and concluded by expressing his earnest desire that every one present would take up the question as if the possibility of its success rested on his own personal efforts to ameliorate that state of things, and not waiting for the government to do anything. Governments have been in all ages the slowest locomotive machines, ever dragging behind the intelligence of the people (cheers), and the friends of progress could not afford, in the present days of railways, to travel by the sleepy waggon at the rate of three miles an hour; they wanted something more in accordance with the spirit and genius of the times (hear). The fact was as in all former glorious struggles, it was the people who must do the work (cheers)—they must effect their own regeneration, or they must remain where they were (hear). No question pressed more on the time and regard of the people than that of juvenile depravity. It constituted the shame and the danger of the metropolis; and so long as that shame and that danger were continued, they would never have social peace nor social order (cheers.)

The Revs. THOMAS SPENCER, of Bath, and B. PARSONS, of Ebley, and Mr. WOODWARD, one of the county magistrates, subsequently addressed the meeting on the same subject, and the proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the chair.

ISLINGTON.

The fourth anniversary of the Islington Working Men's Total Abstinence Society was celebrated in the British School Rooms, Denmark-terrace, on Monday evening, February 18. A large party took tea, and a public meeting was afterwards held, over which D. D. GOURLY, Esq. M.D., presided. After a few remarks upon the importance of the working classes, and of their sobriety, he introduced to the meeting a gentleman who has visited this country with the object of obtaining all possible information as to prisons and prison discipline;—

M. CARL OLOF BRINK, LL.B., Secretary to the Royal Board of Prisons in Sweden, and one of the Judges of the Supreme Court:—"I am sorry," said he, "that my very imperfect knowledge of your language, does not enable me to speak to you fluently and distinctly; but I trust you will have the kindness to excuse my imperfections. I feel great pleasure in having the privilege of attending a meeting of the Working Men's Teetotal Society. Working men are justly considered the most useful members of society, and are, therefore, in my country, called the pillars of society. In my capacity of Judge, I have had occasion to notice that intoxicating liquors occasion more crimes than all other causes put together; and if your noble and christian endeavours are crowned with success, as I have no doubt they will, a large portion of poverty and wretchedness will vanish from your otherwise highly-favoured land, and such persons as myself and the worthy doctor in the chair, will not be wanted. People will live to the patriarchal age, without disease and without crime. My king and queen have set a noble example of total abstinence to their people, which I could wish might be followed by other nations. I most cordially wish success to this and similar societies." The learned gentleman was much cheered.

Mr. HOLDEN, of Chelsea, exhorted the working men present, who were not members of that society, to become so without delay; assuring them that it would be for their benefit in every sense of the word, and adducing his own experience in proof. From being the subject of disease, and under the necessity of begging 2s. 6d. a week from the parish, he had become a healthy man, comfortable in his circumstances, and able to do a little good among his fellow-creatures.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Chelsea, related his experience in very racy style. He owed much to teetotalism. Instead of carrying an old hod, as a bricklayer's labourer, he now had two or three spring vans, and several men in his employ; and so far from being, as formerly, the fixture of a public-house, an outcast from decent society, he was now accounted a respectable tradesman.

Mr. W. SPRIGGS regarded the temperance question as one of weighty import, and the temperance movement as the movement of the day. He urged all present to consistency and energy, pointing out several peculiarities in the aspect of the times as remarkably encouraging to teetotal advocates.

Mr. MANN gave an interesting account of his labours, as a hard-working farmer, with the object of convincing all present that intoxicating liquors were not essential to health, vigour, or cheerfulness.

Mr. T. B. SMITHIES related a few facts, proving the connexion between intemperance and crime, and showing that even boys and girls who had been for some years in Sabbath-schools, were among transgressors, in consequence of their use of strong drinks. He strongly recommended all present to become readers of Mr. Cassell's new publication, "The Working Man's Friend," and especially the number containing an admirable paper on the subject of Fines and Footings.

Mr. J. W. GREEN reminded the members present that there were thousands of their fellow-creatures plunged into all the evils resulting from the use of strong drinks, and that it was their duty to exert themselves for the rescue of such, as they regarded their own safety, the good of others, and the honour of God.

Mr. GUTTERIDGE detailed some cases of want and misery resulting from the use of strong drinks.

The CHAIRMAN concluded with a very instructive address, in the course of which he assured those present, that they could not infringe the laws of nature with impunity, and that they were sure to do so if they used any portion of intoxicating drinks.

The meeting was crowded, and did not break up till a late hour. Several persons signed the total abstinence pledge.

PRINCESS-PLACE, WESTMINSTER.

On the 28th ult. Mr. T. A. SMITH delivered a lecture on the Art of Distillation, illustrated with numerous experiments. He gave the history of the art, and described the various kinds of distilled spirits. He stated that distillation was merely the separation of the spirit, that the spirit was the product of fermentation, and the educt of distillation. He then described the various methods of ascertaining the strength of spirituous liquors, and explained their composition and properties. He said that although these liquors were the most powerful in their injurious effects, yet all intoxicating liquors contained the same evil spirit; they were all productive of crime, disease, and death, and all were alike unnecessary.

HAWKESTONE-HALL, WATERLOO-ROAD.

The committee of the South London Temperance Society, desirous to diffuse knowledge respecting the philosophy of health, and the accordance of teetotalism with science, arranged with Mr. T. A. SMITH to deliver three lectures in the above hall, on Animal Chemistry, illustrated with drawings and numerous experiments. The first lecture was delivered on the 22nd of January. The subject was, the Composition of Animal Bodies. In this lecture, Mr. SMITH explained the way in which naturalists classified bodies, the distinctive characters of animals, the ultimate elements found in animals, and the sources from which they obtained their constituents. He stated that plants obtained the materials for the formation of their bodies from the air, the soil, and water. Animals derived their elements from air, food, and drink. The elements were found in combination, in what was called proximate elements: these formed fibres, tissues, and organs. He then described the methods of investigation pursued by chemists and physiologists, and stated that it was almost universally agreed, that intoxicating liquors did not in any way furnish substances required to build up the body, or repair the waste which was continually occurring. He then read the following quotation from Liébig's Letters on Chemistry, page 57:—"Starch, gum, sugar, beer, wine, spirits, &c. furnish no element capable of entering into the composition of blood, muscular fibre, or any part which is the seat of the vital principle." Mr. SMITH said this doctrine was of immense importance in reference to health; the wear and tear of the muscles, and the brain, and nerves, could only be compensated for by the use of food containing the necessary elements. Hence the mistake of the poor toil-worn, exhausted labourer, who, instead of taking nutritious food to recruit his wasted energies, takes an unnatural stimulant, which, in reality aggravates the evils he is already suffering from. The lecturer then described the composition of the bones, muscles, ligaments, nerves, and other organs of the human body, their various uses, and the evil effects produced upon them by violations of the laws of health.

The second lecture was delivered on the 29th of January, on Digestion. Mr. SMITH began this lecture by giving a definition of the function, and describing the digestive apparatus of various animals. He then gave a description of the structure, analysis, and uses of the teeth; the composition and properties of the saliva; and described the various organs concerned in the apparently simple action of swallowing. He next exhibited a human stomach, and explained its structure and offices; the nature of the gastric juice, the conversion of food into chyme, and the experiments tried in artificial digestion. He then showed, by experiments, the way in which alcohol deranges digestion and injures the stomach. He gave some experimental illustrations of the nutritive substances found in animal and vegetable food. He said that a pint of the best ale weighed rather more than twenty ounces avoirdupois, that it contained rather less than one ounce of alcohol, rather more than two ounces of sugar and gum, a little carbonic-acid gas, a trace of acetic acid, and the remainder was water. Thus, beer was entirely worthless as far as a supply of materials for the renovation of the body was concerned, the substances found in it only containing the elements for the generation of heat, and the production of heat. Hence, many men were fat but not strong; and the strongest men—the men capable of bearing the greatest amount of severe labour—were not fat. Strength depended upon bone, muscle, ligament, nerve, contractility; and could only be maintained by food which contained the elements of nutrition. The poor man who gave part of his hard-earned wages for intoxicating liquors, was labouring under a species of mania, which could only be cured by abstaining long enough to recover the right use of his faculties. In bread there was an ample supply of fuel to generate heat, as well as nitrogenous substances to assist in the nourishment of the body; and all things required for health, strength, and life, could be obtained in sufficient quantity, and of the best quality, without intoxicating liquors.

The third lecture was delivered on the 5th of February, on Respiration. Mr. Smith said, all living beings required air, and all effected changes in the air by breathing. He then described the respiration of plants, zoophytes, worms, insects, fishes, reptiles, birds, and mammalia. Atmospheric air, as provided by our Great Creator, was the only air adapted for respiration. After exhibiting the effects of breathing ether, chloroform, and laughing gas, he showed that intoxicating liquors retarded the decarbonising action of the air, and kept the blood in an impure state; that health required pure air, plain nutritious food, water as a beverage, exercise as a stimulant, and rest as a restorative.

The society in the above place is in a prosperous condition, as the attendance at the usual Tuesday night's meeting testifies. The managers have adopted the plan of enlisting the assistance of all the available talent in London, thereby making every meeting a special one, and the proceedings worthy of the cause. During the past quarter they have been favoured with the advocacy of the Rev. James Sherman, Rev. W. W. Robinson, Rev. Isaac Doxsey, Rev. W. R. Baker, Dr. Burns, Dr. Oxley, Dr. Lovell, B. Rotch, Esq., John Cassell, Esq., J. W. Green, Esq., Messrs. Parker, McLellan, Mann, Paine, McBain, &c. &c. Lectures by Mr. T. A. Smith, Dr. Lees, and Mr. Allen, and two addresses by Mr. R. Horn, have been attended with beneficial results. Mr. Perfit is to deliver three lectures on physiology on the first three Tuesdays in March. A festival is announced for Easter Monday, when it is expected that the Shapcott family, with their unrivalled band, will be present. Should any agent or advocate be visiting London, the secretary, Mr. G. Campbell, 5, Cambridge-terrace, Clapham-road, or 51, Blackfriars-road, will be glad to make arrangements for an address or lecture, provided sufficient time is given, as the arrangements for the meetings are made the month previous.

GREENWICH.

On Wednesday, January 30th, the Borough of Greenwich Temperance Association held its third annual festival and public meeting in the commodious rooms of the Greenwich Literary Institution.

After tea, before adjourning to the large hall, the chairman, B. Rotch, Esq., reminded the company that perhaps no better opportunity would be presented during the evening for signing the declaration of total abstinence, which was accordingly handed forward, and received the signature, in the first instance, of Henry Penton, Esq., a magistrate of the county of Middlesex, who was followed by several others.

On taking the chair at the public meeting, Mr. Rotch called on the secretary, Mr. H. Cole, to read the annual report. Mr. English, presented the financial statement.

The CHAIRMAN expressed the great satisfaction he felt in coming amongst his Greenwich friends once more. There was one circumstance connected with the meetings in that hall which always gave him pleasure: he was sure to see some of the honest, hearty old tars of England present. From the presence of some of these brave fellows at a former meeting, he had been led to refer to the loss of that Leviathan of the deep, the Great Britain steam-ship, which was indebted for its fate to intoxicating drink. (A person here exclaimed, "No, no!") A gentleman said "No." Well, then, he (Mr. Rotch) would prove it. He knew Capt. Hoskin; perhaps the gentleman who said "No" was acquainted with him also. Then he would bear him out that a finer fellow and a more thorough seaman never trod a ship's deck. But he had two kinds of duty to perform, and his owners would have been dissatisfied if he had not sought to discharge both. He was not only to navigate the vessel, but to please the passengers and secure the character of being such a very nice, agreeable, gentlemanly man. It was his duty to dine with the passengers, and after dinner to take a glass of wine with this gentleman, and another with that lady. Now, the captain was not an intemperate man; there was no reason whatever for considering him such, although the wine was the cause of all the mischief. He walked the quarter-deck and saw a light, which he at once recognised as the Calf of Man. He then went down to dinner and sat for two hours—his vessel, with all the giant power of steam, rapidly advancing across the billows the whole time. There he was, not indulging himself like a sensualist, but merely fulfilling a commander's duty to his passengers, but that duty obliging him to use the decanter. He then went on deck and saw a light. "Ah!" said he, "the Calf of Man!" and on went the vessel, heading to the west, precisely as she had done two hours before, instead of changing her course at right angles to her former track. Now so man who wanted to defend Capt. Hoskin's character would say he was such a booby as not to know that three hours' steaming beyond the Calf of Man would knock him on to the Irish coast. That was not the blunder; it was in fancying that the Calf of Man, which he had seen on his right before he went to dinner, had kept alongside of him ever since. This was the mischief; and no man was less likely than Captain H. to be so bewildered, had it not been for the hospitalities and civilities of the cabin table. Therefore the course of the vessel never varied until the stern rocks of Ireland stopped her progress, and in five minutes £170,000 worth of property was a wreck. Mr. Rotch next proceeded to enlarge on the more popular evils of strong drinks. As a magistrate he had really felt ashamed of the course bench of justices pursued. They were perfectly aware of the mischiefs resulting from the consumption of intoxicating liquors; they knew the terrible moral and social consequences of vending them; they had ample power to forbid it, and yet they still allowed its continuance. Hitherto he had stood alone in his opposition; he had formed a "minority of one;" but his friend on the right, who had that day signed the declaration, would henceforth bear him company.

W. JANSON, Esq., said, that, as connected with Lloyd's, he could without scruple confirm the chairman's statement in regard to the loss of the Great Britain. There was no uncertainty, then, on the subject, but all concurred in believing that it was the after-dinner wine which led to the disaster. He had been a teetotaler for many years, and he set out with the thorough principle of neither taking it himself nor providing it for others. From the cellar to the roof, his house was purged of alcohol.

MR. RICHARD HORN, of Coventry, agent of the National Temperance Society, delivered a speech of great power and originality, and his whimsicalities were responded to by loud and repeated bursts of laughter.

HENRY PENTON, Esq., who had in the early part of the evening signed the total abstinence pledge, proposed a resolution of thanks to the committee, and made some appropriate remarks on the object aimed at by Temperance Societies.

MR. J. W. GREEN seconded the resolution, which was carried with great cordiality.

The Rev. ISAAC DOXSEY delivered an energetic address, enforcing the principle of teetotalism.

The Rev. T. TIMPSON, of Lewisham, had for a long time had his attention favourably directed towards the temperance movement, and congratulated the meeting upon the character of the addresses they had listened to. Of Mr. Horn he felt proud, as a fellow-townsmen, and he wished the society all success. For his own part, he no longer wished to look on as a mere bystander, but was fully prepared to associate with the work.

Mr. Timpson then signed the pledge, and this interesting festival concluded by a vote of thanks to the committee for their excellent arrangements.

A GREAT JUVENILE MEETING

In connection with the "City of Westminster Christian Total Abstinence Association and Juvenile Band of Hope," was held (by kind permission of the shareholders) in the spacious Hall, York-street, on Friday, 8th February.

It was an inspiring sight to witness the gathering of this hopeful band, wending their joyous way in company with mothers and fathers, some of whom were the degraded victims of intemperance, to the temple of sobriety and truth.

That man's soul must have been destitute indeed of that sympathetic feeling which is the beauty of humanity, and the grand moving principle in every sacred and benevolent enterprise, that could have remained unmoved at such a spectacle, or refrained from offering up a grateful aspiration to the Father of Spirits. The greater part of the commodious area was occupied by a numerous body of children belonging to our Sabbath and Ragged Schools; the girls on one side and the boys on the other. The lower and upper boxes were filled with respectable persons and their families. The platform was appropriated to a select number of the "Band of Hope," who were to deliver temperance and scriptural recitations, and swell the chorus of thanksgiving and the anthem of joy:—

"We love to hear the hymn of praise
By happy children sung;
And God himself, well pleased, will bless
Our efforts for the young.

"We plead the high triumphant cause,
Of mercy, peace, and love;
Though evil men revile, we know
Angels rejoice above.

"Then, lovely children, come and join
Our hopeful little band,
'Twill drive away the greatest foe,
That ever scourged our land."

The Rev. Jabez Burns, D.D., our esteemed President, occupied the chair, and commenced the auspicious proceedings with a suitable and fervid prayer. He expressed his gratification at seeing such an imposing number of the representatives of the coming generation before and around him, and he trusted that their hearts would be so influenced by sober and sacred truths, as to prepare them for performing an important part in the world's business when they arrived at years of discretion.

Recitations and singing by the children engaged an interesting part of the evening, all of whom elicited most enthusiastic cheering. It was a treat of no ordinary nature to hear their prattling tongues consecrated upon the altar of temperance, and listen to their sweet voices, exerted harmoniously in praise of sobriety and the mercies of God:—

"God will surely ask,
Ere I enter heaven,
Have I done the task,
Which to me was given.

Little drops of rain
Bring the springing flowers;
And I may attain, much
By little powers."

Among the moral entertainments, Elizabeth Hillard, an intelligent-looking little girl, came forward and courteously presented herself before Mrs. Hardwick, the lectress, followed by a band of smiling teetotalers, who formed a semi-circle, and read out, in a clear and emphatic style, an address, a testimonial of respect to Mrs. Hardwick, in the name of the members of the "Westminster Juvenile Band of Hope."

Mrs. HARDWICK, after adverting to the address which had just been presented, delivered an instructive speech to children and parents.

The Doxology was sung by the assembly; and thus terminated the largest and most important juvenile temperance meeting ever held in the City of London.

Let us have the rising generation trained in the paths of true sobriety, and there will rise up mothers and fathers, Christians and patriots, who shall be blessings to the world.

In consequence of being prohibited from holding meetings in the Ragged school-rooms, I am compelled, or my mission would be destroyed, to visit these children of poverty at their homes, and grateful, indeed, are they to see me. Many a parent has been constrained to sign the pledge through their earnest pleadings; and, in order to prepare them for our periodical demonstrations, I have them in groups at my own residence, where we have Scripture reading, recitations, and singing; after refreshments, we close with a sacred hymn, and the little ones merrily return to their domiciles.

JOHN H. ESTERBROOKE, Hon. Sec.

TOTTENHAM, MIDDLESEX.

A brief report of the proceedings of the Tottenham and Edmonton Temperance Union has just been sent us, from which we learn that the operations of the society have been carried out during the past year more extensively and successfully than at any former period. At the annual festival held in Tottenham Park, nearly 3,000 persons assembled, and enjoyed healthful and rational recreation, without any aid derived from intoxicating drinks, and many testimonies were borne of the non-necessity, and to the mischievous consequences of the use of all such drinks. Among the lectures delivered in the course of the year, were some by Dr. Grindrod, which are believed to have worked conviction in many minds.

BRISTOL.

A friendly tea-party of total abstainers, got up principally by reclaimed drunkards, was held, a few weeks ago, in the Tailors' Hall, Broad-street. After tea, a public meeting was held, over which Mr. S. CAPPER presided. The object of the meeting, he said, was chiefly to receive the testimonies of working-men who had been benefited by their adoption of teetotalism.

Mr. J. BARKER, warehouseman, said, that after having been for years ensnared by strong drink, he became a teetotaler thirteen years ago; since which period comforts had flowed into his house. He now laboured with pleasure to himself, and satisfaction to his employers.

Mr. M. PRIEST, chain-maker, knew, from long experience, that working-men could perform their labours without the use of intoxicating liquors. In former years he had often earned £4 and £5 a-week, and spent half of it in strong drink. He was in every way a better man since he had signed the pledge.

Mr. M. STEPHENS, mason, was greatly improved in body and mind since he became a teetotaler. He began to think, to read his Bible, which, for many years he had sadly neglected, and to feel delight in searching its pages.

Mr. J. COX, painter, was thirteen years ago a decrepid old man; strong drink having obliged him to hobble on two sticks. On his becoming a teetotaler his health gradually improved, and for several years he had enjoyed a good share of health and vigour. He had been benefited, also, in other respects.

Mr. J. COOMBS, umbrella maker, stated that his mother was a drunkard, and had often made the settle of a public-house his cradle. He was afterwards apprenticed to a drunken master, learned to drink, and became a reckless character. He never remembered going to church or chapel till he went to be married. As years advanced he became the father of a family, but he cared nothing about the education of his children. Wretchedness and misery were his portion. By attending a teetotal meeting, he was awakened as out of a fearful dream, and he signed the pledge. Through mercy he became a serious character, and joined himself to the church of God. He was, indeed, a monument of mercy. When a drunkard he could neither read or write, now he could do both. He thanked God who had put it into the hearts of the early friends of the Temperance Reformation to form a society in that city. They had spent hundreds of pounds in reclaiming such characters as himself, without receiving those returns of gratitude to which they were entitled; and in order to show that he was not insensible to his obligations—for he owed everything to them—he now begged to avail himself of so doing, by presenting five sovereigns, as a thank-offering, to be applied by the Finance Committee to the carrying on the cause.—He then presented his thank-offering to Mr. Russom, amidst the surprise and hearty applause of the audience.

The Rev. J. BURDER, A.M., expressed his delight at what he had witnessed that evening. He believed that no discovery during the last half century had done so much as this society, and as it progressed that would be more and more manifest.

Mr. J. BALL, general dealer; Mr. S. LOVELL, tanner; Mr. J. CHAPMAN, pressman; Mr. H. HOPKINS, flax-dresser; testified to the great good—physical, social, and moral—which they had derived from the adoption of teetotalism, after years' experience of the evils of intemperance.

Mr. T. HUDSON, Mr. B. D. COLLENS, and Mr. J. RUSSOM, briefly addressed the meeting; and after a cordial and unanimous vote of thanks had been presented to the Chairman, the interesting proceedings terminated.

READING, BERKS.

On the 6th of February Messrs. Huntley and Palmer gave a grand fete to those employed in their large biscuit-factory; and nothing could have gone off better. Two circumstances added to the interest of the meeting. One was the introduction of the newly-married Mrs. Palmer. The other was the presentation of a handsome silver cream-jug to each of the employers, which was entirely spontaneous on the part of the employed; and though the more immediate incentive to this unexpected token of good-will was the interesting event above referred to, yet the senior partner, equally with the other, shared in the good feeling of the employed. After a bountiful tea, some remarks were made by different speakers.—First, upon the Sick Fund in connexion with the factory, which, though the membership is entirely voluntary, is well supported. Afterwards, a project was mooted for establishing a library, reading-room, discussion-class, &c., and which was most heartily responded to. This, if carried out with the energy generally characteristic of the factory, must be productive of much good. The evening was further employed in performing some electrical experiments, which much interested as well as amused the company. Some amusing and instructive drawings were shown by a phantasmagoria, and which, at past ten o'clock, concluded an evening's entertainment, during which, if joyous faces and rapturous cheering may be taken as an index to the inner man, the utmost harmony and hilarity prevailed. Nearly 180, including a few visitors and the wives of the men, partook of the refreshments; and the substitution of sucking oranges for drinking healths enabled all to go home without the assistance of the police, or the attention of his worship the mayor and his brother magistrates in the morning. Both those who kindly provided, and those who heartily partook of the treat, departed highly gratified, and proved that it was perfectly easy to spend a very social evening without intoxicating liquors.

TROWBRIDGE.

A report of the proceedings of the Total Abstinence Society in this town has just reached us. Its operations, it appears, have resulted in the reclamation of many depraved characters, and in the preservation of many more. The members who have taken the pledge during the last year are 118, thirty-six of whom are between the ages of fourteen and eighteen.

EXMOUTH, DEVON.

The tenth annual tea-meeting of the Teetotal Society was held at the Albion-room in this place, on Wednesday, January 9, 1850; after which, a public meeting was held in the same room. The Rev. R. Clapson presided: and addresses were delivered by the Rev. J. Mercer, Mr. W. Shepard, jun., Mr. Grigg, Mr. Ward, Mr. D. and Mr. J. Hallet, of Ottery, on the objects and advantages of the society. At the conclusion some young persons signed the pledge.

SLEAFORD.

After a long time of distressing quietude, a pleasing change has been going on during the last six months. Early last year an eccentric, clever, working man, in this town, took the pledge. As he had been a hard drinker many years, his accession caused much pleasure. His fellow-workmen, being desirous of strengthening him in his new-formed resolution, likewise joined; and, to make the union more compact, they laid the foundation of a society, which, judging from the effects which have attended its operations thus far, appears calculated to do more good than any other plan which has been brought into operation in connexion with our efforts in diffusing the truthful, peaceful principles of heaven-born temperance.

These working men commenced by paying 3d. each weekly. They invited others to join them, and when the united contributions amounted to one pound, they drew for it; the ticket drawn entitled the drawer to the use of the money for twenty weeks, one shilling being paid back weekly during that period. At the end of the year above thirty members had joined £33 subscribed, and £85 lent amongst themselves, each 3d. share having produced 1s. 8d. interest. Thus encouraged, it was decided to hold a public tea-meeting, which took New-year's Eve, when the plan was brought more fully before the public. After tea, addresses were delivered by the members of the society, and about ten o'clock one of the most agreeable festivals ever held in Sleaford broke up, many of the company withdrawing to the watch-night at the Wesleyan Chapel.

At a subsequent meeting the number of members had reached seventy-four, not less than sixty of whom are truly reclaimed drunkards. Nearly 260 shares are taken. More than £20 has already been lent; checks have been printed for £500, which we expect will not be sufficient.

I would not omit to mention the service performed by our neighbour, John Blow, of Nocton, near Lincoln: he is a labouring man, working at railways, draining, thrashing, and the most laborious work which falls to that class, during the day, and at night walking miles to hold up the beauties of true temperance to the poor drunkards, being, in addition, a local preacher amongst the Primitives. He rarely holds a meeting without many signatures. WM. FAWCETT, sen.

SCARBOROUGH.

"Strong drink is causing in Scarborough poverty, disease, crime, and death." Such is the heading of a placard extensively posted upon the various corners of the town; and to check those great and impending evils, the members of the Scarborough Temperance Society are at the present moment using most praiseworthy efforts. The new year has been begun with earnestness of purpose. On the first day of 1850 was introduced, for the benefit of the unenrolled, that able advocate of temperance, the Hon. Judge Marshall, from America, whose address in the Odd Fellows' Hall was duly appreciated by his numerous hearers. Mr. James Teare, from Preston, delivered, in the same room, a series of lectures occupying a full week; and his pictures of vice, immorality, and intemperance, contrasted with sobriety and comfort, met with repeated applause from attentive and delighted assemblages. The result of these missions is most gratifying; upwards of 200 new members have been prevailed upon to take the pledge of teetotalism. In addition to these occasional lectures, weekly meetings are held alternately in the Bethel and George-street chapels, and addresses delivered by Mr. Thomas Whittaker, of the Temperance Hotel, and others, principally working men, who state from experience the benefits resulting from the abstinence from all intoxicating drinks. These meetings are well attended, and at the close additional names are handed in as members. C. MEADLEY.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

THE PUBLIC GOOD. Nos. I., II. London: C. Gilpin, Bishopsgate-street.

THIS is a new monthly Magazine, "devoted to the advocacy of great principles, the advancement of useful institutions, and the elevation of man." It is edited, we understand, by Mr. Pasmore Edwards, whose intercourse with the friends of temperance, peace, and universal brotherhood, will, no doubt, secure for it a circulation equal to its merit. It aims at noble objects, and applies itself to the accomplishment of them with an earnestness and eloquence which can scarcely fail to secure for it the patronage of every sincere philanthropist.

TEMPERANCE AND THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. A Sermon By the Rev. ASA MAHON, A.M. London: Paul-Chapterhouse-court.

THIS sermon forms No. 1,487 of "The Penny Pulpit;" it is therefore within the purchase of the poorest of our readers. We cordially recommend its very wide circulation, especially among professors of Christianity, to whom it offers some very solemn considerations.

WATERPROOF SHOES!—"If you wish to have a shoe of durable materials," exclaims the facetious Matthew Langsberg, "you should make the upper leather of the mouth of a hard drinker,—for that never lets in water."

INTEMPERANCE IN THE FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH CENTURIES.—Wines were so abundant in this country in the 14th century, that when King Richard II., after a long absence, was greeted by the inhabitants of London, the conduits in the streets through which the procession passed, were allowed to run with a variety of liquors.—Maitland.

LOQUACIOUSNESS OF DRUNKARDS.—Byron made the following characteristic note of a party at which Sheridan was present, and where the wine, as usual, was freely circulated:—First silent—then talky—then argumentative—then disputatious—then unintelligible—then altogether—then inarticulate—and then DRUNK!—Roid's Temperance Cyclopaedia.

DO INTOXICATING LIQUORS SHORTEN OUR DAYS?

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

VISITING a manufactory the other day, where a number of the men were Total Abstiners, I said to an intelligent operative who was talking to me, "I presume you are a Teetotaler?" "No, I am not," he replied, "but I only take what will do me good, and I can ask God's blessing on what I eat and what I drink." I told him that intoxicating liquors could do him no good, and therefore it would be as consistent to ask a blessing on prussic acid or a dose of laudanum. For though the poisons I had mentioned would work more rapidly, yet alcoholic drinks would inevitably shorten his days if he persevered in their use. "O, Sir," he responded, "I shall live as long as God pleases, and I cannot wish to live longer." I endeavoured to show him the fallacy of his conclusion, and left him to his reflections.

Now this sentence, "I shall live as long as God pleases," is a very common one; and therefore ought to be explained; because it is equally false, and equally true, which it will require no very learned disquisition to demonstrate.

I. IT IS FALSE to say, that a drinker of strong drinks can live as long as God pleases. JEHOVAH is often called our Father, Friend, Lawgiver, and Judge, and is said to take a deep interest in our welfare, and in the preservation of our lives. He guards us with the most watchful providential care; he has placed in our frame a thousand safety valves, to preserve us from premature death; he has given us the solemn command, "Thou shalt not kill;" and he excludes impenitent murderers from the kingdom of heaven. All the bounties of his hand show that he wishes our existence here to be prolonged; and one of the blessings conferred by "wisdom" on true religion, is "length of days." Viewed, then, as our Creator, Preserver, Lawgiver, and Judge, God cannot be pleased with anything that shortens our lives. He is represented in the Scripture as one of the most merciful of parents; he sympathizes with every pain we endure—whoso "toucheth" us "touches the apple of his eye;" and the least injury inflicted, without his express sanction, on the body of saint or sinner is viewed as an injury done unto himself. And as he is offended when we hurt one another, so he is displeased when we pursue a course in eating, drinking, sleeping, or anything else which prevents our living out all our days. It would therefore be absurd to suppose that he can be pleased and displeased with the same conduct; or that he should forbid murder, and yet smile with approbation on a course of life which violates his command. Much as he wishes to see his children in heaven, yet he requires none of them to be there until their work is done.

Now, it is a well known fact that intoxicating liquors shorten our lives. The word "intoxicating," means poisonous; and a poison is that which wars with life. Some tell us that various portions of our food are poisonous; but there is an absurdity on the face of the declaration. Food is that which feeds, and that which feeds is that which nourishes; but a substance cannot nourish and poison at the same time. In no instance then can poison be good for food. The same, also, may be said of medicine. Some of our moderate drinkers injure their digestion, torture their nerves, and break up their health; and then, by medical prescription, take some kind of poison, almost daily, to keep them alive; for they tell us that they should die but for these baneful remedies. Here seems to be a strong, but by no means an unanswerable case; for it is certain that the very physic which they take, though giving them relief, is doing them incalculable mischief, and, in fact, will hasten their dissolution. Our most skilful medical men are beginning to repudiate these drugs. Neither in health or sickness can it be said that persons live upon poisons. They are neither good for food, nor as medicine can they be used without injuring our frame.

It is said by one of the ancients that plain, uneducated people call "a spade a spade," and we ought all to become thus unsophisticated, and call "poisons, poisons," in whatever form they may be taken; and remember that a poison, instead of nourishing, aims at the destruction of our precious life; and, therefore, our merciful Creator cannot be pleased with this result. Alcoholic liquors, whether in the form of brandy, rum, gin, hollands, punch, foreign or home made wine, beer, porter, ale, or cider, are all poisonous, and we cannot persevere in their use without injuring, and eventually breaking up our health. They produce indigestion, and thus commence their ravages on an organ whose healthy operations are essential to the nourishment of our bodies; for, however much we may eat, it is only that part which is digested that does us any good. One might fill a volume with facts relating to the sad consequences of indigestion. We know that some take these drinks as a tonic to produce an appetite, and to aid the functions of the stomach, but there is an absurdity on the face of such a proceeding. For in the first place they injure the coats of the stomach; and secondly, it is well known that nothing but the gastric juice can digest food. The disease we are speaking of, however, is but one out of a host that might be mentioned, which proceed from intoxicating beverages, and hurry mankind to the tomb. Here there is no controversy. Distillers, brewers, and their agents, are the most effectual purveyors for the hospital, the union, the ragged-school, the gaol, and the grave-yard. Death must look on them as his best friend, and demons as their most effectual co-workers. The more pious they seem, and the louder their professions of religion and philanthropy, the more certainly they can destroy.

With these facts then before us, we venture to assert that God is not pleased with the use of intoxicating drinks, and, as they poison our frames and shorten our lives, no person who uses them can live as long as it pleases God. Contemplated as a Creator, Preserver, Father, Lawgiver, and Judge, alcohol must be hateful to him, because it kills his children. We have known some of the best of persons slay years before their time by these baneful liquors. The church was injured, the world was injured by their fall; for their death was an irreparable blow to the cause of truth, philanthropy, and religion. A drinker of alcohol does not live so long as God pleases.

II. Paradoxical as it may appear, we are about to affirm that there is a sense in which it may be said that a moderate drinker of intoxicating beverages does live as long as God pleases, and, therefore, the sentiment is true. A person once asked me, "If it was fixed when every man should die, or whether a man, by taking care of himself, could prolong his days." My friend wanted an answer at once, "Yes," or "No;" and seemed rather surprised when I told him that I believed both. I stated that there are certain fixed laws in nature by which our lives are lengthened or limited, and that these statutes of the natural world are well known to our Creator, and all His decrees accord with these immutable purposes. He, before-hand, sees that one man has by nature a strong constitution, and that he will take care of himself, and, consequently, will live to a good old age, and He decrees that he shall do so; so that here is a person whose days are fixed by the Eternal, and who, nevertheless, prolongs his life by temperance, cleanliness, frugality, and religion. But he foresaw another who becomes reckless; who does violence to the laws of life; who, in spite of all warning, will drink poisons daily, and, therefore, breaks up his health before his time; and, it is the pleasure of JEHOVAH that he shall die when he has thus exhausted his nature by stimulants. Nothing but a miracle could preserve him from premature death. He must have created for him new digestive organs, new intestines, a new liver, or new nerves and brain, or else he must fall a victim to his drink. Now, it is absurd to suppose that the Almighty will thus work miracles to counteract human folly. To do so, would be to encourage people to destroy themselves, and we can hardly suppose that the great and good Spirit will lend his power to pamper our vices, or pander to our wickedness.

It is, then, a part of the wise, righteous, and benevolent dispensations of our Creator, that folly and sin shall be punished. If a good man hangs himself, or drowns himself, or takes arsenic, or prepares himself by stimulants to commit such madness, it is the pleasure of JEHOVAH that the laws of health and disease shall take their course, and death naturally ensues. So, if a pious man, a man of talent and learning, and great usefulness, will, notwithstanding every warning and caution, use stimulants and break up his health, it is the righteous pleasure of the Judge of all that he shall depart from this world as soon as he has broken up his health, and rendered life, without a miracle, impossible. We have no more right to expect that a Christian man shall be shielded from the effects of alcohol than from those of arsenic or prussic acid; or that he may throw himself overboard, into the ocean, and expect a miracle to enable him to live under the waves. We may say to every drinker of these poisons—It is a fact that, eat what you will, or drink what you will, you shall live as long as God pleases; because it is a part of his pleasure that if you will do violence to your constitutions, and poison your frame, you must take the consequences.

It may be suggested that by these remarks we set the Deity against himself; but the objection is without force. If I am a fond parent, it is my pleasure that my children should be happy; but still, if any one of them goes wrong, my love to him that offends, and to the others who have not offended, will lead me to employ wholesome chastisement, and there is a sense in which it will be my pleasure to punish. The case between our Creator and the moderate drinker is much the same. Here is a person who violates the eternal laws of health. It is his pleasure to sin against his own life. He is killing himself by little and little, and his example is destroying others. To work a miracle in his behalf would be to encourage murder, and actually abet men to transgress the command "Thou shalt not kill;" and thus we should have the Divine law-giver forbidding sin in one breath, and encouraging it in the next. The only alternative was to reveal his pleasure, that his physical and moral laws should be obeyed to the very letter, but at the same time to let us know that if either be transgressed, it was his Divine determination to visit our iniquity with appropriate punishment.

The moderate drinker is guilty of a double offence. He violates the physical laws of health in his body, and in so doing transgresses the great moral law, "Thou shalt not kill;" hence, he sins against JEHOVAH as the governor of the natural and intellectual world, and will have verified, in his experience, "the soul that sinneth shall die." His body dies before its time, because he has, by drinking poisons, rendered it a mass of disease, and his soul will die also unless he has an interest in the Redeemer. It should never be forgotten that good men have shortened their days. Josiah was a pious king, and yet brought himself to an untimely grave, and thousands of others have done the same.

READER! are you a hard, or a moderate drinker? Remember that you are about to destroy yourself before your time. It is true you will "live as long as it pleases God;" but then the pleasure of which you seem to boast, is the pleasure of justice—the pleasure of a righteous Governor, who will not have the laws of the universe violated with impunity. It is his pleasure that you should have many days and see good, and that you should "come to the grave as a shock of corn fully ripe;" but it is also his stern purpose—a purpose as benevolent as it is stern—that if you will trample the great laws of physical life in the dust, you shall take the consequences.

The pleasure of JEHOVAH has a cheerful and a gloomy interpretation. Teetotalism shows its bright side—moderation its darker aspect; and, therefore, we besech our readers, as they value health, long life, and the smile of Heaven, to do themselves no harm, to avoid the poisonous bowl, and to come and help on the cause of Temperance, happiness, and longevity.

DRAM AND PAWN-SHOPS.

A pawnbroker once made the following reply to a friend of his, who expressed his surprise that he did not remove to a better situation: "I don't know a better, for it is within a very convenient distance from three dram-shops."

The various ways, the various shapes,
By which imprison'd man escapes
From life's enclosure, to the clime
That beams beyond the reach of time,
The narratives of every day
Clear to reflection's eye display.

The dram-shop is the spot that yields
More various ills than all the fields
Where grow the vices that disgrace
The existence of the human race.
The towns with beggars it supplies,
And almost fills the infirmaries;
Gives half their inmates to the jails,
And multiplies the hangman's veils.

Question the sturdy lab'rer, why
He wears the rags of poverty?
Wherefore his well-paid, daily task
Denies the bread his children ask?
It is the dram's alluring cup
That swallows all his earnings up.

Behold the squalid mother's breast
By the faint, sickly infant prest,
That ne'er the milk of nature gives—
Instead, the suckling's lip receives
The sad infusions, which at length
Destroys its puny, struggling strength,
Till life its every aid denies,
And the poor shrivel'd pigmy dies.

Bid the procurers mark the way
To make the incautious maid her prey,
The guards of virtue to remove,
And smooth the path to lawless love;
'Tis the same deleterious power
That crowns seduction's fatal hour.

Look at a shop whose windows show
On every side, above, below,
The pledge of many a former day,
Of pressing want the sad display.
Does it not wound each tender sense
To see the poor who issue thence,
As to the dram-shop they repair,
And spend their borrow'd pittance there?

Behold, the uplifted hand is seen—
What threat'ning looks, and angry mien;
While the foul execrating tongue
Does the fierce, clam'rous war prolong;
While e'en from female's lips proceed
The threat of many a bloody deed,
Thus virtue's drown'd, and health destroy'd,
For the vile habits seldom cloy'd.

How oft the sons of riot find
Pleasure the poison of the mind.
In life, by fire and famine, less
Sink to their graves than by excess.
'Tis Temperance gives the richest wealth,
Contentment, peace, and lasting health;
'Tis Temperance that forms the sage,
Is youth's best guardian, and the friend of age.

A HUMAN BOTTLE.—"There hangs a bottle of wine!" was the derisive exclamation of the Roman soldiery, as they pointed to the body of the drunken Bonosus, who, in a fit of drunken despair, hung himself upon a tree.

CHEAP PORT WINE.—The following is the analysis of a bottle of cheap "port wine":—Spirits of wine, 3 ounces; cider, 14 ounces; sugar, 1½ ounce; alum, 2 scruples; tartaric acid, 1 scruple; strong decoction of logwood, 4 ounces.—Mechanics' Magazine.

THE SUPPLY OF SPIRITS TO SEAMEN.

From the Times newspaper of February 6, we learn that a committee of flag-officers and captains, with Admiral Sir Byam Martin in the chair, is sitting at the Admiralty, to pronounce on the expediency of reducing the present allowance of grog which is daily served out to the seamen of her Majesty's navy; a fair compensation being made to them by a proportionate increase in the amount of their pay. On this the writer in the Times observes—"That the object which it is thus proposed to arrive at is a great and important desideratum, there can be no doubt, as it is a notorious fact that the majority of the punishments which take place in the British navy are either directly or indirectly the result of drunkenness; and the transition from the 'cheerful can' to the cat-o'-ninetails is but too frequently a consequence of the inevitable laws of cause and effect." The writer goes on to say—"There is something so natural, so familiar, to British ears, in the association of seamen with grog, that it would, perhaps, be a hopeless task to endeavour to prove that one is not a necessary adjunct to the other. Yet, in the American navy grog is unknown, or at least the exception and not the rule—the coffee or tea-pot is the sober substitute for the grog-can; and a solemn evidence that there is no disadvantage in the system—that the case, in fact, is the reverse—is the fact that in a service requiring all the energy, hardihood, and skill, that a seaman can possess, namely, the whale-fishery, the ships of the United States have confessedly driven the English out of the South Seas and the Pacific, and have monopolized that once flourishing and profitable branch of our commerce."

The following is appended:—

"Extract from the Statistical Reports on Health of the Navy. Published by the Authority of the Admiralty in 1841.

"Previously to 1825, half a pint of spirits, when spirits were issued, was allowed to every person serving in the fleet; at which time a salutary and judicious change was introduced by the reduction of the spirits to a quarter of a pint daily, and the allowance of tea and coffee instead. The practice formerly was, to divide the half-pint of spirits into two equal parts, one of which was issued at dinner-time, the other in the afternoon; now, instead of the afternoon allowance of spirits, tea or coffee is issued, and proves a safe, healthy, and satisfactory article of diet. When the change was introduced, it was apprehended by some that the seamen, if they did not resist, would be greatly dissatisfied with it, their love of grog being considered paramount to all considerations. It was, however, introduced without disturbance or general complaint; in a short time it became liked, and now it is believed that the majority of seamen serving, if it were put to them, would prefer the present to the former system. It is certain that the change has acted, and will act yet more, beneficially; for it is unnecessary to state, that one of the most active causes of disease and insubordination, with all its mischievous results, has been the intemperate use of spirituous liquors. It is no less certain, though not so evident (on which account partly, perhaps, it was so long allowed to continue in force), that the former practice was a sure method for laying the foundation and fostering habits of intemperance. To give a lad of 18 half a pint of spirits daily, with the precepts and example of his seniors, was tantamount to teaching drunkenness, for if he abstained from the allowance of grog, he was ridiculed as a milksop, but was praised for his manly and seamanlike qualities if he drank it with avidity. The quantity allowed produced unhealthy excitement, if not intoxication, under the influence of which he neglected duty or committed acts of insubordination, which entailed punishment, followed sometimes by repentance and amendment, but often by further indulgence, procuring spirits beyond his allowance by every means in his power, becoming reckless, a confirmed drunkard, and finally a burden and a pest to the service. Many diseases were the direct effect of such conduct, many more were excited, and all were aggravated by it. The habit and its numerous bad effects, are far from being extinguished, but they are much less than they were; and there is no reason to doubt that they will become progressively less, till pervading temperance, aided by other means of improvement, shall give to the navy a force, organic, moral, and intellectual, much greater than it has hitherto possessed."

TEETOTAL MEETINGS.

A correspondent, who is anxious that meetings for the advocacy of teetotalism should be numerous attended, has suggested that notices of a more attractive character than those usually issued should be adopted. He has sent the following as specimens, or illustrations of his meaning:—

BY INTEMPERANCE.

The good health, sober habits, reputation, and also a large amount of money, belonging to many persons in this place.

Whoever has found the same, and will give such information as may lead to their recovery, and will, for that purpose, attend the Temperance Meeting at _____ this evening, at eight o'clock, will be rewarded for their trouble."

"OH! YES. OH! YES. OH! YES.

FOUND!

BY TEMPERANCE.

Improved health and strength, a large quantity of wearing apparel, and a variety of domestic comforts, together with considerable sums of money.

Whoever has lost the same, and will attend the Temperance Meeting at _____, this evening, at eight o'clock, will receive such information as may lead to their recovery."

Our correspondent suggests that announcements of this description should be printed in bold type, as handbills, and circulated in the localities where meetings are intended to be held.

DEATH BY SPONTANEOUS COMBUSTION.

The following extraordinary occurrence is related in the Gazette des Tribunaux;—A few days ago, in a tavern near the Barriere de l'Etoile, a journeyman painter, named Xavier C—, well known for his intemperate habits, while drinking with some comrades, laid a wager that he would eat a lighted candle. His bet was taken; and scarcely had he introduced the flaming candle into his mouth, when he uttered a slight cry, and fell powerless to the ground. A bluish flame was seen to flicker about his lips, and, on an attempt being made to offer him assistance, the bystanders were horror-struck to find that he was burning internally. At the end of half an hour, his head and upper part of his chest were reduced to charcoal. Two medical men were called in, and recognized that Xavier had fallen a victim to spontaneous combustion. This conflagration of the human frame is frightfully rapid in its progress. Bones, skin, and muscle are all devoured, consumed, and reduced to ashes. A handful of dust, on the spot where the victim fell, is all that remains.

FRIENDS' TEMPERANCE SOCIETY, LIVERPOOL.

To the Editor of the Tectotal Times.

DEAR SIR,—During a somewhat lengthened period of active identity with the Temperance Movement, I have met with no event affording me more real satisfaction and encouragement than the interesting circumstance noticed in The Friend for this month, as follows:—

“To the Editor of The Friend.—The cause of Temperance is one of paramount importance, and one which seems so especially to belong to our religious society, that I feel inclined to mention a meeting held last week on that subject, with Friends resident in Liverpool and the neighbourhood. Temperance has, perhaps, scarcely received the attention which it deserves in this town among Friends, and it was, therefore, cause for congratulation to find about two hundred and fifty Friends assembled in the meeting-house, having been convened by circular. They were addressed by Edward Smith, of Sheffield, and Samuel Bowly, of Gloucester, whose addresses occupied at least two hours; and nothing could be more clear and forcible than the way in which the whole question, and more especially its bearings upon our Society, was stated by these Friends. At the conclusion of the meeting, upwards of fifty Friends signed an agreement to abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage; and the result has been the establishment of a Temperance Society among the Friends of Liverpool, which already numbers sixty-four members. I am thy friend, E. L.—Liverpool, 13th of Second Month, 1850.”

Many of your readers are, doubtless, aware that some of the most liberal contributors and earnest practical supporters of our great and good cause belong to the Society of Friends; and in this they display their good sense. Let the impure and turbulent effects produced upon body and mind, by “wine and strong drink,” be contrasted with the high and holy moral attitude assumed by “Friends,” as appertaining to their religious principles, and connecting therewith the quiet and peaceful discipline by which these principles are inculcated, matured, and developed; and it seems impossible to imagine any practice more evidently antagonistic to those principles, or more detrimental to that discipline, than the practice of using these deleterious, disturbing, and defiling compounds.

To witness a Friend (the writer has been pained by witnessing more than one) under the existing or stupefying influence of inebriating drink, is to behold a human being in a position of peculiar and fearful danger, and incurring, by such sorrowful example, a most perilous responsibility. Viewing, then, the physical, social, and moral mischiefs resulting from the drinking usages of our country on the one hand, and on the other the simplicity, purity, and loveliness of the doctrines and discipline of Friends, it is no marvel so many stirring, steadfast, Temperance Reformers, are to be found in that esteemed community; the only wonder is there should be one individual exception.

Yours respectfully,

South-street, Lambeth, WILLIAM SPRIGGS.
March 12, 1850.

TO MAKE BEER SMART!—To give beer a cauliflower head, “beer-heading” is used, composed of green vitrol, alum, and salt. Alum likewise gives a smeeck of age to beer, and is penetrating to the palate.—S. Child.

FEMALE INFLUENCE FATALLY EXERTED.

“Just before I left America, I listened to an address from a distinguished temperance lecturer, who related the history of a young man that was a fellow-student of his when at college. This young man, said he, was a total abstainer during the whole of his college life—and when they had completed their collegiate education they settled together in the same place. The lecturer observed, that probably there was not another man in the United States with such conversational powers as this young man had, and on this account he was much valued in society. He became engaged in marriage to one of the first ladies in the state. This lady and himself were invited to a party that was held in the neighbourhood—he was asked to partake of the intoxicating cup, as he had frequently been at other parties, but refused, and the reasons that he would assign for his conduct usually excited the greatest interest in the minds of all of all present; so that he was frequently asked to drink for the sole purpose of drawing out one of his interesting replies. At this party a number of ladies were together, and some of them expressed their opinion that it was out of the power of all the ladies in the United States to induce this young man to drink. Before you say that, said the young woman to whom he was engaged in marriage, let me try my power upon him. She left the room and asked that young man to take a glass of wine; at first he refused, but she threw such an influence around him that he consented to drink, and then he drank with others, and that very night he went to bed intoxicated. From that time onward he gave himself up to the intoxicating cup. At last the father of that young woman—although he himself frequently drank to intoxication—said to his daughter, you must not marry a drunkard; and you must dismiss that young man from our house. She accordingly told him that his visits would no longer be acceptable. The young man left and went to reside in a neighbouring state. For several years subsequent to this, said the lecturer, I never heard nor saw anything of him, and I myself removed to a distant state. When I had been settled there a few years the parents of this young woman and herself came to reside in the same place where I was. I felt a fervent desire to ask her if she ever heard from the young man referred to, but by sense of delicacy forbade. One evening a large party was held at the house of the parents of this young woman: there was great hilarity among the guests who were drinking freely, and dancing to the sound of music. I observed that none were merrier than that young woman, but when I looked at her countenance I could read the state of her heart: I knew that there were recollections that destroyed her peace. While the music was going on we heard a most unearthly noise in the streets: it was so loud and so unearthly as to attract universal attention: it continued, and in a little time the music desisted, and the whole company were in a listening attitude, and wondering what it could possibly be. Just at that moment the door was burst open and an individual threw himself at full length upon the floor, in the midst of the assembled company, shrieking out in a most fearful tone, ‘O God, save me from the fiends! O God, save me from the fiends!’ I took the arm of that young woman, who happened to be standing near me, and moved up with her to see who the terrible object on the floor could be. Just as we came near him, he happened to look up! Oh, said the young woman, take me back to my seat, I am sick. For the first time since they parted years ago, she met the countenance of that young man who had been her lover. He was there mad with delirium tremens, haunted by fiends. In two days from that time I followed him to the grave. I heard the clods of the valley sound upon his coffin; I left him in the silent tomb. The lecturer continued:—Two years ago I heard from that young woman; her father and mother had both died broken-hearted, and she had been for twelve years an inmate of a lunatic asylum; and if she is living she is there yet. And all this misery was the result of one act, by which a fellow-creature had been tempted to violate his conscience and partake of the intoxicating cup. Now, who would be thus willing to tempt a fellow-creature? And, let me ask, can you act upon the principle of temperate drinking without being a source of temptation?”—From “Temperance and the Christian Church,” a Sermon by the Rev. Asa Mahan, A.M., just published.

PHYSIC—for the most part, is nothing else but the substitution of exercise or temperance.

REPEAL OF THE BEER-SHOP ACT.

THE serious and prompt attention of our readers is earnestly requested to this important movement. Meetings should at once be called, for the purpose of supporting, by petitions to Parliament, the Earl of Harrowby's motion for a gradual repeal of the Beer-shop Act. It can be demonstrated that the Beer-shop system is one of the principal causes of the great increase of crime in this country. The Bill was introduced under the mistaken idea that it would benefit the working classes; how such an idea could ever have entered the mind of any enlightened philanthropist, or patriot, it is difficult to conceive; it is certain that the Bill has not answered that end, and that, in a variety of ways, it has proved extensively injurious to that class, and also to the community generally. We know that some of the members of teetotal societies object to the anti-Beer-shop movement, on the ground that it affects but one phase of intemperance, and that it seems to admit, by implication at least, that intoxicating drinks may be sold with impunity, and without fear of injury, in other places and under other circumstances. We, however, have no hesitation in applying ourselves conscientiously to the reduction of this particular form of the evil, because we are fully persuaded that if the number of beer-shops can be reduced, and the law permitting the sale of beer in such houses can be repealed, very essential service will be rendered to the community. A Committee of Inquiry in the House of Lords has been appointed, and the Earl of Harrowby has declared his intention to bring in a bill decreeing that no future licenses shall be granted for more beer-houses, and that the present licenses shall not be renewed. Petitions containing a prayer to that effect should at once be introduced at our meetings, signed, and sent for presentation.

A REAL NOBLEMAN.

In the Somerset Gazette we find the following notice this week:—

"TAUNTON AND SOMERSET HOSPITAL.—We are desired by the secretary to make the following correction in the report for 1849:—In the list of donations, that of £5 5s., from a magistrate of the county, should have been announced in the following terms, viz.—'From a magistrate in the county of Somerset, who, being a teetotaler, gives the fee of five guineas to the Taunton and Somerset Hospital, instead of to the Magistrates' Wine Fund. 10th Oct. 1849.' This innovation is said to have caused a great sensation among the magistracy."

We think it very likely that such a rare and noble innovation would make a sensation among the magistracy. The exposure is dreadful and two-fold. The idea of magistrates having a "Wine Fund," extorted from new members; and the baseness, to boot, of concealing the true reason why the money was given to the infirmary, and not to them!

We are happy to announce that the gentleman who acted this truly noble part towards destroying a flagrant abuse was Sir Walter C. Trevelyan, of Nettle-Comb, Somersetshire. He and his brother, Arthur Trevelyan (also well known for his high-minded liberality), embraced the Temperance cause so early as 1831. Finding it hopeless and impracticable, they made the transition to Abstinence, and have continued to this hour its staunchest supporters, as such courageous opposition now quoted strikingly evinces.

INTEMPERANCE AND CRIME.

The following is a copy of a letter received from the chaplain of the prison of Glasgow, in reply to one addressed to him by Mr. T. B. Smithies:—

"Prison of Glasgow, March 1, 1850.

"DEAR SIR,—Yours of 19th Feb. came duly to hand. You are desirous to know my experience as to the exciting causes of crime in these quarters. One short word embraces the burden of the whole matter. Drink! Drink! You are aware that, of late years, there has been a great influx into Glasgow of Irish emigrants, the majority of whom are pauper and destitute; not a few of these find their way to our establishments from the pressure of want. But of our population properly designated "criminal," such as the felon, the burglar, the robber, &c., &c., almost all are the victims, directly or indirectly, of intemperance. Of at least twenty thousand prisoners, including juveniles, with whom I have conversed in private during the last four years, I am certain that the professedly teetotal portion of them have been under the 1-500th part of the whole.

AMERICA.

The American Temperance Society was formed in 1826. In 1835 there were in the country 8,000 Temperance Societies, with 1,500,000 members; 4,000 distilleries had been stopped; 8,000 traders had ceased to sell ardent spirits; more than 1,200 vessels were navigated without using spirits. In excursions through all the six States of New England, and in a great part of the State of New York, while I saw everywhere an industrious, thriving, and orderly population, and abundant proofs also of the general diffusion of intelligence, I did not see a single person intoxicated, a single beggar, or even a single case of extreme destitution.

Captain Hall, fifteen years ago, complained that the people in stage-coaches drank so much brandy as to be quite offensive.

Mr. Dickens, in 1842, complained of temperance being so general, that, on more than one occasion, he could not obtain a glass of brandy at a public-house.

The writer, in 1843, dined at some fifty different tables d'hôte, in different States, some of them of the first class, with abundant specimens of French cookery; and he can confidently say, that of all the guests at these fifty tables, not one in ten drank anything but water.—American Facts, by George Palmer Putnam, London, 1845.

INDUCEMENTS TO SOBRIETY.—The Inspector of Prisons for Scotland, Northumberland, and Durham, in a recent report, in which he traces a very large amount of crime in this country to drunkenness, throws out the following suggestion:—"The sobriety in many parts of the continent appears to me to be caused by the greater prevalence than with us of physical pleasures, such as music and dancing, the abundance of cheap wine of so mild a kind that it can scarcely intoxicate, and the prevalence of social and mental pleasures of a sort that can be enjoyed by all classes, such as access to public walks, picture galleries, &c. In this country, some of these innocent and rational pleasures, instead of being encouraged, are discountenanced; and the consequence is, that many persons who would otherwise engage in them fall into the debasing indulgence of drunkenness; or, if they resolutely seek the other better pleasures, they are often driven in quest of them to the houses of disreputable persons, instead of enjoying them in the open day, in the presence and with the approval and sympathy of respectable friends and neighbours. Among boys and girls in manufacturing towns this want of innocent and rational amusement is a fertile source of crime. The spontaneous delight of children in dancing and singing seems to show that music and the dance are natural pleasures, and in themselves perfectly innocent, and that to endeavour to suppress them is to oppose the intentions of an all-wise and benevolent Creator; but the purest gratifications may, by the discountenance of the best educated and most moral classes, be rendered corrupting, by causing them to be indulged in by stealth, and with the idea that they are sinful. Instead of attempting to uproot such pleasures, these classes of society would, in my opinion, do good service to morality by encouraging them, within due bounds, by their presence and support."

TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION, EXETER-HALL.

The Sixth Monthly Temperance Demonstration was held in Exeter-hall, on Monday evening last, the 4th inst. The attendance was, if possible, larger than on any previous occasion; and on the platform we observed, amongst other friends of the cause, D. D. Gourley, M.D.; Rev. Jabez Burns; W. Janson, Esq.; W. Oxley, M.D.; Rev. W. Morton; Rev. J. Doxsey; Dr. Pinching; G. Cruikshank, Esq.; Rev. Benjamin Parsons; Carl Olof Brink, LL.B., Secretary to the Royal Board of Prisons in Sweden; Messrs. J. P. Edwards, J. Taylor, jun., of Birmingham, J. W. Green, R. Warner, &c.

JOHN CASSELL, Esq., the Treasurer, was called to the chair.

The proceedings commenced by the SECRETARY reading apologies for non-attendance, accompanied by expressions of attachment to the great cause, from Dr. Marsh, of Leamington; and Messrs. Charles Gilpin, Joseph Brotherton, T. Beaumont, J. S. Buckingham, and Richard Cobden.

The CHAIRMAN then rose, and said they had now arrived at the close of the series of meetings which had been arranged; but, from the vast importance of the subject, and the intense interest which had been excited in its favour, he trusted that, if their lives were spared till next autumn, they would commence another equally vigorous campaign (cheers). They had every reason to be satisfied with the results of the past (hear). The attention of thousands who had never before considered the question had been awakened to the great social interests involved in the success of their great movement; while their friends, in all parts of the kingdom had been stimulated by their example, and had arranged for similar demonstrations in their several localities. The subject proposed for discussion on the present occasion embraced the whole question for which, as the friends of temperance, they contended—namely, "that intoxicating liquors are not essential to health or comfort; and that their entire abandonment would be promotive of the physical, intellectual, social, and religious condition of the community" (cheers). To enunciate such a proposition as that would not, as formerly, incur for them the charge of fanaticism or of wild-dreaming enthusiasm, because it was beginning to be understood that not only ardent spirits, but even our national beverage, ale, was incapable of affording to the system that strength and stimulus they were once thought to possess (hear). The public, and especially the working classes, had once been deluded and cheated with the idea that they were physically benefited by the use of these drinks; whereas it was now proved that in every gallon of ale there were seven pints of water, eight ounces of spirit, and the very smallest portion of nutriment, and that of the coarsest and most indigestible kind (hear); while the use of it, instead of repairing the strength, tended to enervate the system, to dethrone the intellect, to brutalize the mind, to abridge the comfort of the labouring classes, and to draw upon them the appellation which had been frequently employed against them of "the swinish multitude" (hear). Happily, however, for them, they had begun to open their eyes, and having discovered their error, many of them had come forward on that platform to declare, that not only were those drinks unnecessary, but that the total disuse of them was conducive to health, strength, and domestic happiness (cheers). He trusted that their friends would still exert themselves to promote and maintain a healthy public sentiment on this question (hear). A few years ago it would have been impossible to find members of parliament or gentlemen in the literary world to come forward in their cause. When he (the chairman) first became a teetotaler, the principles of the society were confined almost entirely to Lancashire, and scarcely a minister of the Gospel could be found willing to espouse it; but now it had spread through the length and breadth of the land, and hundreds of ministers were ranged on their side (cheers). Richard Cobden, too, at a meeting at Bradford, had borne his testimony to the principles and value of their association; and they had also in their favour the zeal and ability of such men as Colonel Thompson and Joseph Brotherton, who had been practical teetotalers for a number of years (applause). To the working classes he would say, in conclusion, that whilst much was being devised for their social improvement, the means of their elevation were in their own hands (hear). Let them abandon intoxicating drinks altogether, and the first great step was taken for their future health and happiness (hear). The time he believed was coming when the unfortunate drinking customs of the country would pass away, and the Babylons of intemperance crumble into dust, and then the friends of freedom and truth would meet in that or some other spacious hall to raise the glad cry of victory over that which had proved itself alike the foe of God and man (loud cheers).

P. W. PERFIT, Esq., rose to say a few words in opposition to the intemperate habits of too many in his native land, and that not merely because those habits led to the destruction of health, life, and property, and made men politically slaves, but because they blasted and withered their immortal minds, and degraded them beneath the reptile which crawls with its belly on the ground (hear). The mind of man was not made to bow down and become subservient to the gratification of mere animal appetites—to become the serf of sensual desires and passions—to live regardless of the interests of its fellow-immortals, and, unconscious or careless of the bright and beautiful future which was opening before it; but to walk erect and nobly beneath the smile of its maker and its God, and so to live as to leave behind a bright ray of goodly influence and example, which should be as a lamp to lighten the pathway of future generations (cheers). There were higher gratifications than those of sense, and mind was given to enable man to look back and hold converse with the great and noble spirits who have passed away, and to look onwards and catch a glimpse of the serene and bright home beyond him (hear, hear). That mind could not only act upon the present, but it could influence the future; it could call up from their graves the best spirits of the past, and hold communion with "the mighty dead;" it could make its own nature sublime, and when it quitted this world, leave some footprints on the track of time. But strong drink debased, and enervated, and destroyed that faculty, and made man a brute (hear). The celebrated Dr. Percy proved beyond all question that it was absolutely impossible for a man to take alcoholic liquors into the stomach without disturbing the nervous system and interfering with its regular action, and that they not only acted upon the brain in that way, but also roused all the lowest and worst passions which it was intended should be subdued and kept in check. He need only refer to a Burns and a Sheridan (hear). He called upon them, therefore, although they might not have suffered from the evil in their own persons, to do a man's part, and strive to remove the danger from the path of others, even as the champions of liberty and truth in past ages laid down their lives to secure those blessings to the generations which should come after them (cheers). In the struggle for political liberty, too, he called upon the working classes to remember that, if they were only true to themselves, they would present so powerful a phalanx against their oppressors that none would dare to act unjustly by them; and even should they fail in obtaining for themselves the franchise which they sought, they would exhibit to the world the spectacle of a noble race of men, who, though enchained by others, were too great to enchain themselves (cheers). What was wanted in the present day were, men who would boldly say, "If you will not give us our rights as citizens, you shall not deny to us the right of being sober men—men such as God loves, and whom the truly great delight to honour." Let them strive to develop their better natures, abstain from everything likely to impair the sensibility of that mind which God had given them, and to be useful in their several spheres—so that when called upon to pass into another world, they might be enabled to say, after bidding a brotherly adieu to those they loved on earth, and whilst angel wings were waiting to bear them upwards to their God, "Father, the talent which thou gavest me was not hidden in a napkin, but employed to benefit and bless the world" (cheers).

MR. JAS. TAYLOR, jun., of Birmingham, the originator of the "Freehold Land Societies," next addressed the meeting, and gave a graphic account of his rescue from the impending ruin of a drunkard's life. The best document he ever signed in his life was the Birmingham Temperance Pledge (hear). To his connexion with that society he owed all the provident habits which he had acquired, all the property he possessed, the happiness of his domestic circle, which he could only compare to "a little heaven below," and his union with a Christian church (cheers). In former times he was accustomed to stand upon public-house benches, and declaim against all governments as the oppressors of the people; but since his conversion to teetotalism, he had found out that a drunkard is his own worst oppressor (hear). He had discovered that the way to political improvement and elevation was the temperance society (cheers). He had gone through its portals, and had become a voter in seven counties (loud cheer-). Before he signed the pledge, everything he possessed in the world was not worth the half of a five pound note. His late wife, too, adopted the temperance principles, and so staunchly did she uphold them, that when on her death bed wine was prescribed for her, the firm reply she made was, "I will never suffer such things to come into this house; I am prepared to depart, and leave my children to the care of a sober father, rather than admit wine and live with a drunken husband" (cheers). Speaking of the present cry for the extension of the franchise, he confessed to a serious doubt of the sincerity of those who raised the cry, while they were willing to give to the landlords what would help them to a vote (hear). Of the £19,000 invested in the Birmingham Freehold Land Society, he believed that as much as £15,000 had been rescued from the public house (cheers). It was calculated that if the thirty millions annually spent in strong drinks by the working classes were applied to such a purpose, there would not be in three years a single unenfranchised person in Great Britain or Ireland (cheers). The price they were paying in Birmingham for freehold land, was 13d. per yard; or, in other words, a quart of ale for half-a-yard (laughter). He suggested that men frequenting public-houses, should ask the landlord not for "a pot of fourpenny," but for "four feet six inches of freehold" (hear and laughter). The idea of a man swallowing in one night as much as five or six yards of solid earth (hear, hear)! Scores of men, he knew, who had left off drinking their freeholds and swallowing their votes, who could now take their partners with them to enjoy the luxury of a freehold garden (hear). It was not an uncommon thing in Birmingham to be asked to take a freehold cabbage, or a freehold potato (laughter and cheers). In conclusion, he observed that all that he possessed in this world, and the hope he entertained of a happy immortality, he owed, under God's blessing, to teetotalism (loud cheers).

The CHAIRMAN bore testimony to the valuable exertions of the last speaker in the cause of temperance.

Rev. Dr. BURNS, in corroboration of some portions of Mr. Taylor's argument, stated that there was in the Hall a person who, nine years ago, was not worth 5s., but who, by becoming a teetotaler, had acquired a vote in three counties. He referred to a solid argument, nearly two yards long and eighteen stone in weight, of the name of John Plato, of Chesterfield (laughter and cheers).

GEORGE CRUIKSHANK, Esq., on rising, was loudly cheered. He said they were called upon that night to give their evidence as to the truth of the statement put forth in the bills. In his own person he could answer all those points (hear). Physically and mentally he felt that he was a better man since he became a teetotaler; that he was also a better social being; and that his religion had more sincerity and truth in it than it ever possessed before. He believed that it was to his penitence he was indebted for the kind reception the meeting had given him (cheers). He thanked them for their cordiality, and assured them that the conviction of being able to render some slight benefit to his brethren in that good cause, had alone induced him that evening to leave the retirement which his profession imposed upon him (hear). His profession was generally understood to be that of a humorist, and certainly in that department he had taken, and hoped he had also afforded, delight; but he had also endeavoured to show occasionally that he could be serious. He could assure them that he was serious at the present time, and having been a teetotaler for three years and a half, he thought he might add that he was perfectly sober (laughter). He had often been asked to give some account of the origin of his sketches of "the bottle" (hear, and cheers). The fact was, that although he had never entertained the idea of becoming a teetotaler, he had been very early impressed with the frightful extent and consequences of drunkenness, and had endeavoured, some years ago, to check it. He referred to his "Gin Juggernaut," in which he endeavoured to draw a comparison between the Hindoo deity, before whose wheels so many devotees prostrated themselves and were crushed, and the English god, at whose shrine so many voluntarily became victims (hear). It was frightful to think that in a Christian country such a thing should exist, and that the idol of India should cause the sacrifice of so many less than the idol of Britain. Many of the scenes which he had depicted in his work of "The Bottle" were witnessed by him in early life (hear). After alluding to the passages of Scripture which were supposed to sanction the use of strong drinks, he observed, the object of that meeting was to effect a great moral change in the condition of humanity. He rejoiced that it was gaining ground every day, and he held that it was every man's duty to the utmost of his power to help forward so desirable a consummation (cheers).

After some remarks from the chair,

Mr. J. W. GREEN then read the following address:—

"The first series of MONTHLY MEETINGS in EXETER HALL for the advocacy of Temperance, having been brought to a termination, the committee appointed to conduct them take this opportunity for presenting a brief statement of the origin and results of the movement.

"In the course of conversations which took place in the autumn of last year, as to the state of the Temperance Movement in the country, and more especially in the Metropolis, it was suggested by Mr. JOHN CASSELL, whose long connexion with that movement qualified him to give suitable advice, that a series of public meetings on a large scale, in which addresses on specific topics should be delivered by intelligent advocates, and the circulation of the reports of such meetings through the medium of the public press, would be at once the most efficient and the most economical mode of advancing the Temperance Reformation. A committee of twelve gentlemen was formed, when it was proposed to hold six such meetings in Exeter Hall, one on the first Monday evening in six successive months. To encourage the committee, Mr. Cassell generously proposed to assist this movement by a donation of £25, and also to employ his personal influence with others friendly to the Temperance cause, to induce them to subscribe towards the required fund.

"A circular, detailing the plan, and appealing for funds, was addressed to friends in various parts of the kingdom. To this prompt and generous replies were received. Exeter-hall was then engaged, and, on the first Monday evening in October, the first meeting was held, and the committee were cheered by witnessing a crowded hall. Other five meetings have regularly followed. The subjects successively brought before the audience have been:—

"I.—The Temperance Reformation, in its bearing upon the moral, political, and social elevation of the working classes. The speakers were, the chairman, Mr. J. Cassell; the Rev. Benjamin Parsons, Thomas Beggs, Esq., Mr. Robert Lowery, and Mr. T. A. Smith.

"II.—The influence of the Temperance Reformation on the extension of religion at home and abroad, and the moral obligation of professing Christians to promote it. Speakers: the Chairman, the Rev. W. Morton; Mr. D. G. Paine, the Rev. S. Dunn, and the Rev. J. Kirk, of Edinburgh.

"III.—The claims of the Temperance Movement upon the teachers and friends of Sabbath-schools. Speakers: the Chairman, the Rev. Dr. Burns, the Rev. James Sherman, Mr. T. B. Smithies, who had collected for the occasion a large number of authentic returns from prisons and penitentiaries, for the purpose of showing that a considerable majority of the inmates of those places had received instruction in Sunday-schools. Statistics equal in importance to these have rarely been laid before the public. That meeting was addressed also by the Rev. Asa Mahan, President of Oberlin College, in the United States of America, in a speech which will not soon be forgotten.

"IV.—Intoxicating liquors not necessary for working men, either to assist them in their occupation, however laborious, or to promote their health and happiness. Speakers: Joseph Sturge, Esq., of Birmingham, in the chair; and Messrs. Parker, M'Cormack, West, M'Lachlen, Phipps, M'Currie, Stearne, Wood, Robnson, Mann, Reynolds, and Grove; also William Janson, Esq., and Mr. John Cassell.

"V.—Juvenile Depravity: its causes, consequences, and appropriate remedies. Speakers: Benjamin Rotch, Esq., chairman, one of her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex, who brought with him four other magistrates; Mr. Jackson, Thomas Beggs, Esq., the Rev. Thomas Spencer, A.M., the Rev. Benjamin Parsons, and Mr. Woodward, one of the county magistrates.

"VI.—Intoxicating liquors not essential to health or comfort, and their entire abandonment promotive of the physical, intellectual, social, and religious welfare of the community.

(The proceedings of this evening will be seen from the report of which this address forms a part.)

"The committee rejoice to state that the meetings have all been well attended, and the addresses delivered intelligent and effective. It has been demonstrated that there is a large amount of public feeling enlisted on the side of total abstinence; a powerful impetus has been given to the Temperance Movement in the metropolis, and the dormant energies of many societies and individuals have been roused into action; whilst, through the medium of a large portion of the public press, reports of the meetings have been very extensively circulated; and many of the provincial societies have adopted a similar mode of attracting large audiences and with marked success. The invitations sent by the committee to gentlemen engaged in most of the great movements of the day, though they have not in every case succeeded to bring those gentlemen on the platform, have, nevertheless, drawn from them acknowledgments of the soundness and beneficial character of our principles, cordial wishes for our success, and, in most instances, contributions to our funds.

"The committee take this public opportunity of tendering their cordial and grateful thanks to those generous friends by whose liberal contributions they have been assisted to carry out their designs, and the more because some of these contributors are not personally identified with the Temperance Movement, and have claims upon them in the important societies of which they are active members. They present thanks also to Richard Dykes Alexander, Esq., of Ipswich, for large grants of tracts for circulation at these meetings; to those gentlemen who in their addresses have so ably demonstrated the necessity and the advantages of the Temperance Movement; to those members of various metropolitan societies who have contributed their personal services on the occasion of these meetings; and, finally, to that portion of the public press by whom the proceedings have been recorded and spread throughout the kingdom and throughout the globe.

"As to the pecuniary liabilities incurred by this movement, it was thought that about £200 would cover the expenses; that sum has, however, proved insufficient. The cost of the six meetings, including the hire of the Hall, the advertising the meetings, printing and posting bills, obtaining reports, circulating several hundred copies of various newspapers, and a few incidental expenses, is about £250. The amount of money received and promised is about £200, so that when all the demands are met, the treasurer will be in advance about £50. It is hoped that this balance will be wiped away, or at least, very considerably reduced, this evening.

"It now remains for the friends of the Temperance Movement to say, whether the course so auspiciously commenced is to be continued. If this large audience should say, 'Nay'—then many expectations, justly excited, will be grievously disappointed. If, however, as is most rational to suppose, this audience says, 'Go on!' then they must assist in furnishing the necessary means. The committee confidently believe that this will be the unanimous response, and on their own part cheerfully pledge themselves to new exertions. They are of opinion that there has never been a period in the history of the Temperance Movement in which the advocacy of the principle of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks was listened to by large audiences with so much attention, or in which that advocacy was so likely to be followed with marked success. If the adherents to the cause be true to their principles, and support the advocacy of them with a zeal and a liberality proportioned to their importance, they may confidently reckon,—not only upon large and attentive audiences, but upon a very considerable augmentation of their numbers, and, as the result, a large increase of individual comfort—of domestic happiness—and of national prosperity."

DANIEL HOPKINS from the body of the hall suggested that they should each subscribe one shilling to liquidate the remaining liability. Several subscriptions were announced, and a collection made.

The CHAIRMAN stated that, in consequence of the meeting being favoured with the presence of Carl Olof Brink, Esq., LL.B., Secretary to the Royal Board of Prisons in Sweden, the committee would submit for adoption by the meeting an address to the King of Sweden, who, he was given to understand, was a pledged teetotaler (loud cheers). He believed also that her Majesty the Queen of Sweden patronised that great movement, and had honoured the temperance cause by attending a great gathering in the capital to advocate its interests (renewed cheers).

Mr. GREEN then read the following address:—
TO HIS MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY, OSCAR, KING OF SWEDEN.

SIRE,—As advocates, friends, and practical observers of Temperance, now assembled in public meeting, in one of the largest halls of the Metropolis of the British dominions, we desire to avail ourselves of the welcome presence among us of Your honoured and esteemed subject, CARL OLOF BRINK, Esq., LL.B., now engaged in the benevolent mission, as Secretary to the Royal Board of Prisons in Sweden, of collecting information as to the statistics and treatment of criminals in this country,—to approach Your Majesty, through Your learned Commissioner, with feelings of the most profound veneration and respect.

We have heard, Sire, of the active, benevolent, and efficient interest which Your Majesty and Your beloved Consort have taken in the measures, suggested and originated by Your own anxious care for the welfare of Your subjects, to abate among them the evils of intemperance, than which no greater curse can afflict a nation; and the removal of which would confer upon every community in which it could be effected, greater blessings than any other single act or change that could be imagined.

We desire, therefore, first to offer to Your Majesty our humble, but sincere, congratulations, and most heartfelt thanks; and, next, to assure Your Majesty of our fervent prayers to Almighty God, in whose hands are the destinies of nations, and the hearts of the kings who govern them, that He would in his wisdom and mercy prolong Your Majesty's life, strengthen Your hands, and confer His divine blessing on every effort which You may continue to make for the promotion of so noble and so holy a cause.

For many years past our attention has been given to this great question; and the result of all our experience, under every variety of circumstance, has been, that the use of intoxicating drinks is productive, in this and in every other nation in which they are consumed, of a larger amount of disease, poverty, and crime, than all other causes combined. This conviction has been strengthened by the Evidence taken officially before a Committee of the British House of Commons in the year 1834, before which a great number of witnesses from every part of the kingdom, and of all ranks and classes, were examined; and the Report of that Committee (of which we take the liberty to forward a copy for Your Majesty's acceptance and perusal) gives the deliberate sanction of some of the most eminent of our legislators to the views which this Evidence confirms.

We are happy, however, to be able to state to Your Majesty, that since the publication of that Report, the most intelligent, benevolent, and pious portion of the British community have been awakened to a solemn sense of their duty, and the responsibility under which they lie to God and to their own consciences in this matter; and have, therefore, by the organization of temperance societies, by the establishment of temperance journals and public meetings, and by every other available, legitimate, and honourable mode, done their utmost to arouse the nation to a sense of its danger, from the fearful flood of intemperance that threatened its destruction.

It has pleased the Almighty to bless their labours in this respect with so much success, that there are now, happily, in England, Scotland, Ireland, India, and the British colonies, several millions of individuals who habitually and steadily abstain from the use of all intoxicating drinks; and wherever the result of the practice is inquired into, and made known, we have the satisfaction of learning that it has been greatly beneficial to the health and enjoyment of those who have adopted it; while it has everywhere abated disease, poverty, and crime, throughout the community at large, and promoted, in a corresponding degree, the best interests of religion, morality, order, loyalty, and good faith; as well as feelings of benevolence, kindness, desire of peace, and the exercise of good-will to men.

Believing most firmly in the efficacy of similar means to produce similar results in every country into which they may be introduced, and seeing over all the United States of North America an exact correspondence of events in this respect with those which have occurred in Great Britain, we ardently desire their universal adoption; and we, therefore, feel additionally grateful to Your Majesty for having set so noble an example, which, we trust, will soon be followed by other crowned heads in Europe, with the same beneficial effects.

Once more we reiterate our earnest prayer for the prolonged life, health, happiness, and honourable renown of Your Majesty and Your beloved Consort, during the term of Your earthly dominion; and that You may both be rewarded in heaven with that immortal crown whose lustre will never diminish, nor its glory pass away.

Signed in the name and on the behalf of the public meeting of upwards of three thousand friends of Temperance, assembled at Exeter-hall, in London, on Monday, the 4th day of March, 1850.

JOHN CASSELL, Chairman.

D. D. GOURLEY, M.D., moved the adoption of the address. He had much pleasure in doing so, for he believed that it was beginning at the beginning (hear). When the sovereign set the example, surely the people would follow it. He hoped a similar example would soon be set in our own land (hear). If they had the principles of total abstinence diffused through the country, other reforms would necessarily follow. When they looked abroad and saw the vast amount of disease, and wretchedness, and death, was it not time that they began diligently to inquire for the cause? From the statistics of mortality, it was proved that the average length of life in England was forty-five years. How was that? It was not a natural state of things. It must therefore be that the great masses of society were under the influence of something highly injurious to life and health. Amongst those baneful influences was intemperance (hear). The human stomach, instead of being used as the receptacle of food, designed to repair the wear and tear continually going on in the system, was converted into the poison-bag of the publican one day, and the drug-bag of the apothecary on the next (hear). If the constitution had fair play, the result would be health and long life; but by being stimulated with alcoholic liquors, it became enervated and exhausted and at length destroyed. To say that the machinery of life would last only forty-five years, was absurd. There were cases on record of persons living for 200 years. John Cann lived to be 205, John Rovin 172, and old Parr 152 years of age. He mentioned those cases to show that the constitution was capable of enduring much longer than it usually did, and he was quite convinced that with fair play, instead of forty-five being the average, it would be three times that length. He altogether disapproved of medical men prescribing intoxicating drinks to their patients, and gave it as his decided opinion that he who prescribed them, on any pretence whatever, was either very ignorant of his profession, or, what was worse, a heartless and mercenary knave (hear).

Rev. Dr. BURNS seconded the adoption of the address. He had attended meetings in that Hall on a variety of occasions, and to advocate a variety of good causes, but the present was the first time it had ever been his pleasing duty to congratulate royalty (cheers). And though it was the first, he did not see why it should be the last time (hear). He did not see why the noble example set by his Majesty of Sweden should not influence a court much nearer home (hear). Surely, if the Queen of England were to give them the benefit of her example, she would not lose any of her dignity or of the loyalty and affection of her people. He hoped the good example might be catching. He was glad to know that the President of the American Republic was a teetotaler (cheers), and he hoped that very soon they might have to congratulate him as the friend of peace and freedom (cheers). He hoped, too, that the practical application of the excellent series of meetings just concluded would be a determination to build a large temperance hall in the Metropolis (loud cheers). And as many other of the great movements of the day dovetailed into their own the thing might be easily accomplished, and be of great mutual benefit. Surely some enterprising man among them would take the matter up. He saw around him several enterprising persons, whilst in the chair was a man of all enterprises and schemes, who was connected with all sorts of persons and places (hear and cheers). Why should not the thing be done? Since sitting in the meeting he had been prompted to put the following lines together, with which he closed his remarks:—

Let kings and queens their sceptres sway
O'er nations good and wise;
Nor let their regius be e'er disturbed
By miseries, groans, and cries.
Then let their bright example shine,
And abstinence proclaim—
For drinking is a nation's woe,
Its greatest curse and shame.

(Cheers.)

Dr. OXLEY, on rising to support the resolution, was heartily cheered. He had observed with very considerable pleasure the patronage which his Majesty had bestowed upon their glorious cause. They all knew his (Dr. Oxley's) sentiments on that subject; nor was it necessary for him to do more than express a wish that England might soon be teetotalized (cheers).

The resolution was then put, and carried by acclamation.

CARL OLOF BRINK, Esq., then addressed the meeting, amidst repeated bursts of applause. He spoke as follows: Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen,—I could wish I were better acquainted with your language, that I might be able to express myself more distinctly. I shall not inflict upon you a long speech in bad English, but make a very short one, begging you to accept the will for the deed. I have much pleasure in attending your truly philanthropic meeting, and most cordially agree with all that has been said on this very important subject; and shall feel much gratified to inform your friends in my country of your good feeling, and the kind reception with which you have honoured me. I sincerely wish you ultimate success in the good work which you have so well begun. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentleman, I assure you I feel highly honoured by being made the bearer of your address to his Majesty my King, which I shall have much pleasure in forwarding, or presenting to him in person, in a very short time. (Three hearty cheers followed Mr. Brink's address.)

The Rev. Mr. BROWN, of Dalkeith, in the course of a short but effective speech, expressed his surprise that all the men who helped on the anti-slavery movement were not with them in the Temperance cause, which was emphatically an Anti-Slavery Society (cheers). True, the drunkard was a willing slave, but his condition was nevertheless a state of slavery more degrading, more galling, and more wretched, than that which as a nation they terminated in their West India possessions (hear). On this account they ought to join them in breaking that fearful yoke, taking as their motto, "Total, immediate, and universal emancipation" (cheers).

GEORGE CRUIKSHANK, Esq., moved, and W. WEST, Esq., seconded, a vote of thanks to John Cassell, Esq., for his exertions to promote the principles of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors through this series of meetings; for his able conduct in the chair; as well as for his other efforts to secure the welfare of the working classes, and the interests of universal philanthropy.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

The CHAIRMAN returned thanks, expressing his devotedness to the cause, and his determination by every means in his power, to extend its influence. There were several eloquent advocates of teetotalism on the platform, who, he was sure, the meeting would have been delighted to listen to had time allowed; and, although it was a little out of order, he would call on one of them, a gentleman whom they well knew, from the "emerald isle," to say a few words to them (cheers).

J. F. M'GUIRE, Esq., of Cork, responded to the call, and thanked the meeting for affording him the opportunity of expressing his warm attachment to the principles of their society. He had been a teetotaler thirteen years, and was a personal friend of Father Mathew (cheers). He was proud to see such a meeting, because he thought, with many Irishmen, that the temperance cause in England was almost dead. He was also glad to tell them that, in spite of all the misery in his own land—misery which no pen of the poet could describe, nor imagination of man conceive—such, indeed, as it was not given to human language to portray; in spite of misery which had struck down nearly half a million of the brave people of Ireland, the temperance banner had not been degraded (loud cheers). He recognized in that society the struggle of an army of bold freemen against the most oppressive and degrading tyranny which ever disgraced the annals of humanity; a struggle for liberty, for laying as it were afresh the basis of social, political, and religious liberty, for he believed that unless every reformation were based upon temperance principles there would be a something lamentably deficient in each (hear). He came from a country sunken in misery and distress, yet he did not despair of her ultimately rising high in the scale of human progress, so long as the principles of temperance lived in the hearts of her sons (cheers). He did not despair of her while she cherished the memory of the labours of Father Mathew, and he rejoiced to know that there were hundreds and thousands of working men in her midst, who throughout calamity, and sorrow, and death, were exhibiting a noble example of fortitude and self-dependence and temperance (cheers). He had known men to die there with the heroism of martyrs, rather than break their temperance pledge (hear). With such stern facts before him, why should he despair? He believed that if they wished to reform society, to facilitate the education of youth, and to make the domestic circle of the working man happy, they must insist upon the doctrines of total abstinence (hear), because they knew that drunkenness was the perennial fountain of numberless miseries, of endless distress (hear). He urged them, therefore, to persevere, undismayed by hostilities, unseduced by all the artifices of those who would beguile them to their certain destruction, and, having degraded, would trample them under foot (hear). It was a matter which affected rights, happiness, life—yielding to the enemy, and they were slaves; but standing to their sacred principles, in the name of God, they were free-men indeed.

The proceedings closed about half past ten.

THE EXETER HALL MEETINGS.

To the Editor of the Teetotal Times.

SIR,—We are directed by the Committee for conducting the recent series of Meetings in Exeter Hall, to forward you the following resolution, passed unanimously at their meeting held on Wednesday evening, March 6, 1850, and to request its insertion in the April number of the TEETOTAL TIMES, in connexion with the Report of the Meeting in Exeter-hall on the evening of March 4:—

“RESOLVED—That the cordial thanks of this Committee be presented to Mr. J. W. GREEN, for his intelligent and active exertions in bringing into efficient operation their various plans and resolutions during the recent meetings held in Exeter-hall. The Committee feel deeply sensible that the ability and discretion exercised by Mr. Green in conducting the correspondence, together with his willing and earnest co-operation in their combined proceedings, have tended greatly to promote the auspicious, satisfactory, and encouraging result, as most triumphantly exemplified in the magnificent gathering at the last and concluding meeting of the series.”

We are, Sir, on behalf of the Committee,

Yours respectfully,

G. C. CAMPBELL,

T. B. SMITHIES,

J. H. ESTERBROOKE,

} Hon. Secs.

* * * The next meeting of the Committee will take place on Wednesday evening, April 10, at Mrs. Watt's Temperance Hotel, Catherine-street, Strand, at eight o'clock.

ALCOHOL—is the high-priest of Death: tobacco is his chief deacon.

PHYSICIANS AT FAULT.—A wine-dealer, on his death-bed, acknowledged, in the bitterness of penitential sorrow, that he had often seen his customers wasting away around him, poisoned by what he had meted out to them; and that same wine, which was the cause of their decline, was often prescribed by their physicians as a means for their recovery.—Dr. Nott.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

ST. PANCRAS.

The ample space allotted to the important proceedings at Exeter-hall, prevent more than a brief notice of a peculiarly interesting and effective meeting recently held in the spacious vestry-room of St. Pancras; Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., M.P., presided. The meeting was convened by the committee of the Christian Teetotal Union, and the subject announced in the bills was: "Intemperance and Ragged Schools." The chairman commenced with an excellent address, indicative of a thorough knowledge of the temperance movement, his warm attachment to the cause, and firm determination to aid its onward progress. The Rev. Thomas Spencer, A.M., late of Bath, followed in a speech characterized by intelligent argument and impressive reasoning, which produced upon the large and respectable audience a powerful effect, as testified by their quiet and steady attention. The other speakers were the Rev. I. Doxey, Mr. Hardwick, C. O. Brink, Esq., from Sweden; Dr. Gourley, Mr. W. Spriggs, and Mr. Smyth, from Canada. The whole tone and character of the meeting was such as to give evident satisfaction, and will, doubtless, have a salutary and beneficial influence in the crowded locality in which it was held.

EAST NORFOLK.

The Rev. R. G. MASON has been zealously cultivating an extensive, and somewhat unpropitious, field of labour for the last six months, including the principal part of Norfolk, and a part of Suffolk. His field has included Norwich, Yarmouth, Beccles, Lowestoft, Bungay, Harleston, Eye, Diss, Harling, Thetford, Dereham, Hingham, Watton, Wymondham, Reepham, Aylsham, North-Walsham, Buckenham, Fakenham, Walsingham, Wells, and various other places. With few exceptions, he has been favoured with overflowing meetings. In addition to lecturing five or six times weekly, he has preached generally three times every Sabbath, and been welcomed to nearly all the principal chapels in the above places. The cause of temperance has been decidedly improved, and he has won for himself and the cause he pleads "golden opinions."

AGRICULTURE AND TEETOTALISM.

Many in Norfolk, as in most agricultural districts, are strongly opposed to the disuse of malt-liquor, especially in hay-time and harvest, and to a stubborn reiteration of the oft-answered inquiry, "What is to be done with the barley?" If animals and men used this for food to nourish and fatten, instead of the latter drinking it to the ruin of both body and soul, it would indeed open such a new channel for a portion of the circulating medium, as for a time to affect the money interest of malsters, brewers, &c.; but the good sense and business tact of many of these would enable them to turn their money to a far more advantageous account, than in converting the precious product of the well-tilled soil into a potent poison and prolific source of pauperism, irreligion, crime, and present and endless misery. It is quite possible that this change alone would go far to answer the anxious inquiry of many a hardened agriculturist, "How shall we get out of our present difficulties?" Live by eating moderately, instead of drinking spoiled barley to kill yourselves, and all will be well.

J. TABRAHAM.

BATH.

On Thursday, the 14th ult., a Working Man's Temperance Demonstration took place in the Temperance-hall, Widecombe. The object of the meeting, which was crowded, was to afford members of the operative classes an opportunity of bearing testimony to their capability of performing arduous labour without the use of stimulating drinks. Mr. E. SAUNDERS occupied the chair, and called upon

Mr. SHEPPARD (carpenter), who said he had been a teetotaler eleven years, and he was sure his fellow-workmen would say that he did his work without drink as well as any of them who used it. He was equal to them in lifting, heaving, or any other heavy labour.

JAMES PENNY (miller), who had tried the temperance system for ten years, made similar statements. He had been in the same establishment for twelve years, and he could appeal to his master if he did not do his work better now than before he gave up drinking. He knew he was better in every respect, particularly in health.

JONATHAN COLLIER (gardener) said he had learned to drink when a child, and had frequently been discharged from situations because of his drunken habits. He was induced to take the pledge thirteen years ago, and was able to continue working a much longer time than he could formerly do.

MARK COWARD (quarryman) had given up drink sixteen years ago. After he had been an abstainer nine years he was employed on the railway, where he did eight and nine and a half days' work per week. That, he found, he could stand without any intoxicating stimulant.

GEORGE FRANKS (plasterer) said that, during the ten years he had been a teetotaler, he had been exposed to all sorts of weather, both heat and cold, and he had been enabled to do his work well.

William Carbound (tailor), James Snook (wheel chairman), George Eyles (baker), James Barter (mason), George Neat (treadler), — Hall (gasfitter), and others, subsequently addressed the meeting in very interesting speeches, all declaring that they had practised total abstinence for many years, and that they were better able to do their work under that system than when they had indulged in the ordinary drinking usage.

The several speakers were loudly cheered by a most attentive auditory, and the meeting concluded with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

SCARBOROUGH.

The progress of temperance in this quarter is onward—"onward we go right merrily." The word is "Forward, forward to the rescue!" Volunteers continue to come forward and join our ranks, free, able, and willing to rescue themselves, their families, and friends from the yoke of their greatest enemy—strong drink. The temperance demonstrations in Exeter-hall, London, appear to have given a beneficial stimulus to societies all over the country; and, like the bright star in Bethlehem, points out the centre as an example for other societies to follow. The Scarborough Temperance Society is not far in the rear. Crowded meetings have been addressed by Mr. Thomas Hudson, of Bristol. He delivered some inspiring lectures in the Odd Fellows' Hall on the 24th and 25th ult., and was supported by Mr. Thomas Whittaker, and the president of the society, Mr. William Wood. A fresh impulse is evidently given by these lectures; numbers are availing themselves of the truths that have been depicted in them of the doings of the "Gin-fiend" and his followers. At the close of a gratuitous lecture delivered by Mr. Hudson in the same room, March 1st, the president announced that upwards of 300 persons had joined since the visit of Mr. James Teare, and hoped that Mr. Hudson's visit would be attended with similar results.—A temperance soiree was held at Mr. T. Whittaker's, the Temperance-hotel, on Wednesday evening, March 6, in commemoration of the anniversary of Mr. Whittaker's entering the above hotel, and which was well attended. After tea, the company indulged in various amusements. An entertainment was given by Mr. T. Hudson and Mr. T. Whittaker, introducing several melodies, recitations, and anecdotes of a humorous, moral, and instructive character.—The regular weekly meetings of the society, in the Bethel and George-street Chapels, continue as attractive as ever; a pleasing sign that all is not labour in vain.

YORK.

On Monday evening, Feb. 18th, a demonstration of working men, in connection with the temperance cause, took place in the Lecture-hall, Goodramgate, in this city. The chair was taken at eight o'clock by Mr. R. H. BURDEKIN, who opened the meeting in an appropriate address, in which, among other things, he referred to the condition of a body of men employed in London as coal carriers, in the unloading of vessels. It appears that this class of men are paid their weekly earnings at public-houses, where, upon an average, they spend one-third of their wages in drink. The meeting was afterwards addressed by Messrs. Barker, Holmes, Crossfield, Armstrong, and others—all sons of toil. The speeches of some of these individuals were expositions of the drunkard's career, and were calculated to do much good in arresting the progress of the drunkard, and also in operating as a warning to others.—Mr. Armstrong dwelt chiefly on the worth of the working man. What, said he, could our country or the world do without the working man? And who but the working man was it that had performed the greatest things for the benefit of the world at large? Who translated the Scriptures? Two working men—one a shoe-maker, and the other a clogger. Who was it that said, "These hands have ministered unto mine own necessities?" It was a working man—Paul, the tent-maker (applause)! Who was it that emancipated the slaves? It was a working man —Mr. Knibb (applause). Who was it that wrote that beautiful work which had afforded him, as he doubted not it had afforded his hearers, the greatest pleasure, "The Pilgrim's Progress?" It was a working man—the Bedford tinker, John Bunyan (applause). It would be well if they had some more such working men. The speaker then directed attention to the demoralising effects of drink, and called upon the audience to try to do without it. The meeting throughout seemed to afford much pleasure, and, we trust, was productive of good.

A numerous meeting of Sunday-school Teachers and others was, on the 4th. ult., held in the Lecture-hall, Goodramgate, York, to hear some important statistics from Mr. T. B. SMITHIES, formerly of this city, obtained of the chaplains of the principal jails and penitentiaries in the kingdom, showing the effects of intoxicating liquors. J. BACKHOUSE, Esq., was called to the chair.

Mr. T. B. SMITHIES addressed the meeting at some length, and read over the communications he had received on the subject they had assembled to consider, stating that he thought he had clearly established that the large majority of the prisoners in the different jails of the country had been Sunday scholars—not for a short time merely, but from one to three years. The question, then, was forced upon them, how did they come there? He would endeavour to answer that question. He then alluded to the statements made by the late Chief Justice Hale, Mr. Baron Alderson, Mr. Justice Patteson, Mr. Justice Erskine, Mr. Justice Wightman, and other judges, showing that if it were not for the drinking usages of the country, there would be little or no occasion for the holding of assizes for the trial of prisoners. He submitted, therefore, that they ought, whilst government were spending hundreds and thousands of pounds in building massive buildings for the punishment of crime, to bend their energies for its prevention. He did not deny the utility of Sabbath-schools, but he contended that they had not done all the good they might and ought to have done; and he enforced upon the teachers the necessity of allowing this matter to receive their serious and prayerful attention, and of warning the children placed under their charge—a duty which he believed had hitherto been much neglected—against the dreadful consequences of intemperance. Mr. Smithies' remarks were received with much applause. The whole of the returns which Mr. Smithies had received give an aggregate of 8,781 prisoners, of whom 5,478 had been at one time scholars in Sunday schools.

The CHAIRMAN made some appropriate observations in support of the temperance cause, and gave some particulars in connexion with his travels in Australia and Africa, showing, from his visits to the convict population in our penal colonies, that the principal cause for the commission of the crimes for which they were then suffering was from the use of intoxicating liquors, and that by their being indulged in, they formed one of the greatest obstacles to the progress of morality and religion.

Mr. HENRY CLAPP, from America, was the next speaker, and he gave a pleasing description of the history and progress of the temperance reformation in his native country, where there are above half a million of reformed drunkards.

Mr. E. LLOYD, York, moved "That this meeting having heard a series of statistics, showing that the large majority of the criminals at present in the prisons of this country have been, for a considerable time, scholars in Sunday schools, and it being fully proved that the greatest proportion of these have been led into crime through our national drinking customs, would earnestly recommend this subject to the serious attention of the Sunday School Union."

B. WILSON, Esq., of Mirfield, seconded the motion, which was carried, and the meeting shortly afterwards separated.—York Herald.

HINCKLEY.

The friends of the temperance cause in this town are actively engaged in the furtherance of their objects. They hold monthly meetings, and good results are the consequence. On Monday evening, the 4th of March, a large and respectable audience listened with great attention to a lecture delivered by Mr. Isaac Barnett, a member of the Independent congregation, in whose vestry the meeting was held. His address was replete with encouragement to his fellow members to continue on in the undertaking in which they had engaged. He called upon the drunkard and the moderate man to league themselves with us, and unite in overthrowing the barriers of opposition to our progress. He ably quoted from Scripture passages favourable to total abstinence. Several signatures were added to the pledge.

J. PRESTON, Jun., Secretary.

ROYAL LEAMINGTON SPA.

The anniversary of the "Buds of Promise," Juvenile Reformatory Tent, was celebrated on Monday, March 11, 1850, by a public tea meeting in the Temperance-hall, when a goodly number of members and friends sat down together. After tea a public meeting was held, Brother W. D. Wright, P.C.R., in the chair. Brothers J. B. Hickling, J. Alwood, C. Smith, and J. Roberts, and Messrs. Carter, Hal, Pinder, Ellis, and Robins, addressed the audience upon Reformatory and Teetotalism, and were loudly applauded. The meeting closed by singing the Doxology, and all parties retired highly delighted with this specimen of the "good time coming," knowing that to realise the full effects they had only to "wait a little longer."

RUSHDEN.

March 7th, Mr. J. Inwards delivered a lecture here on "The Bottle," illustrated with paintings from a powerful magic lantern. On the following evening he delivered a lecture on astronomy. While we were admiring the grandeur of the solar system, with the material sun for its centre, we were led to admire that glorious moral system which has "the Sun of Righteousness" for its centre; and while we marked the revolutions of the majestic planets, it brought to our mind the church of God, the temperance reformation, Sabbath schools, missionary and peace societies, revolving round their great source and fountain-head, receiving light from thence, and reflecting it on a besotted and benighted world.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

THE COUNTING-HOUSE COMPANION. Tables of Prime Cost, Profit, and Rebate, &c. London: Piper, Paternoster-row.

The object of these Tables is to show, "by one summation, the clear gain on any specified outlay, from one penny to five thousand pounds, allowing to the purchaser a discount ranging from two and a half per cent. to fifty per cent." The plan of the work is novel, and its publication must be hailed with pleasure and gratitude by "all who are engaged in manufacturing, buying, selling, importing, or exporting, whether as principals or as agents." The calculations have been made with great care, and may, we believe, be safely depended upon. As a correct knowledge of profit and loss must regulate the household expenditure, and other expenses, of every one who is desirous of "providing things honest in the sight of all men," we advise every tradesman to have this "Companion" on his desk; it will save him much trouble, however expert a calculator he may be, and will prove either a "ready reckoner" or a counter-check.

AN APPEAL TO THE PIOUS in favour of Total Abstinence. By R. TABRAHAM, Wesleyan Minister. Twentieth thousand. London: Houlston and Stoneman, Paternoster-row.

We have before noticed this excellent tract, in which "love to man" is urged as the powerful motive to abstain from the use, gift, sale, and manufacture of all kinds of intoxicating drinks. We now notice it for the purpose of expressing the pleasure with which we witness the issue of the twentieth thousand of so useful a publication; and of congratulating our friend on his having found leisure, notwithstanding the active part he has taken in maintaining "Conference discipline," to superintend a work of such unquestionable utility!

COLUMN FOR THE YOUNG.

LITTLE DROPS.

"Little drops," I hear some one say. "Little drops of what?" Guess. Are you beat? Well, I will tell you. Little drops of—of—strong drink. Now, listen to two or three things about little drops.

1. They are hurtful, though but little drops.—You have heard of alcohol. That is a poison. Well, all the kinds of drink to be found in this country are mixed with it. Now, poison could be mixed up with other things so as to take its bad effects away; but men often bungle when they try to manage this, and in making strong drink they never try it. All strong drink, therefore, contains a hurtful substance in it, and every little drop is a little hurt; but who would willingly do themselves a little hurt? What would you think of a boy making holes in his hand with a pin, and saying, Oh, they are but little holes! Would any boy do that? No. He would feel that little hurt at the time. Now, the hurt done by little drops is often not felt at the time; and this it is which make people think they have got no harm at all. But this is a sad mistake. My dear young friends, when you are asked to take a little drop, think it is a little drop of a bad thing, and politely refuse it.

2. They lead to larger drops.—Many who began with just putting their lips to the glass when they were boys and girls, have gone on next to a little sip, and then to a larger sip. Perhaps they stayed awhile at a quarter of a glass, but by-and-by they came to a half. From that they managed a whole, and so on till they could stand, as they call it, a good deal. No good kind of food or drink makes people crave for it in this way. A person who eats an egg to breakfast one day, does not seek always the more eggs the longer he lives. He does not seek two this week, and three the next, and four the next, and five the next. That is because they nourish him. Strong drink is like a spur only. A spur does not give a horse strength, and no horse would live long if it was always spurred and made to gallop. So with a man who uses drink. He begins with a little drop, but by-and-by this does not spur him enough. He must have a shaper spur, that is, a larger drop. Ah! beware of little drops!

3.—They lead to frequent drops.—Many folks who began with little drops have been tempted to take frequent little drops. This is a very common way of learning to drink. It is a way by which many young people have learnt. Those who take frequent drops are often called tipplers. It is a very bad sign, though a person takes but a little at a time, to see him take it always when he has an opportunity. If you saw a person running into every baker's shop he came to, and buying a loaf to eat it, you would say he was a glutton. Nobody would do that; and yet hundreds are unable to pass a public-house, if they have any coppers, without drinking a gill. Labourers who drink a little drop often throw down their tools for a moment to go for a dram. In the house too, those females and others who think they need a thimbleful now and then, are enticed to frequent drops by every little event. Let all boys and girls resolve to avoid taking frequent drops by taking no drops at all.

4. They lead to stronger drops.—People don't generally begin with the strongest liquor at first. Many young folks begin with a little drop of ale, or a little drop of porter, or a little drop of wine. Stronger drinks at first would make them cough and choke; but as they continue taking little drops of these, they grow able, and are proud about it, to take little drops of whisky, of brandy, of gin, and so on. Here, then, is another danger, and a strong reason why even the least bad drinks should never be touched.

5. Little drops lead to regular drops.—What we grow fond of, we like, if we can, to enjoy regularly. To make regular visits to the public-house is a sure sign of ruin to working men. Some have a drop once a week—others twice—others every day—others every morning and evening, and others oftener. Now such persons mostly all begin with chance little drops—then come, perhaps, regular once a week drops—then twice a week drops—then daily drops—and so on till at last these little drops lead to more than drops—to gills, and mutchkins, and pints, and bottles, and bowls-full. Then follow ragged coats—broken heads—staggering limbs. Then appear starving children—heart-broken mothers—naked walls—shoeless feet—fireless chimneys. Then come loss of health—loss of character—loss of friends—loss of credit—loss of this world, and, dying so, loss of the next: for no drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God. Dear children, think of all this, and avoid little drops.—No. 6 of Tracts for the Young; issued by the Scottish Temperance League.

THE DRUNKARD AND HIS BIBLE.

A man of very intemperate habits was presented with a copy of the Scriptures by a member of the Bible Society. The drunkard thanked him, telling him that he had no such book at home—that he would keep it for his own use. Being so much intoxicated, he was unable to reach home, and sat down by the wayside and fell asleep. He awoke in the night, and finding a Bible in one pocket and a bottle of brandy in the other, he said to himself, "It will not do to carry both home together, and I do not know which to throw away. If I throw away the Bible, I shall die a drunkard, and the devil will have me; if I throw away my bottle, I give the lot to God Almighty, and I may die a good man."

He reflected, and a sense of duty compelled him to throw away the bottle, and keep the Bible. He took it up, and dashed it against a tree. When he reached home, he told his family what he had done, and what he proposed to do. The morning was spent in reading the new book, and on the same day the family was called around the family altar, while he, who was lately a companion of the bottle, addressed the throne of grace. The man is now a worthy citizen, an exemplary Christian, and is actively engaged in doing good.

How encouraging is this fact to those who are engaged in the worthy object of distributing the Word of God. Go on with your heaven-approved labours, and you will meet with signal success. Let no opposition discourage, no threats daunt you in your work of benevolence and piety.—Zion's Banner.

THE DRUNKARD'S FAREWELL.

A TEMPERANCE MELODY, BY C. MEADLEY.

Air—"Mary Blane."

I once did love to use strong drink,
I lov'd it as my life,
It came from Old Jamaica, and
It caused me much of strife;
At home I lived so happy, when
Free from all care and woe;
Until I took to drinking rum,
Which proved my overthrow.

Chorus—So farewell now to all strong drinks—
Rum, brandy, gin, and pain;
Though you have often made me drunk,
I'll ne'er get drunk again.

When toiling at my daily task,
I cry, and say, good bye
To ale, and beer, and such-like trash—
Drink water when you're dry:
'Tis Nature's best and wholesome drink,
'Tis sent from Heav'n for man
To use, and not to poison turn,
To scourge our happy land.
So farewell now, &c.

I banish'd alcohol from my sight,
The Temperance pledge I took,
And quench my thirst with liquor bright,
That runs clear in the brook.
Contentment, peace, and happiness,
And health is sure to flow,
By abstinence from all strong drink—
The drunkard's deadly foe.
So farewell now, &c.

Then sign the pledge, and keep it well,
And from intemperance cease,
Our ways are ways of pleasantness,
And all our paths are peace.
Your years will then be multiplied,
Your step be firm and free;
And when old age creeps on your brow,
More honour'd will you be.

Chorus—So farewell now to all strong drinks,
Rum, brandy, gin, and pain,
Though they have often made me drunk,
I'll ne'er get drunk again.

Scarborough, April, 1850.

HAVE YOU EVER HEARD OF TEETOTALISM?

BLEAR-EYED TOPER! mortal of greater value than countless worlds! now that I have caught you in your right senses, let me ask a question, probably, never put to you before, "Have you ever heard of Teetotalism?" But now that I see the deep foot-prints of poverty on your very hearthstone; now that I observe your emaciated condition more distinctly, and perceive the unmistakable traces of pinching want on the countenance of your wife, I read in each that I have introduced a topic to which you are a stranger, although one with which it is most important you should be intimately conversant, since your life, your eternal welfare, your all, depends upon it. But hold! I am talking too fast. See, what is this under your elbow? One, two, Teetotal tracts! Am I then to suppose that you are aware there is a way by which you may escape the present misery and future woe of drunkenness, and yet that you refuse to walk in it? Surely I am wrong, or surely you are wrong; or surely Teetotalism, or hard-drinking, or something here, is wrong. Have you the capacity for judging between good and bad? Could you distinguish a lead shilling from a silver one? Yet here are earthly happiness, and everlasting felicity, in opposition to misery now, and ten thousand times augmented misery hereafter; and you choose the latter, as though you thought it were the best!

MODERATE DRINKER, tradesman in a flourishing business, put aside the newspaper, and, before you sit down to that reeking poison, spare me a moment, to answer me the momentous question, "Have you ever heard of Teetotalism?" Of course you had not, or that "glass" had not been there. With your permission, I will at once explain. Why, if my sight deceives me not, that is a Teetotal almanack against the wall; and, strange and stranger still, here are temperance mottoes, and the temperance principles, against every day in the year, so that you cannot look at your almanack but they stare you in the face. Do I, then, address a reasonable mortal, who knows the objects of Teetotalism, but who refuses to co-operate with Teetotals? You toil for wealth, sir: would you then reject with disdain a magic plan for the certain and speedy accumulation of a houseful of gold? You take means for obtaining long life: what would you then say, were I to prove that you are nursing a reptile whose deadly sting will, ere long, be thrust into your own heart? You seek after happiness: what would be your emotions could I convince you that, day after day, and year after year, you are adding, and adding, and adding, one element of misery after another to the mass which must shortly constitute your hell? Teetotalism will heap up for you a pile of wealth, compared with which earth's gold is as worthless as dust. Strong drink is a venomous reptile; and unless crushed now, its sting will pierce your vitals, when you think it slumbers. Intoxicating liquors are the surest of materials for the sorest of hells; and you, by tolerating and abetting their existence, do all you can to make misery your own, and to banish happiness from others. And, to make your position ten thousand times worse, you know you are doing it.

MAN IN A STATION OF THE HIGHEST RESPONSIBILITY: you who are one of the rulers of the nation, may I be permitted to speak a word with you on a subject of consequence? "Have you ever heard of Teetotalism?" Ah! I see, I see, you have no knowledge of it. Pity 'tis I have not had an interview with you long ago. Time is flying, and the more there passes the less there is to come. Listen for a moment, and I will attempt to show how £60,000,000, by being annually spent otherwise than in intoxicating liquors, may do the country ten, twenty, ay, a hundred times more good. Give attention, sir, give attention, and I will try to make it clear that the alarming disease which now afflicts John Bull has a cause, and that, instead of attacking that cause, you strengthen and favour it as much as in you lies; and only meet one of its innumerable issues as slowly as possible. A moment, sir, a single moment, and I will tell you the amount of punishment you may escape—the amount of glory you may secure—through knowing of Teetotalism; the obloquy future ages will cast upon your name, and the crimes with which they will charge you for not knowing about it. It is high time, sir, you were acquainted with Teetotalism. If you had known about it before, you might even now have begun to reap the sweet fruits of such acquaintance. But how can this be? Here is actually one of a series of letters on temperance, addressed to you and the Government generally, in your own break-fast-table periodical. What am I to think? You see millions of human beings, whom you profess to help to govern, as a father does his children, hurrying on to appalling destruction. There is a way to stop them and turn them back; but do you really know of it, and can you regard it with an indifference which tells as well as a sneer of contempt?

MINISTERS OF RELIGION AND TEACHERS OF OUR YOUTH! Have you ever heard of Teetotalism? Yes! I know you have. You have had tract after tract, and paper after paper, sent to you, informing you of the ten thousand evils attendant upon the use of strong drinks, and the innumerable blessings connected with total abstinence. You know that intemperance keeps thousands from the house of God, from the duties of the Sabbath, from searching the Scriptures, from the knowledge, the enjoyment, the practice of pure and undefiled religion. How great your responsibility in this matter! How frightful the thought of apathy, of opposition on your part!

But I cannot proceed. The thought pierces me like a dagger. Teetotalism may be made the means of introducing tens of thousands to the supreme, everlasting joys of paradise; is capable of banishing nine-tenths of the miseries incident to a bottle-loving community; and yet people act as though they knew nothing at all about it!

TOBACCO.—A trifle, memento mori, dust for the nose, ashes for the mouth, and poison for the stomach.

A STARTLING FACT.—Moderate drinking has caused more pecuniary and social injury than drunkenness ever did. And more men have died from the result of moderate than from immoderate drinking.

BETTER TIMES HAVE COME.—Where would the following tyrannical act be borne now? In a room in Haddon-hall, an ancient baronial residence near Bakewell, in Derbyshire, "is an iron fastening, about six feet from the ground, and large enough to admit the wrist of a man's hand. The design of this, we are told, was to punish those delinquents and outlaws to domestic order who refused duly to take their quantum of ale, for which delinquency the guilty culprit was punished by having his wrist placed in the iron fastening over his head, and having the horn of ale, which should have gone down his throat, poured instead down the sleeve of his doublet." This instrument would not be unimportant among the "seven score servants" who thronged around the "King of the Peak" and his frequent crowds of guests.—The Youth's Instructor, August, 1849.

the Gospel of Christ; and that even of this sum a considerable portion is given grudgingly.

Another item in the report also would be highly gratifying to his companions in rebellion—for he might aver, that more persons every year die through the use of strong drink than are added to the Church; that of those brought up in Sabbath-schools, more scholars perish than are saved, and that the principal agent in their destruction is smoking and drinking; that there are more drunkards made every twelve months by professing people and moderate drinkers, than are reclaimed by the Teetotalers; and, consequently, if the matter works as it does now, intemperance and wine will go hand-in-hand until the day of doom; and that, to use the strong language of the prophet, "Hell must enlarge herself and open her mouth without measure," or else there will not be room enough for the boundless number of victims that both the religious and irreligious men and women of England are precipitating to its depths.

One matter of immense importance and gratification to this horrid audience would be the fact, that strong drink is effectual in neutralizing, to so great an extent, the evangelical efforts of the day. That Bibles are pawned for drink; that religious tracts are unread through drink; that the labours of Scripture readers, city missionaries, itinerants, visitors of the sick, and stated preachers of the Gospel are, to an incalculable degree, lost through drink;—in a word, that there is a material demon which none but Teetotalers can contend with; for when he does not destroy the soul, he invariably injures its powers, and most unerringly brings the body to the grave before its time; and yet that this evil spirit is nursed in the sanctuary, commended from the pulpit, and dearer than health and life to many of the most popular ministers of the Word. For he, who uses a poison that will shorten his own days and those of his most beloved friends, and may bury not a few of them in perdition, shows that he loves strong drink better than life. It could easily be shown to such an audience from actual demonstration, from everlasting, ever-suffering, ever-living examples, that numbers of the priests of the sanctuary have, by their use and commendation of stimulants, destroyed many more souls they have saved; and, therefore, that so long as these practices continue, there will but little to be feared by demons from the aggressions that Christianity will make on the Empire of Darkness. It would, no doubt, make this evil concourse thrill with hope, to find that the missionary carried to savage and idolatrous climes bibles and strong drinks together; and thus, though he proclaimed the Gospel, yet in his wine, cordials, spirits, &c., he introduced a greater scourge than had ever yet visited the heathen world.

Our readers will perceive that the subject at which we have hinted is almost boundless, and that it is awful and appalling as it is immeasurable. Were fallen angels to write books, or send to our world a catalogue of the souls that have been lost through intoxicating liquors, and the woes here and hereafter connected with this refined butchery, they might fill more volumes than are yet found in the known world. There is not a drinker that perishes alone in his debauchery. Like the plague or malignant fever, it hurries its victim to the grave; but it also buries his dearest friends in destruction. And yet this is a crime which must not be branded in Exeter-hall, at the generality of our philanthropic May meetings! The man who did so would be hissed from the platform. Were it taken up in good earnest, as it ought to be, and as God and man demand that it should, the Bible, Missionary, Tract, and Sunday-School Societies would suffer. Many of the clergy and nobility would give them up; all the brewers, distillers, wine merchants, &c., would withdraw their subscriptions, and several preachers and popular speakers would leave the platform. And thus we poison the very waters of life with this worst of all venoms, and rob ourselves of success, our societies of funds, our churches of members, the world of good citizens, and heaven of redeemed souls; and, worse than all, we people perdition with spirits whom we have destroyed, and, in doing so, allow demons to exult over their immense acquisitions and our impious madness.

Until we abandon these accursed drinks we shall, to a very awful extent, "labour in vain and spend our strength for nought," and our May meetings will be robbed of that interest which would arise from their almost boundless prosperity.

THE NARRATIVE OF A DRUNKEN BARBER.

[BY R. W. VANDERKISTE, MISSIONARY.]

"IF," said I, "you had converted to a good use that money you have spent in drink, Mr. —, your declining years might be cheered by independence."

"Mr. Vanderkiste," said my poor friend, "my mind is ill at ease. I lay on that humble pallet on the ground, and (the tears starting in his eyes) I can't sleep."

Poor man! there is and has been, to my knowledge, much benevolence in Mr. —. I have known him to feed the hungry and take the houseless beneath the shelter of his roof. Habitually benevolent, but a down—downright drunkard has he been; and, to use his own favourite drunken phrase, 'a proud Salopian.' I have prevailed upon Mr. —, by God's assistance, to abstain for some time; and assured him, on the occasion of my last visit, that if he was resolved to persevere in well doing, avoid the accursed drink, and seek the salvation of his soul through the merits of a crucified Redeemer, he might cheer up. God would not forget him in mercy; and, I added, that I had frequently known teetotalism to produce strange and blessed changes, when accompanied by religion, both in men's morals and circumstances.

Said Mr. — "I have known that, too, sir. There was F—; he's an instance."

"Well," said I, "tell me all about him; I shall like to hear it."

"Why, sir," said Mr. —, who in address, when sober, though a poor man, is a gentleman, "when he (F.) kept a shaving shop in —, he certainly was an awful character, and his wife, too; I think the greatest drunkards I ever knew. I never knew them to be without a bottle of rum or gin on the table. For years and years I knew them, and they went on just the same; had not a thing scarce in their place for use. Well, sir, I lost sight of them for some years; but since I had to give up my shop" (it was through his habitual drunkenness), "and was wandering about starving, trying to obtain employment, I went into a handsome hair-dresser's in —, to ask if they wanted a man. Mr. —, smiling, answered me very civilly. He looked at me, and I looked at him. It was a handsome shop—good street—plenty of perfumery—all comfortable. Well, sir, we stood looking at one another; and at last said he (pointing round), 'You see me very differently situated to what I was.' Well, Sir, I humm'd and ha-ah'd, for I didn't know what to say. 'It was different indeed,' said Mr. —, lifting up his hands and eyes impressively, 'it was different!' 'Yes,' said Mr. F—, 'you see me very different to what I was, and this,' added he, 'is teetotalism's doing.' Well, Sir, he asked me into the parlour, nicely furnished, and introduced me to Mrs. F—, and she wasn't like the same woman, Sir.

They seemed quite pleased to see me, made much of me, and, said Mr. F—, 'I'm sorry I don't want a man, for I manage all my business myself; but I'm going to — for a week, for the benefit of my health, and if it's worth your while to come for a week, do.' Well, Sir, it turned out somebody had persuaded him and his wife to turn teetotalers, and there they were in a shop and business worth £60 or £70 to come into. I engaged to take it for a week, and gladly; and before he went, said he, 'Now, Mr. D—, there's one or two things I have to say. I allow no spirits, or beer, or liquor of any kind, on no account into this place.' 'Oh,' said I, 'mush't I have half a pint of beer with my dinner or supper?' 'Not here,' said Mr. F—, 'positively.' 'Oh, very well,' said I, 'there's an end of it.' 'And another thing,' said he, 'I do no business on the Sunday; all shut close. I pay you for a week just the same; six days is my week's work now.' 'Well, sir, they were both members, I found, of — —; and that week I seemed almost in heaven, as I sat on one side of the fire, and his wife on the other, at night, enjoying ourselves, after the shop was closed. She used to talk so as would do anybody good to hear—no hypocrisy—so changed; prayer night and morning. On her knees she did pray,' and Mr. —'s eyes seemed to melt a little, and he wiped them. 'Well, sir, when Mr. F— came home, of course there was no further occasion for me, but he gave me £1, besides my board and lodging, for the week's work, and, says he, I'm much obliged to you, Mr. D—, and I wish I wanted a man for old acquaintance' sake, but you see how it is, I don't; but whenever you are this way don't fail to look in, and do as we do.'

"There's a blessed change!" said my aged convert.

THE REV. THOMAS TIMPSON, OF LEWISHAM.

THIS gentleman, who signed the total abstinence pledge at Greenwich, last January, has since addressed the following to Mr. T. B. Smithies, who has favoured us with it for publication:—

DEAR SIR,—I did, indeed, on the 30th of January, as you have heard, in the Great Hall at Greenwich, sign the pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks. Many, I know, will inquire my reasons for this act, and I am prepared to give them with all frankness, particularly if they shall induce others to persevere in habits of sobriety, and seek the salvation of God in Christ Jesus.

I have been temperate all my life; and, though never robust, yet, thanks to my gracious God, I have never been obliged, through illness, to keep my bed a single day during the last fifty years. I have been a practical abstainer for several years, but I went to the Temperance Festival at Greenwich, that I might publicly offer my example, in the hope of its being beneficial to many, especially of my congregation and neighbours, inducing them to pursue their own interest and secure their own happiness. My end has already been in part accomplished.

I have some thoughts of drawing up a tract, as a declaration to all around, of my reasons for taking this step; but, in the meantime, I will briefly state a few, which I hope will be seriously pondered by all whom it may concern:—

1. Thirty years ago, my attention was called to this subject, as I found it necessary to give up my own home-brewed ale, as pure and good as any in Warwickshire, my medical friend assuring my wife that the effects of its very moderate use were unfavourable to my health.

2. I have no recollection of ever having gained real benefit from the use of malt liquor, wine, or spirituous liquors. Even in cases of temporary relief from pain, I always found its use productive of an internal debilitating fever.

3. By total abstinence from these drinks I have certainly been better in general health, and more tranquil in mind; freer from feverish depression; easier in breathing; improved in voice; less affected with fatigue in exercise; and capable of far more labour with cheerfulness.

4. The most eminent of our physicians, in great numbers, have testified, that intoxicating drinks are not in the least degree necessary for the preservation of health.

5. I have never heard of any physician of reputation advocating the use of intoxicating drinks as a proper beverage, or indispensable to promote the health of man.

6. I have known many strong men, accustomed to the greatest labour, on land and also at sea, especially in their watching in all weathers by day and by night, who have testified that their health and mental condition have been improved by total abstinence, while they have been less capable of fatigue when using intoxicating beverages.

7. When I was accustomed to take an occasional glass of wine, as offered by kind friends, the difference that I found in its quality, in different places, painfully convinced me that it must have been generally adulterated with injurious mixtures.

8. I possess certain information that in the manufacture of wines, spirits, ale, and porter—for they are all, necessarily, manufactured—their makers, and also their vendors, infuse into them various poisonous drugs, the fact of which is demonstrated by their lamentable effects on drunken persons.

9. I learn, from statistical returns certified by Government, that the enormous sum of seventy millions of pounds sterling are annually expended in intoxicating drinks in the United Kingdom—an amount much larger than the whole amount of the national taxes.

10. It is computed that there are five hundred thousand drunkards in Great Britain. I have known many such, involved in irretrievable ruin, among my own neighbours. I have witnessed the fall and ruin of many distinguished professors of religion, some even ministers; and, as far as I can perceive, intemperance in the use of strong drink—from little to much—leads to more domestic evils, social distresses, and public crimes, than any other cause.

11. The Bible numbers drunkards among those who, by the divine decree, shall not inherit the kingdom of God.

12. Sabbath-breaking appears to be chiefly occasioned by the makers and vendors of intoxicating drinks, especially by the occupations of maltsters, brewers, distillers, and the keepers of wine, spirit, and beer shops.

13. From a careful consideration of these subjects, I believe that the evangelization of our countrymen cannot be effected while these causes are in operation; and therefore I conceive that total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks is the imperative duty of every Christian, and more especially of every minister of Jesus Christ.

I remain, yours faithfully in the gospel,

THOMAS TIMPSON.

A FUNERAL, AFTER SIR JOHN MOORE'S.

FURNISHED BY AN UNDERTAKER.

(From "Punch.")

Not a mute one word at the funeral spoke,
Till away to the pot-house we hurried;
Not a bearer discharged his ribald joke
O'er the grave where our "party" we buried
We buried him dearly, with vain display,
Two hundred per cent. returning,
Which we made the struggling orphans pay,
All considerations spurning.
With plumes of feathers his hearse was drest,
Pall and hatbands and scarfs we found him;
And he went, as a Christian, unto his rest,
With his empty pomp around him.
None at all were the prayers we said,
And we felt not the slightest sorrow;
But we thought, as the rites were perform'd o'er the dead,
Of the bill we'd run up on the morrow.
We thought, as he sunk to his lowly bed,
That we wish'd they'd cut it shorter,
So that we might be off to the Saracen's Head,
For our gin, and our pipes, and our porter.
Lightly we speak of the "party" that's gone,
Now all due respect has been paid him;
Ah! little he reck'd of the lark that went on
Near the spot where we fellows had laid him.
As soon as our sable task was done,
Not a moment we lost in retiring;
And we feasted, and frolick'd, and poked our fun,
Gin and water each jolly soul firing.
Blithely and quickly we quaff'd it down,
Singing song, cracking joke, telling story;
And we shouted and laughed all the way up to town,
Riding outside the hearse in our glory!

MAY MEETINGS IN PANDEMONIUM.

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

EVERY one who believes the Scriptures believes in the existence of evil spirits, and that they take a deep interest in the affairs of this world. The history of Job, of Peter, and Judas, is fraught with instruction on this head. These fallen angels are said to delight in everything that can injure mankind. Satan is called "the god of this world," "the spirit that ruleth in the hearts of the children of disobedience," and "a roaring lion, going about seeking whom he may devour." He opposes everything that is good; and Christians are exhorted "to put on the whole armour of God and to withstand" him. It is very evident, from the facts recorded in the sacred volume, that there is much more intercourse between this world and the invisible state than many suppose; and as the whole soul of the prince of darkness is under the influence of malignity, we may conclude that our philanthropic and religious institutions, by which his dominion shall eventually be destroyed, must give him and his fellow-destroyers no little pain; to them, therefore, our May meetings must be very annoying.

Proud people generally make the best of their affairs, especially when they seem to be going wrong. Sinking men catch at straws; and we may be sure that the old serpent does not fail to make the most of everything that prolongs his dominion, and prevents the final overthrow of his empire. It may, then, be no very wild imagination to suppose that there are not only May meetings in our world, but also in the regions beneath. In the latter abode it is probable that there is regularly given a full report of all our puny operations to do good, and our gigantic apparatus for evil. Our schools, inefficient as nurseries of mind, and much more so as the teachers of morals, must be a matter of almost perpetual merriment. Our sectarianism and bigotry, by which we place human leaders on the throne of the Saviour; our vast efforts to make religion dull and gloomy, and vice delightful and enchanting; our niggardly contributions to any good cause; and our almost boundless prodigality in the furtherance of folly and wickedness, must render our May meetings a mere jest to demons.

But among all this hopefulness for crime and depravity, we cannot help thinking that our drinking customs are more fraught with encouragement than any other practice among us. Strong drink annually destroys thousands of souls, more than are saved by all our Missionary, Bible, and Tract Societies put together. It would be not a little astounding if Satan were to appear on the platform of Exeter-hall, and give to the members of the Bible, or any of the Missionary Societies, a full report of all the persons who, during the last year, have perished through the moderate use of intoxicating liquors. For, as Teetotalers, we must feel, more and more, that it is not drunkenness but moderation that is the great bulwark which we have to demolish before our cause can succeed. Moderation upholds the use of this worst of poisons, which not only brings on disease and premature death, but also paralyses and debases the soul. In the eye of Satan it must be the Prince of Destroyers, and the rival of himself. Were then our arch-destroyer to deliver in a faithful record of bodies slain and souls lost by strong drinks, the catalogue would be the most appalling document that has ever been published to the world; especially if he added, that the most efficient supporters of this deadly practice are the religious men of our day, and none more so than many of those who take a prominent part in the May meetings of Exeter-hall. Almost every report read contains lamentations that the good effected is comparatively small. But if the agents of these noble institutions would only add an appendix containing the mischief that various of its agents, committee men and others, have done to the bodies and souls of mankind, and to the cause of truth, liberty, and religion, by their moderate use of alcoholic beverages, it would be seen that they have not been cyphers in their generation, and that during the past year they have done more, and been more successful, in advancing the destruction than the salvation of mankind. Yes, we speak advisedly, when we affirm that there are not a few ministers of religion, reputedly good and popular men, who by their smoking and drinking—their commendations of strong liquors and opposition to total abstinence—give more souls to Satan than they do to the Lord Jesus Christ.

We were lately thinking that if a May Meeting of all the fallen angels could be called in Pandemonium, and the God of Strong Drink were to preside, a very marvellous narrative might be given to the assembly by the Prince of Darkness. He might tell his compeers in malignity that our little island, and another speck or two on the globe, have begun to move to bring about what they call a "good time;" but that the efforts made were of a most insignificant character. That sometimes, in a population of 40,000 or 50,000 inhabitants, it was difficult to bring together regularly half a dozen men, or women, who would throw their souls into the working of any society that had for its object the real elevation of man and the glory of God. As an evidence, he might state the various plans that have to be adopted to raise a few pounds for the cause of truth and humanity; that some of our rich people, who pass as very religious persons, and who spend hundreds a year on luxury, when applied to for a small subscription to bless and save their poor brethren, part with their money with almost as much caution, and parsimony, and reluctance, as they would with their blood; that popular men are almost worked to death to beg for religious institutions; that some individuals have given up the matter in despair and publicly assert, that the State must take the money by force out of the people's pockets, or else starvation would slay the poor by the thousand, and religion would die out of the land; that the voluntary principle, in doing good, is a greater source of merriment than anything that has ever been said by "Punch;" and that none laugh at it so cordially as those who boast of having arrived at apostolical infallibility in Christianity.

He might turn to the other side, and show that all his servants are perfectly free; that there is no need of bribes or compulsion to make men wicked, or the deplorable of the earth; and especially that he has no lack of agents or money; for, leaving all irreligious, heathenish, or superstitious countries out of the question, in England alone, which boasts of taking the lead in the regeneration of the world, there are at least a hundred people who, directly or indirectly, work for the cause of iniquity, for every ten that take up the cross and follow the Saviour; and as for money, one example may suffice—for not less than ONE HUNDRED MILLIONS are spent in poisons, and wasted through their use; while not more than THREE MILLIONS are voluntarily raised to propagate

TEMPERANCE AND SCURVY.

THE advocates of a good cause are sometimes speculating as to its diffusion and progress; and it is gratifying to know that intelligence respecting the Temperance Reformation has extended even to the Deserts of Arabia! This fact we gather from a letter penned by Dr. Vaughan at Aden, and received in due course at Lloyd's in London, from whence it soon finds its way into the newspapers. The purport of the letter is, that scurvy is on the increase in ships arriving at Aden, principally the ones laden with coals from England; and that the worst cases are invariably in such vessels as do not allow a ration of spirits; the doctor further advises the daily allowance of a portion of spirits, &c.

Is it possible that this letter is part of a preconcerted plan to perpetuate the evils, and along with them the unrighteous gains, of spirit-drinking amongst sailors? At home, steps, as we know, have been taken to diminish the consumption of intoxicating liquors on board ship; thus we have the authorities issuing regulations for the Royal Navy, limiting the spirits to half the usual quantity; while some of the steam-packet companies have interdicted them to the crews of their vessels; when lo! from Aden, a voice is heard—Continue the spirit ration, or your sailors will die of scurvy.

Aden, be it remembered, is a large seaport in the Red Sea, at the southern extremity of the peninsula of Arabia, containing about 15,000 inhabitants, with a trade chiefly in gums, spices, and coffee; and is a place of rendezvous for steamers plying in the commerce between England and India. Hence a sound uttered there, by an official, is pretty sure to be heard by multitudes in both Asia and Europe. It is difficult for medical practitioners, located inland and without experience in the treatment of scurvy, to controvert the views of one who is entrusted with the actual treatment of the disease; nevertheless we can consult standard works and authorities on the subject; and from these we gather, that ardent spirits never have been found a preventive, nor a necessary medicine in the treatment. The Medical Times, one of the leading professional journals of Europe, says, in noticing Dr. Vaughan's letter, "A great step has been made in abandoning the daily ration of spirits. For Heaven's sake, let not that step be lost without sufficient reason and due inquiry. A very ordinary cause for the outbreak of scurvy in vessels proceeding on long voyages, is the atrocious adulteration of the lime-juice supplied them as prophylactic of the disease." Again: "It is evident from the disease being confined principally to coal-laden vessels, that it springs from some local cause:—there must be other causes; want of cleanliness and bad provision, want of good and proper ventilation, foul air, and close damp sleeping places, with insufficient exercise, will be more likely to induce scurvy than the loss of the spirit ration."

We may then, we think, fairly conclude, that the causes of scurvy enumerated above being fairly removed, all necessity for spirituous drinks will vanish with them. And is not the trial worth making? Surely no man with a spark of philanthropy in his bosom, and knowing the miseries and disasters incident to a sailor's life through the use of alcoholic liquors, would hesitate to answer in the affirmative.

Herein we think is Dr. Vaughan's error; he seems not to be aware how far science has demonstrated the propriety of abstinence from spirits in health and disease. We could wish to convey to him a copy of

Dr. Carpenter's Prize Essay, on perusing which we are confident he would see his way out of his present difficulty in treating scurvy in the hospital at Aden; and, if this book is too heavy to be posted, it would be easy to forward him the article from Dr. Forbes's Review, together with a copy of the Medical Certificate. We close for the present (keeping an eye, however, open towards the east), with a few words from the periodical already quoted from: "Drunkards are the very worst subjects there can be for scurvy, as they are more readily attacked, and less easily cured, their stamina and powers of resisting disease being already destroyed."

GRAND TEETOTAL EXCURSION.

THE Committee, under whose management the recent series of meetings in Exeter Hall were held, have determined upon undertaking an Excursion to Tunbridge Wells, in railway carriages, on Monday, July 22. This Excursion is undertaken with a twofold object:—to present to the public something like a demonstration of the strength of Teetotalism in the metropolis and suburbs, and to replenish the funds of the Committee as well as those of the societies that may co-operate with them. As to the funds of the Committee, there is a balance still due to the Treasurer on account of the Exeter Hall meetings; the plan on which the Committee propose to conduct the intended Excursion will, it is believed, not only meet that deficiency, but benefit the local societies in a pecuniary point of view. A SPECIAL MEETING, for the consideration of details, will be held on Wednesday evening, May 1, at Mr. Watts's, Temperance Hotel, Catherine-street, Strand, at eight o'clock precisely, when the attendance of one or more representatives from each society is particularly requested.

The following additions have been made to the list of contributors to the Exeter Hall Demonstrations:—

Mr. Dexter, Chelsea .....	1 1 0
Mr. Cole, Greenwich .....	1 1 0
Rev. R. Tabraham .....	0 10 0
Mr. Clarke .....	0 10 0

Those friends who have not yet sent in their promised donations, are requested to send them without delay to Mr. John Cassell, 80, Fenchurch-street, that the Treasurer's account may be closed.

G. C. CAMPBELL,	} Hon. Secs.
T. B. SMITHIES,
J. H. ESTERBROOKE,

JOHN WESLEY AGAIN.—"Servants of distillers inform me that their masters do not pay for a fortieth part of what they distil; and this duty last year, if I am rightly informed, amounted only to £20,000. But have not the spirits distilled this year cost 20,000 lives of his Majesty's liege subjects? Is not, then, the blood of these men vilely bartered for £20,000? not to say anything of the enormous wickedness which has been occasioned thereby, and not to suppose that these poor wretches have any souls! But (to consider money alone) is the King a gainer, or an immense loser? to say nothing of many millions of quarters of corn destroyed, which, if exported, would have added more than £20,000 to the revenue. Be it considered, 'Dead men pay no taxes;' so that, by the death of 20,000 persons yearly (and this computation is far under the mark), the revenue loses far more than it gains. But I may urge another to you. You are a man. You have not lost human feelings. You do not love to drink human blood. You are a son of Lord Chatham; nay, if I mistake not, you are a Christian! Dare you, then, sustain a sinking nation? Is the God whom you serve able to deliver from ten thousand enemies? I believe He is; nay, and you believe it; and may you fear nothing but displeasing Him."—Letter to the Right Hon. William Pitt by the Rev. John Wesley.—Wesleyan Magazine, page 161, 1850.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

FARRINGTON-STREET.

An interesting gathering of the Teetotalers of the Metropolis and suburbs took place on GOOD FRIDAY, in the large Hall, Farringdon-street. That and the lower room were filled with guests, who partook of various refreshments. In the upper room some choice pieces of music were performed at intervals by the Shapcott family, from Exeter, whose skill in the management of the Sax-horns has gained for them such distinguished celebrity. The infant Shapcott, a boy of about five years old, astonished the audience by the ease and precision with which he performed his part upon the drum. In addition, some favourite pieces were sung in excellent style by a select amateur band. JOHN CASSELL, Esq., occupied the chair till about nine o'clock, when it was filled to the close of the meeting by Dr. Gourley.

The CHAIRMAN began by expressing the pleasure he felt in meeting with the Shapcott family. He had long known Mr. Shapcott as a respectable tradesman, and as a zealous, consistent, hard-working teetotaler; and the Teetotalers of London had now the pleasure of seeing him, with his seven sons, who were all teetotalers. The chairman then referred to the early history of the temperance movement, furnishing several anecdotes illustrative of the character and attainments of the plain and humble men by whom it was introduced to the notice of the world, as also the difficulties with which the system had to contend, and its triumphant progress and present position notwithstanding. The address of the chairman was much cheered.

J. S. BUCKINGHAM, Esq. was most cordially welcomed. He presented, first, a rapid sketch of a tour he had made during the winter through the north of England and several parts of Scotland, where his reception had been most gratifying, and where, with scarcely any exception, he found the principles of temperance fast gaining ground. He then adverted to the circumstance of the present meeting being held on the day on which most professing Christians celebrated the crucifixion of Him whose sacred name they bare, and gave a very interesting account of what he himself had witnessed at Jerusalem, to which place thousands from all quarters of the globe made pilgrimages to worship, on that day, on the spot where the crucifixion was supposed to have taken place, as well as to visit those other spots rendered sacred by the events which occurred upon them. At the same time he referred to the fact, that among the thousands who congregated on such occasions, no case of intemperance was ever witnessed. He added that in the course of a long residence in eastern countries, so far as the natives were concerned, he had rarely witnessed an instance of intemperance; while in this country, professedly Christian, drunkards were to be met at every turn, and, most of all, on those days when they professed to commemorate the birth and death of the spotless Redeemer.

Mr. D. G. PAINE, in the course of an eloquent address, pointed out the gross inconsistency of those who professed an abhorrence of intemperance, and an anxious desire to suppress its outbreaks; but who, at the same time, used, and sanctioned, and even recommended the use of, the very liquors which occasioned those outbreaks. Unless such avowed philanthropists became total abstainers, their exertions to benefit those around them would prove unavailing, and they would remain under the fearful charge of gross inconsistency.

Rev. Mr. M'CREE delivered an impressive address, on the connexion between the temperance movement and popular education; which connexion he illustrated by a number of striking facts. Where the drinking customs prevailed, education was neglected, and books were unread; where temperance prevailed, the means of instruction were eagerly sought, books were read, and libraries formed.

W. P. PERFITT, Esq., descanted, in glowing terms, on the blessed fruits of the temperance movement. Individuals, families, the church, the state, the world, were all benefited by it. Health, intellectual vigour, peace, competence, virtue, usefulness, all resulted from its practice. But greater triumphs awaited it; and how soon its ultimate and most perfect triumphs would be witnessed, depended very greatly upon the gratitude and the corresponding exertions of those on whom it had been the instrument of conferring such unspeakable blessings.

Mr. J. W. GREEN announced the desire of the committee who had conducted the Exeter-hall meetings to make arrangements for an excursion of the teetotalers of London and suburbs to some suitable place at no very great distance from the metropolis; an announcement which was received with much cheering.

Mr. W. SPRIGGS proposed a resolution of thanks to the committee of Hawkstone-hall, for their kindness in allowing the Shapcott family, who had been engaged exclusively by them, to assist that evening; and also to the Messrs. Shapcott, and to those gentlemen and ladies, whose performances, vocal and instrumental, had so greatly enlivened the proceedings.

This resolution was seconded by Mr. J. H. ESTERBROOKE, and carried with acclamation.

The proceedings closed by singing a temperance piece to the music of the National Anthem.

WATERLOO-ROAD.

On Easter Monday an interesting meeting was held in Hawkstone-hall. A large party partook of excellent refreshments. After tea, W. WEST, Esq., who presided, furnished some particulars connected with the building of that hall.

Mr. T. HUDSON delivered an address, in the course of which he recited two pieces, the first, a poem in praise of "Water;" the second, Dr. Mackay's "Gin-fiend."

The Rev. Mr. BILL, from Canada, gave an interesting account of the rise and progress of the Temperance Movement in Canada, and of the zeal with which it was urged forward by ministers of all denominations. The youthful Teetotalers, who are numerous, are formed into societies, as "The Cold Water Army;" "The Sons of Temperance;" and "The Daughters of Temperance."

Mr. T. A. SMITH pointed out some of the advantages which the present advocates of temperance possessed over those who first appeared in the field, and the improved, and improving, state of the temperance movement.

Mr. W. P. PERFITT, in an address of great power, pointed out the duties of Teetotalers, and the results which would certainly follow their discharge of those duties.

Mr. J. W. GREEN proposed, and Mr. W. SIMMS seconded, a resolution of thanks to the chairman, which was carried with cheers, and duly acknowledged.

The principal attraction of the evening was the Shapcott Family, who performed a number of their best pieces, to the great satisfaction and delight of the audience. The ladies and gentlemen who sang at the Hall in Farringdon-street on Good Friday also repeated the anthems, &c., which they then sang. The whole of the proceedings of the evening gave satisfaction, and reflected much credit on the directors.

On Tuesday morning the Shapcott Family gave a musical entertainment to about 700 children, who were packed into the Hall with much difficulty. They were highly delighted, and, there is reason to hope, instructed also, as Mr. Shapcott interspersed the musical performances with some very impressive addresses.

On Tuesday evening the entire period was occupied by the Shapcott Family; the interval between each piece being occupied by Mr. Shapcott, who gave some very interesting portions of his own family history, interspersed with excellent practical cautions, advices, and encouragements. Every one of these short addresses contained an earnest recommendation of total abstinence from strong drinks; tobacco and snuff coming in occasionally for a condemnation.

The musical talents of this family are of no ordinary description, and can scarcely fail to interest and delight. Just before they concluded with the national anthem, Mr. J. W. GREEN proposed a resolution of thanks to Mr. Shapcott, for the pleasure he had afforded the meeting, not only by the excellent musical treat he and his sons had furnished, but also for the judicious, intelligent, and impressive manner in which he had urged the claims of temperance. Mr. Green intimated that it was the desire and intention of the friends who had invited the family to London, to open a wider field for the exercise of their talents than they had occupied during their present visit; and that some gentlemen had it in contemplation to secure Exeter-hall for that purpose at no very distant period. This intimation was received with loud cheers.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. G. C. CAMPBELL, and, being carried with much cheering, was acknowledged by Mr. Shapcott, in very feeling terms.

The little drummer, known in some parts of the west of England as "The Infant Phenomenon," was greatly cheered and caressed, and his performance again excited admiration and applause.

barkation to a foreign land—the battle-field—the return home halt and maimed—and the death of the aged mother. The narrative then concludes with a conversation on war and peace. This narrative, which is interesting in itself, becomes a powerful anti-war lecture, in consequence of the numerous passages, in prose and verse, which the author has introduced from some of the best writers on the subject.

Mr. Russom seems determined that the purchaser of this volume should have a good shilling's worth; for in addition to the foregoing, either of which would be cheap at the money, he has given an Essay, entitled, "Woman's Protection: or the Influence of the Temperance Reformation upon Females, in the several Relations of Life." This is the most eloquent portion of the volume. Its descriptions and illustrations are most forcible; and the facts it furnishes are derived from undeniably sources.

Altogether, we recommend this little volume to every Teetotal family, and to all the friends of the labouring classes, of temperance, of peace, and of female happiness. Let it be carefully read; and when the instruction and entertainment it is so well calculated to afford have been derived from it, let it be lent to neighbours and acquaintances, that they also may be impressed and edified. If any such neighbour or acquaintance should ask, "What good has Teetotalism done?" they will find the question satisfactorily answered in the last five or six pages.

SCAFFOLDING FOR TEETOTAL SOCIETIES; or how to reach the Topstone of the Temperance Reformation.—A Prize Essay. By D. G. PAINE.—London: Houlston and Stoneman, Paternoster Row.

THE laying on "the topstone of the Temperance Reformation" will be a matter of such general rejoicing, that he who contributes towards hastening it, whether by constructing a safe and suitable "scaffolding," or by furnishing materials, or by laying "polished stones" in order, deserves our respect and gratitude. Even if every act and movement does not exactly square with the opinions or prejudices of every looker-on, yet if he make it evident that he has a single eye and a warm heart, and that nothing would delight him more than to see the building rise and advance towards perfection, we will hail him as a friend and a brother. We do not mean to insinuate that Mr. Paine does not come up to our mark: we have known him so long as "a wise master builder," or, to speak without a figure, as an intelligent, judicious, eloquent, and, we may add, popular and successful, advocate of teetotalism, that we could very comfortably confide our cause to his management. If he occasionally betrays sensitiveness as to certain features in some modes of advocating teetotalism, we are quite sure that this arises solely from a jealous fear lest, through any inaccuracy or exaggeration, the least possible injury should be done to a cause to which he has long been ardently attached. We rejoice in the publication of this prize essay, believing, with the adjudicators, that it is "calculated to render efficient service to the temperance cause." To those who undertake the advocacy of that cause, we especially commend it for a careful and candid perusal.

THE TEMPERANCE CYCLOPEDIA. By the Rev. WILLIAM REID, Edinburgh. Parts 1—4. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

THIS little work progresses excellently. It bids fair, when complete, to form an admirable pocket companion for teetotal advocates, a rich repository of texts and illustrations. Judging from the parts now before us, we should say that no volume has hitherto appeared containing such a compendium of valuable information in such a portable form, and at so low a price.

TRACTS FOR THE YOUNG. New series, with Engravings on Wood. Nos. 1—12. London: Tweedie, Falconstreet.

AN admirable addition to this branch of temperance literature, and well suited for distribution in "Bands of Hope," Sabbath-schools, ragged-schools, and among children in general. "Children of a larger growth" may read them with profit. A specimen, "Little Drops," will be found in another part of this number.

WINE AFTER PREACHING. By H. MUDGE, Surgeon, Bodmin. London: Tweedie, Falcon-street.

WE wish a copy of this tract could be placed in the hands of every preacher who imagines that a glass of wine will do him good after he has exerted himself in the pulpit; and also in the hands of deacons, elders, stewards, and others, who imagine that they are rendering the preacher service by providing wine for him. Mr. Mudge, who is himself a preacher as well as a medical practitioner, will, we think, convince such preachers and their friends that they are most grievously mistaken.

THE TEETOTALERS' BUDGET.

A MELANCHOLY CONSIDERATION.—That a nation professedly Christian should, in any way, encourage the manufacture and sale of drinks which stand in the way of all improvement, individual and relative, physical, intellectual, political, social, and moral!

ANGELS UNAWARES!—A vagrant called at a house one Sunday, and begged for some beer, which being refused by the lady, he reminded her that hospitality had sometimes entertained angels unaware; whereupon she retorted, that that be very true, but that she was sure angels didn't go about on Sundays, begging for beer.—Gateshead Observer.

RELIGION AND THE TRAFFIC INCOMPATIBLE.—His visits to the sick landlady of a public-house issued in her salvation and happy death, in the turning to God of several of the family, and the extension of religion in that neighbourhood; but "the sign-board was taken down, and intoxicating liquor ceased to be sold there."—The Wallacestone Reformer.

THE FIRST STEP.—Chateaubriand says: "In new colonies, the Spaniards begin by building a church, the French a ball-room, and the English a tavern." The first step to ruin with many is the pinch of snuff, the social pipe, the fashionable cigar, the sugared spoonful given by a parent's hand, the glass of sparkling wine, the bottom of spirits, the pint at the tavern! Patriots, never rest till England is a sober, a holy nation!—R. Tabraham.

A PUBLICAN'S MAID CONVERTED.—In a gracious revival of religion, the public-house in the village having been deserted one night by its accustomed guests, the landlord was informed by his servant that all were gone to the Methodist Chapel. "Then," said the master, "you may as well go too." She went, and was converted. On her return, she told the master what had taken place, from whom she received the appropriate advice—"Hold it fast, lass; hold it fast, lass." Alas! how could she, if she continued in the public-house.—R. Tabraham.

CURE FOR DRUNKENNESS IN SWEDEN.—The Swedish Government has just enacted certain laws against drunkenness, which show the degree to which that disgusting vice has attained. For the first offence a fine of fifteen rix-dollars is imposed; for the second, thirty rix-dollars; for the third or fourth, the elective franchise and the privilege of being elected a member of Parliament are forfeited; and the offender is moreover exposed in the pillory on the following Sunday in front of the parish church. For the fifth offence the culprit is immured in a house of correction for one year. A person convicted of having induced another to drink to excess, pays fifteen rix dollars, and thirty if the victim be a minor.—Times.

THE LITERATURE OF WORKING MEN.

Just Published, the Second

SUPPLEMENTARY NUMBER of the WORKING MAN'S FRIEND, to be continued Monthly, uniform in size and price with the Weekly Numbers.

These Supplementary Numbers will be devoted entirely to communications from Working Men. An opportunity will thus be afforded to the working classes for furnishing hints and suggestions as to the improvement of their own order, whether physically, socially, or morally. In addition, however, to correspondence of this kind, which will always receive respectful attention, it is the intention of John Cassell, as an encouragement to literary exertion, to award prizes, in the shape of valuable books, to those whose compositions may be considered worthy of insertion. No such article ought to exceed about four pages in length. To articles of that extent, approved by impartial judges, some volume or volumes, to the value of one guinea, selected from a list by the successful writers, will be forwarded, post free; for shorter articles, volumes varying in value from five to fifteen shillings will be sent. The numerous communications which have been received demonstrate, not only that the pages of THE WORKING MAN'S FRIEND are occupied to the satisfaction of the writers, but also the possession of talent among the working classes of no ordinary character. Independently of any inducement of the kind now offered, the proposed Supplementary Numbers could be well filled by the SPONTANEOUS effusions of men who have not only hard hands, but hard-thinking heads—men who are intensely anxious for the elevation of their fellows. At the same time it is believed that the presentation of valuable and instructive works will not only be a suitable acknowledgment to industry and talent, but beneficial in the influence it will exert in the families and circles of the writers. The trade and initials of each contributor will be appended. It is to be well understood that the writers must belong strictly to the operative class. The subjects may embrace morality, social order and comfort, history, biography, art, science, general literature, and the principles and claims of any movement tending to promote the improvement and welfare of the people.

The Fourth Monthly Part of

THE WORKING MAN'S FRIEND and FAMILY INSTRUCTOR, is now ready, price 6d., enclosed in a neat Wrapper.

Just published, price 1s. 6d., neatly bound in cloth, and lettered,

THE FIRST VOLUME of "THE WORKING MAN'S FRIEND AND FAMILY INSTRUCTOR."

JOHN CASSELL'S LIBRARY.

On the FIRST of MAY appeared the FIRST VOLUME of A LIBRARY, designed principally for the Working Classes, but admirably adapted for FAMILIES in general, as well as for SCHOOLS.

The whole of this Library will involve an outlay of only TWELVE SHILLINGS. It will comprise TWENTY-FOUR VOLUMES, Sixpence each, containing one hundred and forty-four pages; or TWELVE DOUBLE VOLUMES, One Shilling each; if handsomely bound, Four Shillings extra will be charged for the series.

The design of JOHN CASSELL, in entering upon an undertaking of such magnitude and responsibility, is to place within the reach of the most humble individual who is desirous of the instruction and improvement of his own household, such a class of works as will accomplish this object at the cheapest possible rate. The LIBRARY will include History—Geography—Voyages and Travels—Biographies of the World's best Men—Physiology—Discoveries and Improvements in Science and Art—&c. &c. and may be obtained by twenty-four monthly payments of Sixpence each; twelve payments of One Shilling each every two months; or, if handsomely bound, at Sixteenpence.

FOR SUMMER WEAR.—The Thin Gutta Percha Soles are strongly recommended. They not only resist all wet and moisture, thus preserving the health of the wearer, but being so much thinner than leather, they are extremely light and cool for summer wear.

NOTICE.

The Gutta Percha Company beg to state that when the soles are applied according to their "Directions to Shoemakers," it is impossible for them to come off until worn through, and they therefore urge the public to employ those only who will "warrant" them to adhere. This notice is necessary in consequence of interested parties having intentionally fixed the soles on imperfectly.

TO EMIGRANTS, CAPTAINS, &c.

No one should leave England without providing himself with a stock of Gutta Percha Soles and Solution. The ease with which these soles can be applied in countries where no shoemaker can be found—their power of keeping the feet perfectly dry, thus preserving the body from coughs, colds, &c., in lands where medical advice cannot be had—and their great durability and cheapness, render them invaluable to all who propose sailing to distant countries. Gutta Percha Wash-basins, Chamber-bowls, Bottles, Flasks, &c., are admirably suited for shipboard and emigrants, as they can so readily be converted into life-buoys in the event of a shipwreck.

TO ARCHITECTS, &c.

In consequence of the extraordinary power possessed by Gutta Percha Tubing for propelling sound, it is admirably adapted for conveying messages, &c., in Dwelling Houses, Hotels, Warehouses, Mills, &c. This Tubing is also valuable for conveying Gas, Water, and as Refuse Pipes, being unaffected by acids, alkalies, grease, &c., and not so subject to incrustation or affected by the frost as metal pipes.

MILL BANDS.

The increasing demand for the Gutta Percha strapping for driving-bands, lathe-straps, &c., fully justifies the strong recommendations they have everywhere received.

PUMP BUCKETS, CLACKS, &c.

Few applications of Gutta Percha appear likely to be of such extensive use to Manufacturers, Engineers, &c., as the substitution of it for leather in pump-buckets, valves, &c. These buckets can be had of any size and thickness, without any seam or raised joint. They are unaffected by acids, grease, alkalies, &c. Cold water will never soften them, and they are consequently much more durable than leather, and also cheaper.

GUTTA PERCHA PICTURE FRAMES AND ORNAMENTS.

In imitation of the finest wood carving, suitable for the decoration of houses, cabinet work, &c.

GUTTA PERCHA CRICKET-BALLS

are superior to any others yet invented. They are never softened by the grass, however wet, and being made without any stitching, are not liable to rot like the leather ones.

GUTTA PERCHA BOUNCING BALLS

may be had in every variety of colour.

GUTTA PERCHA CLOTHES-LINES.

Being unaffected by the weather, they may be left out in the open air without sustaining injury.

GUTTA PERCHA WINDOW-BLIND CORD

is easily joined by heating the ends. Does not contract and expand like the ordinary cord. It may be had of various colours.

Every other variety of Gutta Percha articles, such as Brackets, Pen-trays, Inkstands, Medallions, Surgical Instruments, Vases, Trays, Watch-stands, Cups, Flasks, Lathe Bands, Clothes-line, Cricket and Bouncing Balls, Pump Buckets, Galvanic Batteries, Chamber-bowls, Washing-basins, Cash-bowls, Ornamental Flower-pots and Stands, Soap-dishes, Electric Telegraph Wire, &c., are manufactured at Wharf-road, City-road, London, and sold by their dealers in town and country.

when upwards of sixty partook of tea. The meeting was afterwards addressed by the chairman, the Rev. Mr. Cullen, Independent minister, and Messrs. Brook, Smith, and Walker, of Trowbridge.

HASTINGS AND ST. LEONARDS.

From the Report of the Total Abstinence Association of this place, we learn that the past year has been one of considerable effort. In addition to the usual local agency, ten excellent and instructive lectures have been given by Mr. P. W. Perfit, of London, leaving a powerful impression on the minds of those who attended, and inducing many to unite themselves to the society. At a subsequent period, four valuable lectures were delivered by Mr. T. Hudson, with good effect. About 3,000 Temperance tracts (kindly presented to the society by J. Cassell, Esq., of London) have been circulated in the neighbourhood, principally among the railway labourers, besides pamphlets and important documents relating to the different points of the Temperance subject. Another feature of the past year's labours deserves notice—viz., the division of the towns into districts, and the appointment of an agent to each to visit the members, thereby bringing them more directly under the knowledge of the committee, and otherwise effecting considerable good. The present number of accredited members is 130, besides the Pett branch mentioned in the last report. The income of the society during the past year was £20 3s. 8d.; expenditure and liabilities, £34 8s. 4d.

YORK.

The thirteenth annual report of the York Temperance Society speaks in favourable terms of the operations during the past year. In addition to the usual weekly meetings, several ministers and lecturers have delivered powerful appeals, which have been listened to with pleasure. Many abandoned characters have become ornaments to the Christian Church. The City Missionary is engaged in addressing public meetings in the city and neighbourhood, visiting from house to house, distributing tracts, and in otherwise endeavouring to reclaim the drunkard; and his labours, in many instances, have been successful. The York Female Temperance Association continues in vigorous operation. Special meetings have been held, and addresses delivered to females exclusively, many of whom have been induced to adopt the temperance pledge. Not the least important portion of the movement in York is the formation of the "Band of Hope, or Sunday School and Youths' Temperance Union." Many of its members are Sunday scholars. Monthly meetings of this branch are held, at which addresses have been delivered by Sunday-school teachers and others. To the Report is appended "the medical testimony," with the signatures of nearly two thousand medical practitioners.

SCARBOROUGH.

Easter week was a busy time with the teetotalers of this place. The fourteenth anniversary of the society was celebrated in the Odd Fellows' hall, on Easter Tuesday, when upwards of 320 of the members and their friends sat down. The report was read, which spoke highly of the prosperity of the society. Addresses were delivered by the chairman (the Rev. B. Evans), the Rev. W. Newsome, Mr. W. Rowntree, Mr. Morley, Mr. T. Whittaker, and others, including that long-tried friend of the cause, Mr. James Teare. The whole of the week was devoted to the cause, and many interesting appeals on behalf of the Temperance Reformation were made, one in particular, the most affecting address that has been made before a Scarborough audience, was given by Mr. David Greenbury, late of Malton, whose recital of the life he had formerly led, as a pugilist, drunkard, &c., were strikingly contrasted by his present appearance and station in society. The account of his sparring companions—his adoption of the temperance principles ten years ago—his visit to the prison in after life to witness the cell where he had passed so much of his wretched existence—his conversion to Christianity, and finally his elevation as a minister of the Gospel, caused a feeling of sympathy in the hearts of all present, which is not likely to be soon effaced from memory. Mr. James Teare, in his address, declared that during the fifteen years in which he had been advocating the temperance principles he had never met with one who had given him so much delight, or made such a deep impression upon his mind as the speaker who had just addressed them; and if teetotalism had done no more than the reclaiming of him from the gulf of intemperance and crime, he should be perfectly satisfied with its results.

At the annual meeting Mr. Enoch Tindall was elected president for the ensuing year.

The late president, Mr. William Wood, having removed from Scarborough to York, a subscription is being raised for the purpose of presenting him with a testimonial for his long and arduous exertions in the cause of temperance in this town and neighbourhood.

HINCKLEY.

The members and friends of the Juvenile Temperance Society celebrated their anniversary by a tea-meeting, held in the vestry of the Independent Chapel, on Thursday the 4th April. A large and respectable assembly partook of the refreshments prepared for the occasion. Tea over, the chairman (the Rev. T. Smith) commenced by briefly stating the objects of the meeting, and strongly urged the claims of abstinence upon the younger portion of those present. Mr. Pacey, of Nuneaton, spoke on the advantages derived from being connected with temperance societies, introducing many pleasing anecdotes into his address. Next followed the performance of a piece entitled "Pope Alcohol and Temperance," by Messrs. S. Preston, jun., Everitt, and Elton, which gave great satisfaction; after which the same parties, together with Mr. James Vero, of Sketchley-house, and a Mr. Chaplin, of Hinckley, addressed the meeting in very interesting speeches. Fifteen signatures were added to the pledge of the society.—S. PRESTON, jun.

PATMOS, TODMORDEN, LANCASHIRE.

We have recently had an important Temperance Demonstration here. The meeting was held in Patmos School room (Independent). At seven o'clock the meeting commenced by singing; after which the Rev. Enoch Darke engaged in prayer. The Rev. Robert Martin (Independent), of Heckmondwike, presided. He remarked, in his opening address, that he had been a teetotaler nine years. In the autumn of 1840, he announced from the pulpit his intention to preach two sermons on drunkenness, which ended in five. In the second sermon he avowed himself an uncompromising teetotaler, declaring that teetotalism was the only remedy for drunkenness. The meeting was further addressed by Mr. Joshua Whiteley, from Manchester, and Mr. James Fielden, of Pexwood, near Todmorden, who said he had been a teetotaler for sixteen years. Mr. John Whiteley, of Littletown, a reformed character, in a manner which told well upon the meeting, depicted the awful state to which intoxicating drink had brought him. The temperance pledge found him without clothing for his body, but now he had his cows and land; he also manufactured a little. The Rev. E. Darke, Association Minister, of Todmorden, concluded the meeting in a short but comprehensive speech. He had been an abstainer about seventeen years. A good impression was made, the meeting being, as some remarked, the best that had been held in Todmorden. The meeting separated about half-past ten o'clock.

NEWARK.

The Newark Total Abstinence Society held their thirteenth anniversary in the New Corn Exchange, on Easter Monday. On Sunday, March 31st, a preparatory sermon was preached by the Rev. G. Grundy (New Connexion Minister), in the Independent Chapel, and on Monday afternoon upwards of 350 of the friends drank tea together in the Exchange. A public meeting was afterwards held, and addresses were delivered by Dr. Mower, of Nottingham, Rev. J. Richardson (Primitive Methodist), Rev. G. Grundy, and Mr. J. Blow, of Nocton, Lincolnshire. The chair was ably filled by the Rev. J. Babington, rector of Cossington, Leicestershire. The audience was large and attentive. At the close thirteen adults and twenty-two juveniles signed the pledge, and nine since; and, during the past year 131 adults and 81 juveniles have joined the society. Newark is one of the strongholds for manufacturing malt and drink. Of course there is a vast amount of prejudice and interest to grapple with. It was stated in print some time ago that 500,000 quarters of barley were converted into malt in one year in Newark; and the "death waggons" are constantly passing from our breweries with the waters of affliction for the poor slaves in the neighbourhood, whom we sometimes hear singing "Britons never shall be slaves!" Our society numbers upwards of 250 adults and 200 juveniles. Many have united themselves with Christian societies since they signed the pledge, and we are anticipating still greater success.

POWEY, CORNWALL.

Extract from a letter from Mr. Joseph Bormond:—"March 25, 1850.—I am just closing a six months' engagement with the committee of this Association. The six months have passed rapidly without one draw-back from either peace, pleasure, or profit. About sixty thousand minds have been reached, and nearly fifteen hundred names added to the roll-books of the societies. The cause in Cornwall is in good hands, and while such are spared in the providence of God, there is little to fear. Such persons as J. D. Martyn, Esq., H. Moody, Esq., surgeon, R. P. Griffin, Esq., Mr. Balkwell, and John Elliott, Esq., and his interesting sisters, are sure to advance any cause they take in hand. Their standing and respectability, their firmness of purpose, and, above all, their high moral sense, will overcome all and any difficulty, and outlive and live down all opposition and prejudice. All Cornwall is now alive to the deeply interesting question of temperance. Many disjointed societies have acquired new life and activity, and others are quickened. This is now one of the best and most effective Associations in the kingdom."

JERSEY.

On Easter Monday the eleventh anniversary of the Jersey Total Abstinence Society was celebrated by a procession and public tea-festival. The members proceeded (accompanied by a brass band, and with banners unfurled) from the Temperance-hall to the Bible Christians' place of worship, where a sermon, suitable for the occasion, was preached by Mr. Maynard, the minister. Afterwards they had intended walking through other parts of the town, but were prevented, as the rain poured in torrents, and therefore returned to the Hall, where about 450 persons sat down to tea, all of whom seemed pleased with the arrangements; after which the society's report for the past year was read by the secretary, James Metevier, and its adoption carried unanimously. Mr. Bryant (the President) then addressed the meeting, and glanced at the movement since its establishment in this island. Dr. F. R. Lees, whom the society had engaged, then delivered a lecture on total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks. He entertained a large audience for about two hours on the objections brought forward against this movement. Since then he has delivered five other lectures, and there was a steady increase in attendance. We have had the co-operation of the British Press newspaper, published in this island, in which an analysis of all the lectures has appeared. Dr. Lees challenged any one to come forward and dispute his assertions, but no one did so; and the whole of his lectures were conducted in the most orderly manner. The medical men were invited to attend, as well as all classes of the community. Dr. Lees has argued the question in all its bearings; and his manner of argument is so plain and convincing that none but prejudiced minds would go away without some impression of the truth of our principles.—The cause is steadily progressing in this island amidst a vast amount of drunkenness.

DUNDEE.

From the twelfth annual report of the society in this place, we learn that the weekly meetings have been generally well attended, as well as those held occasionally. Interesting and impressive lectures have been delivered by the Rev. A. Hannay, Mr. R. Reid, and Mr. E. Grubb. A large circulation of tracts and other temperance publications has taken place, averaging about 1,150 monthly. During the year 1849 about 740 members were enrolled, making the total number of members 950. The society of females, also, has met monthly, and its members have engaged extensively in tract distribution. The temperance movement is rapidly gaining to its ranks men of enlightened zeal and earnest piety. The place given to the temperance question in the public prints—the continued success of the Abstinence Society in connection with the United Presbyterian Church—and the formation of the Free Church Abstinence Society for the suppression of intemperance, in June last, and which has gained the adherence of upwards of fifty ministers, all indicate the growth of the cause.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.

TEMPERANCE FESTIVAL AT KAW.—Mr. Paris, in a letter from Kaw, dated June 10, in describing an interesting Temperance celebration, which had just taken place, of all the Protestant schools in the district, says:—

"Superintendents, teachers, parents, and children, were all assembled. Each school marched under its own banner, until they came to a beautiful grove in front of our house. Here the parents and friends had prepared a feast of the best things in the land. The schools having arrived at the spot, stood in two ranks, while all united in a song of praise to God; after which, prayer was offered. Then all seated themselves in order, and partook of such things as were provided, while their parents served.

"The children having finished their meal, the parents seated themselves, and did justice to what was left, while the children served. The whole number, including parents, children, and friends, amounted to nearly two thousand persons. It was a delightful day, and we had the still est and most orderly feast, for so many children, I ever witnessed. The children were also all clothed neatly, most of them in uniform. I could not but think how differently these children appeared, with their bright and happy faces, from what they and others did eight years ago, when I first came among them. Then there was scarcely a child in Kaw who had a shirt, or any other article of clothing of foreign manufacture; and many of them were more destitute of covering than the beasts of the field.

"When all had feasted, and spent a little time in social intercourse, we were marched to the house of God, where we had several short but very appropriate addresses on the subject of temperance. These were accompanied with temperance songs and instrumental music, after which, we closed with prayer. The exercises were deeply interesting to myself and all present."—Journal American Temperance Union.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

A WORD TO THE WORKING CLASSES, on their Improvement and Elevation: with other Pieces. By J. RUSSELL. London: Houlston and Stoneman, Paternoster-row.

MR. RUSSELL'S address to the working classes is divided into three sections. After an introduction, in which the general importance of the subject is urged, the first section consists of an exposure of "the EVILS under which the working classes are at present suffering." These are represented as numerous; but the evil, that which originates, aggravates, and perpetuates most of the others, if not the whole of them, is declared to be the fatal passion for strong drink. Abundant testimony on this head is furnished. The second section treats of the REMEDY. Cleanliness and health of body are insisted upon as of high importance; and to secure these Mr. Russell recommends ventilation—the removal of impurities—cleanliness of habitation—cleanliness of person and clothes—and abstinence from strong drink. Their mental cultivation is largely insisted upon, and the different sources from whence knowledge is derived are shown to be, observation, reading, conversation, study, and public instruction by lectures, &c. The importance of order and regularity as to time, place, the uses of things, &c., is urged, and the possession of TRUE RELIGION is insisted upon, as that without which health of body and the highest mental cultivation would be nothing worth. The third section abounds with examples in illustration of working men having, by mental culture, &c., improved and elevated themselves. The essay is concluded by an earnest exhortation to the working classes to avail themselves of the numerous aids afforded them for overcoming the force of bad habits, that they may attain to the enjoyment of all the blessedness attendant upon physical, intellectual, and moral excellence.

Mr. Russell has evidently applied himself to his task in the true spirit of a man bent on the improvement and elevation of the important class to whom he addresses himself; and we think that few of that class can read his address without determining to exert themselves, till they attain the position the advantages of which he so eloquently describes.

The next portion of this little volume consists of a narrative designed to illustrate a series of engravings by Gilbert, recently published, entitled "The Soldier's Progress." "A Soldier's Sufferings, or the History of Richard Thompson," is intended to point out the evils of the war system. It commences with the enlistment of a farmer's servant while in a state of intoxication; then follow descriptions of the misery introduced by this means into a once happy family—the demoralizing character of the barracks—military punishments—em-

FITZROY TEETOTAL ASSOCIATION.

We have held recently special meetings as under, in our hall, Little Portland-street, Marylebone:—

Friday, March 29th, a soiree, when 290 friends sat down to tea and commenced operations precisely at the time announced. An address, from the pen of John O'Neil, having been read, Mr. G. Pickett took the chair, and having briefly adverted to the growing interest manifested towards the subject of temperance, and referred to the recent magnificent gatherings at Exeter-hall, introduced a number of friends, who occupied part of the evening by temperance songs, recitations, addresses, and dialogues; the intervals being occupied by the Cambrian amateur harmonists, who performed in excellent style several ancient British lyrics, anthems, and other pieces, which met with repeated rounds of applause, and some of which were encored. Amongst the friends who took part were W. Watson, Esq., Messrs. Vallance, Hadland, Taylor (of Bermondsey), Elijah Brown (the Boston poet), H. and F. Draper, Miller, Jeanes, and others. Dessert was supplied during the evening, and the company separated just after ten, gratified with the successful exertions of the committee.

On Easter Monday 150 persons sat down to a free teaparty, which had been provided by private contributions, expressly for that class of persons who are too indifferent about attending our usual meetings, and whose attention is much too frequently absorbed in the follies connected with drinking customs; these were principally met with by the committee in visiting from house to house, and leaving temperance tracts. We were happy to find the invitations were not in vain; the addresses given and the melodies sang, made an impression on many which will not be soon forgotten. At the end of the meeting twenty-two signed the pledge, the chairman (Mr. Vallance) having previously announced that they were under no obligation, save that of being convinced of the truth, so to do. Messrs. Lennan, Moody, Gentry, G. Draper, the secretary, and Mr. Pickett, took part in the proceedings.

On the following evening (Easter Tuesday) Mr. H. Draper occupied the chair, when the interest was sustained by Messrs. Madden, Carss, Simmons, Cowdry, and the Boston Poet, who enlivened the meeting with home melody. Ten signed.

On Thursday, the 4th, an experience meeting was held. Mr. Godfrey occupied the chair; and, having read a chapter from the Bible, and implored the Divine blessing, he related his experience in connexion with the practice of entire abstinence from all inebriating drinks; followed by ten others, who all testified to the benefits they had derived from its adoption, which, in several of their cases, had been for twelve and fourteen years. Some pledges were received.

Tuesday, the 9th, the usual weekly meeting—a capital meeting. Stirring addresses by Messrs. Mudie, Hadland, Pybus, Brown, Cripps, Lemon, and Steele. Ten signed.

Thursday, the 11th, was convened the first meeting of the Band of Hope, in connexion with this society, and the scene was truly animating, the children filling the body of the hall, while their parents and friends, as anxious and delighted spectators, crowded the galleries. The chair was occupied by the honorary secretary, Mr. J. P. Draper, who expressed his regret at the unavoidable absence of the gentleman (Mr. Smithies) who was to have presided, especially as his absence was occasioned by severe illness. Rev. Mr. McCree, in an interesting manner, then addressed them, questioning them as he proceeded, and thus eliciting the fact that they understood what they heard. Recitations were spoken by five of the young folk—Miss Brooks, E. and M. Wallis, Masters Kay, Jeanes, and Simmons. Mr. Watson and Mr. Roberts, in neat and short addresses, placed the evils of partaking of strong drink before them, and the nature of the drinks themselves, deducing therefrom two lessons—that the drinks are bad, and therefore very dangerous to use them, and that it is easy and safe to be teetotalers. Hymns from the Band of Hope Melodies were sung during the evening. At the close those who wished to become pledged teetotalers were requested to hold up their hands, when a large number were shown, to each of whom were given the schedule paper to be filled up, with their parents' names attached (as signifying their consent to the pledge being given), to be returned on the next meeting. Tracts were distributed, and the party separated.

CHILDREN'S DEMONSTRATION.

An interesting meeting of the "Juvenile Band of Hope," connected with the City of Westminster Christian Total Abstinence Association, was held in the Great Hall, Work-street, on the 5th inst. JOHN CASSELL, Esq., President, occupied the chair, and delivered a powerful address in favour of the young being preserved from the drinking usages and habits of society, and the vital importance of juvenile temperance bands. He was ably supported by Mr. Harris, Wesleyan class-leader; Rev. I. Doxsey; and Mr. W. Tweedie; whose convincing and eloquent remarks received merited applause. The children recited temperance pieces, and sung several melodies, and were warmly cheered. The members connected with the local ragged schools were presented with a beautiful Band of Hope medal and blue sash, for faithfully adhering to their pledge. The attendance of the young was very numerous. The boxes and other parts of this commodious hall were crowded by respectable persons, all of whom manifested a lively interest in the proceedings of the evening. Our juvenile mission is extending wider and becoming more important every day. The children of influential tradespeople are continually enrolling their names, as no distinctions are recognised in our "Band of Hope."

WESTMINSTER JUVENILE TEETOTAL BAND (IN CONNEXION WITH THE WESLEYAN TEETOTAL UNION).

This Juvenile Society, which has for its principal object the benefit of Sunday-school Children, held a public meeting on Easter Tuesday, and also on Tuesday, April 23d, at Prince's-place, Westminster, on both of which occasions, lads of very tender years addressed a numerous and respectable audience; and on the last occasion many were disappointed of a seat, so great is the interest excited by these Juvenile Advocates of the cause. The applause given to these speeches far exceeded that usually accorded to adult efforts. Indeed, there are many men of six feet who would be sorry to enter the lists with these Young Advocates. The children belonging to the Band also recited Teetotal and Scriptural pieces, and sang a selection of sacred music by Haydn and other eminent composers, which was applauded to the echo. Altogether, the impression made will not be soon erased from the minds of those present.

RAGGED SCHOOLS AND TEETOTALISM.

A very numerous and respectable meeting of the friends of Ragged Schools was held in the large room of the Field-lane Ragged School, Victoria-street, Holborn-bridge, on Wednesday evening, April 3, 1850. J. G. Gent, Esq., Secretary of the Ragged School Union in the chair, for the purpose of taking leave of Mr. William Tomkins, the London City Missionary in the Field-lane district (a teetotaler of twelve years' standing) who is going to the United States of America; and six young men, scholars in this school, who are about to emigrate, through the assistance of the Ragged School Union and the Field-lane School, to the United States of America and Port Natal.

In the course of the evening, the worthy CHAIRMAN delivered a very impressive address to the young men, in which he took occasion to say: I believe that more young men fall in the colonies through drink, than from any other cause. I would, therefore, advise you to keep from the drink; if you please, be teetotalers, and drink nothing but water. I would also strongly advise you to avoid that bad habit of smoking, for it is not only bad in itself, but it frequently leads to drinking.

Mr. R. MOUNTSTEPHEN, superintendent of the school, stated that he had been to America, and that seven or eight persons, who went out in the same vessel with him, died in New York in the course of a fortnight after their arrival, from the effects of drink.

Mr. H. TITE stated that, in order to increase his usefulness in his class, he had been constrained to give up the intoxicating drink.

After the meeting had closed, one of the committee, who is a staunch teetotaler, produced his pocket pledge-book, and had the pleasure of taking the signatures of the six young emigrants. We felt much pleasure in attending this meeting, for here the misery of intemperance was not only pointed out, but the remedy was made known at the same time, viz., to abstain from the cause of intemperance, and then the effect would cease as a matter of course.

We have had some years' experience in ragged schools, and our firm conviction is, that until total abstinence from intoxicating drink forms a part of the education imparted to the children in these schools, little permanent good will be effected.

BRIXTON AND CAMBERWELL.

In developing our truthful principles, we are called upon to experience so much opposition from the ministers of religion, that it comes like the dew upon the mown grass, when we are occasionally favoured with an instance of liberality. I have much delight, therefore, in acknowledging the generous-mindedness exhibited by the Rev. S. Eldridge towards our Brixton and Camberwell Temperance Association, although his sentiments are not exactly in accordance with our own on the important subject of total abstinence from all that intoxicates. We were enabled, through the kindness of the above-named gentleman and the school committee, to hold a very satisfactory meeting in the school-room of Trinity Chapel, Brixton, on Tuesday evening, March 26. It went off with great eclat. D. D. Gouley, Esq., M.D., presided, and favoured the meeting with a detailed and thoroughly scientific proof that alcohol is altogether bad for the human system. Talented and telling speeches were also given by the Rev. S. W. Tracy, D.D.; George Campbell, Esq.; Rev. Jonathan George, Rev. I. Dossy, and W. R. Selway, Esq. In addition to several pledges obtained at the time, some of the influential members of the church connected with the schools have, from the eminently-practical efforts of this evening, determined to try for themselves, and we shall, ere long, expect to hail them as fellow-labourers in our glorious enterprise. We feel encouraged to shout "Onward! onward!" believing that we shall reap a goodly harvest in the district to which we have devoted our best energies. The following resolution has been adopted unanimously by our committee, viz.:—"That it is advisable to hold a Grand Temperance Bazaar in London during the season of 1851, the funds derivable from this source to be devoted towards carrying out Mr. Robert Warner's excellent project for a Fitting Temperance-hall, Club, and Hotel."—T. C. PREBBLE.

THAME.

The Temperance Society celebrated its ninth anniversary by a public festival, in the Royal British School, on Easter Monday. The early part of the day being propitious, a goodly number of the friends of the cause were present from the surrounding towns and villages. In the afternoon an appropriate discourse was delivered by I. Dossy, in the Independent Chapel, kindly lent for the occasion. At five o'clock, about 200 members and friends sat down to tea; at six o'clock the evening meeting commenced, when powerful and telling speeches were delivered by the chairman, E. Adey, Baptist minister; I. Dossy; J. P. Edwards; J. Hamilton; and other speakers. The meeting was enlivened at intervals by the temperance band, and closed about ten o'clock, to universal satisfaction. The result was nine signatures to the pledge.

W. WHEELER, Secretary.

READING.

The annual meeting of the Temperance Society was held last month. The chair was taken by Mr. JOHN TYLER, who made some suitable remarks.

Mr. WELSH, an aged Baptist minister, gave some of the results of his observations during forty years that he had been a minister. He had seen young men start with property and respectability, who, by company and strong drink, had fallen very low. Much dishonour had been done to God and his cause, and he had had to exclude some from his church for drinking. He closed by exhorting all, especially the young, to adopt the principle, particularly referring to the great number of wretched females who crowd our streets, who, but for strong drink, would but few, if any of them, have fallen.

Rev. E. BISHOP, the superintendent of the Primitive Methodists in the town, said that he believed, when he joined, he was making a sacrifice of liquors that were beneficial to him. He joined more particularly because of observing two individuals; one seemed all that was amiable and pious, and stood high in the church. He saw that person fall from piety, character, domestic happiness, into many, if not all, the dire calamities connected with drinking. The other was a hopeless sot, who, though he could earn 30s. or 40s. a week, lived on the hard-earnings of his wife; he would work for a month as a teetotaler, and, at the month's end, would take his money and spend it all; and when there was no more money or credit, would return to his work in a sad state, and work for another month in the same way, with the same results. This man went to a temperance meeting and signed the pledge. His wife said he would keep it till he had his money again. His old companions missed him, and they watched him. They went to his workshop, when they knew he would have taken his money, and tried to lead him the same round again; but he said he had no money—he had taken it to his wife, and would the next month's, and the next; and he has done so now for seven or eight years. When he saw intoxicating drinks pull one man down, and total abstinence raise another up, he thought, "Have I anything to do in this case? May not my drinking home-brewed have helped the one to his fate? and may not my abstinence assist in establishing the other?" Total abstinence, though not religion, domestic comfort, education, or health, yet made a man sober; and then the minister might lead the man to the house of God, with the hope of doing him good, and the schoolmaster might educate the children, who, perhaps, before were too ragged even for a ragged school.

Mr. BISHOP found, after ten years, that instead of his health suffering, it had improved by total abstinence.

The Rev. W. GUESR, Congregational minister, exhorted the members not to regard being called enthusiasts, &c. All who promoted reform were enthusiasts; those who demanded the emancipation of the 700,000 slaves were called so; so were those who went to the Peace Congress to promote arbitration instead of war. If you do good, you must go before others. As drinking had led to one-third of the insanity, two-thirds of the poverty, three-fourths of the crime, brought thousands to a drunkard's grave, and expelled thousands from our churches, he asked, what else could be done to remedy the evil? Some said that the remedy was too violent; but it was not. The old temperance society, with the Queen at its head, had proved an utter failure; it had not reclaimed drunkards, but total abstinence had. He then said that wine never did him any good; his health, the last twelve months, had been better than before. He concluded by wishing the cause every success, and exhorted all to perseverance.

Some short speeches were made. A vote of thanks to the Mayor for the use of the Town-hall was then passed. This gentleman, by the way, is a wine and spirit merchant, distiller, &c. A vote of thanks to the chairman closed the meeting. Several signed the pledge.

MELKSHAM.

The society in this place has recently been re-organized. March 25, a meeting was held in the British School. The chair was occupied by Mr. J. Newman, of Cirencester; and after he and Mr. J. Pitt had addressed the audience, a lecture was delivered by Samuel Bowly, Esq., of Gloucester. He began by remarking on the serious character of the temperance movement, arising from the fact, that a great number of casualties and deaths were occasioned by the use of strong drinks. It was not so much, he said, against drunkenness that teetotalers contended, as against the use of strong drinks; for they saw that by the use of those drinks, many intelligent persons, and persons who occupied high stations, were despoiled of their characters, their health, and their usefulness. He urged the importance of total abstinence upon the young, as a sure preservative from those evils; and also the importance of parents setting their children a good example in this respect. Persons might excuse themselves by saying that they had a right to do as they liked in small matters; but he denied that any man had a right to injure himself, or to injure those around him. God had owned and blessed the instrumentality of teetotalism; and those who called themselves patriots and philanthropists ought to assist forward such a cause, even if it involved some sacrifice. Mr. Bowly recommended total abstinence to the working men present, both on physical grounds, and from motives of economy; they ought, also, to set their faces against the compulsory drinking customs of factories and workshops. He then pointed out some of the evils which resulted from the establishment of beer-shops, and urged those present to unite to put them down; intimating, however, that if they all determined to abstain, there would be no need to memorialize the government to do away with beer-shops. The practice of moderate drinking was next exposed, and the evils to which it led were pointed out. There was no security short of total abstinence; and all who desired their own safety and the safety of others, should become abstainers. He concluded by exhorting all present to do so. He himself had signed the pledge before a thousand people, and he trusted some would have the courage to come forward that evening. Eight persons responded to this invitation. On Easter Monday a social tea-meeting was held in the same place,

CAUTION RESPECTING JOHN CASSELL'S COFFEE.

JOHAN CASSELL finds it necessary to caution the Consumers of his justly-famed COFFEE against purchasing imitations of his Packages. The fact that his Establishment is the largest in the kingdom, and his COFFEE most extensively consumed, has led numerous parties to attempt making up very inferior articles in the same style of Package; and some, to induce tradesmen to substitute their spurious article for that of JOHN CASSELL, offer a larger amount of profit. This has a tendency to prejudice the public, and hence the necessity of thus informing them that no Coffee can be the veritable JOHN CASSELL'S COFFEE unless his signature is upon each Package. Go therefore to the Agent for JOHN CASSELL'S COFFEE, ask for JOHN CASSELL'S COFFEE, and see that it is JOHN CASSELL'S COFFEE which is handed to you, having his Signature upon the Package. ## STRONG DRINK AND MAY MEETINGS. A DREAM.

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

IN the last number of THE TEETOTAL TIMES we supposed that there were May Meetings and anniversaries among fallen angels; and that they congratulated themselves, not only respecting the worldly-mindedness and lethargy of the Church, but also that not a few of our most popular speakers were dumb on the subject of drunkenness, and actually patronized all kinds of strong drink. The subject made a deep impression on my mind, and was, doubtless, the cause of the following dream:—

In my vision I thought that there was assembled, on a large gloomy plain, an immense number of horrid-looking creatures, such as I had never seen before, and of such malignant looks and gestures that it would be impossible for any tongue or pen to describe. The sight would certainly have frightened me out of my sleep, only I supposed I had near me a very strong guardian angel, who took me there that I might hear a little of what was going on among these spirits, and who assured me that neither of us could be seen. I soon understood that the meeting was a public one, and that it was occasioned by some fresh news that had just arrived from earth; and on a little more attention, I discovered that our May Meetings were the subject.

Notwithstanding the furious creatures that seemed to compose the audience, there was a good deal of order, and my guide informed me that devils never quarrel or fight among themselves, but are perfectly unanimous in all they do. "It is only," said he, "among your brethren that policemen are wanting, or that persons wage war with each other." "And," added he, "you have among your clergy and doctors in divinity a great many gentlemen, and popular men too, who are remarkable favourites with Beelzebub, because they advocate war and bloodshed, and return thanks so devoutly when men are blown to atoms by the cannon, cut in pieces by the sword, and trampled in the dust under the hoofs of the horses; while their souls are precipitated, unprepared, into the bottomless pit. Demons rarely laugh; but if ever they do, it is when they hear great and learned doctors praying for the salvation of the world, and at the same time thanking Immanuel that he has given such victories to your armies, and, as a consequence, sent so many immortal spirits to an eternity for which they were not at all ready. They are more struck, also, with this matter, because a tithe of the money spent in war would have brought the millennium long ago."

By a little attention, I found that our great poet had rightly named several of these false spirits in his "Paradise Lost," and that their names were still, perhaps, more expressive of their characters than ever. I suppose that practising the same vices over and over again, for so many centuries, has given an indelibility to their moral temperament, and makes them perfect adepts in the work they undertake. Satan, Beelzebub, Moloch, Ashtaroth, Mammon, and Bacchus, were very prominent individuals, and were evidently the principal persons on the platform, and looked up to as leaders in the work of destruction by all the inferior destroyers. The object of the present assembly was to receive reports as to the state of their different empires. Moloch said that the Peace Society was laughed at, particularly by those who call themselves the more respectable, moderate, and spiritual part of England—for I should have said that these evil spirits are especially watchful of Great Britain, because of its influence on other nations. Baal, as the president of all sorts of idolatry, declared that his dominion had hardly received a shock, for that in England rites, ceremonies, and church-going were substituted for morality and religion, and that even many of those who seemed very busy about converting the world, were themselves the worshippers of rank, money, worldly respectability, and sectarian founders, or popular leaders. All the difference between Babel and England in respect of idolatry, he said, was that the objects were changed, and that they had left off the custom of making images. "As for the thing itself," he added, "I like English idolatry better than that of the ancients, because there is more hypocrisy about it. It can now wear a Christian garb; and its very refinement and politeness shows that it is more steeped in ungodliness."

MAMMON, I need not say, was ecstatic. He declared that he never had so fair a prospect. Money was everything, and was especially idolized in the church. Souls were bought and sold like cattle, and even many of those who gloried in the purity of their principles took great care, as ministers, that Providence should never call them to preside over poor congregations, where the salary was small. He said men and women could now do what they liked in religion, and numbers of preachers always kept back that part of Revelation which was not approved by the persons who sat in the higher seats of the synagogue. But his speech would fill a volume.

All the demons who presided over sensuality and debauchery had striking facts to show, but they were too obscene for our pages. One fact, however, was avowed by all—namely, that in a host of instances the rich were purveyors for the poor, especially by their skill in seduction. But for them, the wealthy gambling-houses, and other haunts of infamy, would not pay. Debauched men, also, who would have been driven from society by some of the old heathen nations, were now caressed in the saloon and drawing-room, and were even applauded as the bulwarks of the church. But the most animated of all was BACCHUS; and for the edification of our Teetotal friends, I will try to give as large a report of his speech as I can.

I forgot to say that BEELZEBUB, on this occasion, was the president of the meeting, and Bacchus, addressing him, said—

"Most ancient and mighty Prince, I need not say to you and this assembly that my sceptre is swayed over a world of people who delight in strong drink, and that in the work of destroying men's bodies and souls, I am not one whit inferior to the chief of demons. In fact, the vice which I cherish is auxiliary to almost every other species of wickedness and misery; and, without abstracting anything from the honour due to my brethren for their assiduity in seducing mankind, most persons will allow that intoxicating drink is one of the very chief of deceivers. Considering it is a material substance, and not an ethereal one, as we are, its operations are marvellous. It is true, that, at first, nature rebels against it, for the taste is disagreeable; but repetition soon not only destroys all disgust, but even awakens a new appetite. Of course, physical antipathies are nothing to us; for having taught mankind to shorten their days by such filthy practices as taking snuff, or chewing and smoking tobacco, the bitter or burning taste of alcoholic beverages was very little to be dreaded. —We have, as you know, succeeded amazingly. The drinks, by raising the spirits unnaturally high, leave them to sink unnaturally low; and this calls not only for another, but for a stronger draught. And then there is a second effect which tells powerfully for us. Instead of quenching thirst, which is the natural end of all drinking, these liquors actually produce it. Hence those who use them have a parched tongue and throat, and are almost always thirsty. But we have something more glorious still to state respecting these poisons. They play the most desperate havoc upon the nerves, and, through them and the brain, upon the mind, the temper, and the passions. So that any person who uses them shortens life in a twofold way:—First, he poisons his body, and thus prevents his living out all his days; and then he enfeebles his mind, and lessens his usefulness. I need not now give you any statistics of the numbers that have thus perished; the catalogue would be almost endless, and would require years for any of us to run through it; and, besides, you have the souls before you.

“But I cannot help mentioning one important fact, which, though not at all new, is always interesting. There is a grand deception in yonder world, that ‘Moderation’ is not only harmless, but even a virtue. This blessed delusion has destroyed millions. For it is a truth which no one can deny, that all drunkards come from the ranks of moderate drinkers; and, further, the moderate people themselves are actually destroyed by these poisons in greater numbers than those who drink to excess. Many who can never be charged with intoxication are rendered vicious, sensual, ill-tempered, stupid, and reckless. Their going to a place of worship is a farce, because they often sleep under the word; and God blesses neither them nor their families. In fact, they teach their sons and daughters to drink, and thus save us an immense amount of labour in precipitating them to perdition. Only think of the hosts of families which have been brought to beggary, whose ancestral names are now only on old broken tombstones, and whose souls are with us, solely through the liquor which their pious, moderate-drinking fathers and mothers recommended! Here again is a tale which eternity is too short to tell.

“I may also just add, that the English call themselves Christians, and boast of having a Christian constitution and Christian laws; it requires, therefore, almost a miracle to make one believe that these same people who, in their piety, legislate about things human and divine, with an audacity that would make Lucifer tremble, have, really and truly, in defiance of the fourth commandment, made an act of Parliament to license people to break the Sabbath, by throwing open beer-shops, gin-palaces, and tea-gardens on SUNDAY! And thus the senators, who, because they are such everlasting talkers, are called “Parliament” men, and who are constantly talking about provision for the poor, about police, prevention of crime, sanitary measures, education, and the Church, positively license agents to produce beggary, anarchy, poverty, debauchery, disease, ignorance, irreligion, premature death to the body, and perdition to the soul! Myriads of the more pious, also, as they call themselves, and who long and pray for a revival of religion, send their meat to the bakers, and their jugs to the publicans, as regularly on the Sabbath as on any other day! If any ask, have not we demons a world of mischief to fear from the special prayer-meetings and revival-sermons of these saints?—the hosts of souls which such people destroy annually is our best answer.

“But you may expect a word about the May Meetings; and I have the great satisfaction of informing you that a large number of those who conduct these societies use strong drinks, and would have their minds very sadly disturbed if it were proposed to them to give up these poisons, and devote the money to the spread of the Gospel. Some who give one guinea a year to convert the world, waste not less than £100 annually on these liquors! Medical men, reputed pious, recommend missionaries to carry these fire-waters to the burning climate of India and Africa; and, between the heat without and the heat within, not a few of their best agents have been disabled or slain. But the matter which must afford us all supreme satisfaction is the glorious fact that, at one of the largest missionary meetings held in May, a large BREWER was elected, above all other persons, to fill the chair! My brethren present know that from brewers’ vats alone there are brought every year to these dark abodes a much larger number of souls than the Missionary Society, over which this chief brewer presided, sends to heaven. Indeed, his houses, and those of his brethren, brewers and distillers, open on a Sunday, are our chief rendezvous! Some who have witnessed the scenes transacted in them, both within and without, have supposed they were actually among incarnate demons. On the Sabbath ESPECIALLY these excesses take place! Every attraction is used that can be put forth to induce men and women, and children, to drink and die. The misery and cruelty that are connected with this demoralization have sometimes almost softened the hearts of the weaker of our brethren. I assure you it requires all the malignity which a fallen angel can summon forth to look at these woes without a tear. The best of the affair is, that all is practised out of pure regard to our brother Mammon. And further, the gentleman in question never would have filled the chair but for the wealth which strong drink has procured. So that I most cordially congratulate myself, my beloved friend, the god of riches, and all the demons that preside over sensuality, cruelty, blasphemy, Sabbath-breaking, and debauchery, on this glorious triumph of our cause. A Brewer, or Distiller, as president of a Ragged School, Sabbath Observance Society, or Missionary Meeting, is one of the most cheering reports that we have heard for a long time. In fact, the paucity of contributions to spread the Gospel, and the enormous revenues poured into my coffers, the sneers thrown out at Teetotalism, and the quantity of strong drink consumed at May Meetings, either at public dinners or in private houses, convince me that our empire is very little jeopardized by the philanthropic and Christian efforts of pious drinkers of the present age.”

[Here such a shout of applause was uttered, that I awoke, and “BEHOLD IT WAS A DREAM!”]

INFLUENCE OF THE PUBLIC VOICE.—It is wonderful how the silence of the world can lull the conscience to sleep. It is equally wonderful how the reproaches of the world can at once awaken it to more than life. In none of the vices to which human nature is liable is this more evident than in the vice of intemperance. If every separate act of inebriety which a man commits was, from the earliest commencement, known and treated justly by society, he would be defended by having a host of witnesses. But, unfortunately, it is only when he has gone too far, when conviction has lost the power to strike, that the world speaks home, and treats him, in the hopeless stage of degradation, as it ought to have treated him at first.

CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE EARNESTLY PERSUADED TO BECOME TEETOTALERS.*

[TO CHILDREN AND YOUTH OF ALL NATIONS.]

MY DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS.—I wish you the enjoyment of all health and peace in this life, and of salvation in the world to come. "Hearken, then, unto me, I will teach you the fear of the Lord"—Psalm xxxiv. 11. How happy will you be if all your days be spent in the service of your Maker! What blessedness is contained in the prayer which good Dr. Watts has taught you to use—

"To thee, Almighty God, to thee,
Our childhood we resign;
'Twill please us to look back and see,
That our whole lives were thine."

That worthy minister hoped that children would begin to be pious while young, and hold on steadily to the end of their days. And I am anxious that you should do so; anxious to secure you all for the service of the Lord.

But the world in which you live is a very wicked world, and full of snares and dangers. You cannot be too early put on your guard against them. It would take a large book to describe them all. I therefore only write to you about one evil, which all good people desire that you may avoid. There is a great enemy in the country, ready prepared for your destruction; and, before you are much older, he will begin, in a thousand ways, to entice you in the most pleasing manner to an acquaintance with him; and he will profess to be your friend. Do not believe him, for he is a liar. "He loves evil more than good, and lying rather than to speak righteousness"—Psalm lii. 3. Like Judas, he will betray you with a kiss. "The words of his mouth are smoother than butter, but war in his heart; his words are softer than oil, yet are they drawn swords"—Psalm lv. 21. His name is Alcohol! You will perceive, my little ones, that I speak not of a proper person, but of a thing. You have seen drunkee people. Now Alcohol is that thing in the drink they took which made them drunk. God did not put it there, but men who make drinks for sale put it in. And as you grow up, people will give you some to taste, and ask you to drink their health; to drink their health in a glass that has this poisonous enemy, and death in it, and often damnation in the end. It is a sorrowful sight to see man or woman teaching or inviting a little child to sip the first inebriating drop. Who knows what the end will be?

Now, my dear children, I wish to persuade you never to taste it; or, if you have tasted it formerly, when you have finished this letter, resolve to taste it no more; and when you pray, ask of God grace to keep this holy resolution. Have you never read, in "Rollin's History of Young Hannibal," how his father, when he was yet a child, led him to the altar to swear eternal enmity against the Romans? I would fain enlist children of all nations, as an army of Hannibals, to vow eternal war, not against mankind, but against this terrible destroyer, Alcohol, which has spread far greater devastation than war, and plague, and famine. If children would but rise up against this foe, I should anticipate the fulfilment of an exulting prophecy—"Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength, because of thine enemies; that thou mightest still the enemy and the avenger"—Psalm viii. 2. A perfectly sober rising generation would, indeed, prove to be a people prepared of the Lord to show forth his praise, in connexion with his rich grace, poured from high, to convert and save the world.

Dear children, I pray you do not love those bad, bad drinks, which have the taste of the intoxicating thing in them. Do not sip a little wine left in your father's glass, nor drink a portion of the ale, or porter, or beer, which, alas! almost all men and women have learned to love; but, against example, be resolutely good. I say learned to love. For a child weaned from the breast does not love, but loathes them; yet the taste soon becomes vitiated, for the heart is depraved, and the tendency of human nature is always downwards. God has given you good drink; why should you forsake it for man's bad drink? "He watereth the hills from his chambers," and "he sendeth the springs into the valleys, which run among the hills"—Psalm civ. 10, 13. See you not what abundance of pains your Maker hath taken to supply you with a plenty of the purest water? And with what care doth he keep up that plentiful supply, and how kindly doth he distribute it throughout the whole world! And yet man, vain man, turns aside from all this bounty to his own muddy, and costly, and stupefying drinks, as though he were far wiser than his Creator! And besides all this, he who provided the springs in the valleys hath in the strongest manner commended them to man, by inspiring his servants, the prophets and apostles, to call them "living water," because of their great service in nourishing and supporting the life of all living creatures. Yea, and our Saviour Jesus Christ virtually so called them, by the spiritual allusion he made to them, John iv. 10, and vii. 37-39. And "living water" is made an emblem of the pure and perpetual happiness of heaven: Rev. vii. 17. But, my young friends, those drinks that come out of brew-houses and wine vaults are not living drinks; there is death in them, however some doctors may recommend them; and the whole business of trading in them is a part of "the mystery of iniquity" which corrupteth the Church and the world. These are not fit emblems, either of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, or of the happiness of heaven; but they really are fit instruments for grieving and quenching the Holy Spirit, and thereby rendering men unfit for heaven. It is impossible to say how many souls have perished through these terrible drinks; I beseech you, put not your souls to the hazard of perdition by allowing them to seduce you. Taste not, and you are secure. You will have dangers enough to watch against through life, without voluntarily taking upon yourself the peril of learning to play with this enchanter's cup. Water, like bread, suits all ages; the God of nature has made it agreeable to all mankind—keep to simple nature, for simplicity in all things is best.

But perhaps, my children, you will tell me milk is good also. Certainly it is, for this is also of God's providing, and, therefore, it is a sober drink. This is the very thing I wish most strongly to impress on your minds, that every drink which God sendeth for us, and intends us to use, hath sobriety in it: God would not offer his creatures that which has a fiery thing in it that quite unfits them for his service. He hath made the cow a manufacturer, as it were, of drink for universal man. And it is prepared by a most marvellous process from the herbage of the field. And you have seen the milk-maid milk the cow. But there are no distilled spirits in that pure white stream, the quiet animal gives forth so freely and so plentifully into the pail. How sweet, how good, how nourishing that milk is! A man cannot get drunk with it, for there is nothing in it to make him drunk. The drunk-making spirit is not there, for God is there. Now, children, you are simple, and not learned; but you can understand one thing. Children are not so strong as men. Children are weak, and want nourishing. That babe—your little brother or sister—how weak it is! It wants strength and nourishment that it may grow. Now, if that spirit, that hot spirit, called Alcohol, which is found in beer and such like articles, and which the farmer says makes his men strong to plough and reap, really could make any one stronger and better, do you not think that the Almighty, who always does the best thing, would have put a portion of it into milk for babes, whether in the milk they draw from their mother's breasts, or from that useful animal, the cow, by which they are so often sustained? I am not now speaking to wise men, but to you young ones. This is a fair argument, within the reach of your understanding. Make this practical use of it: resolve never to be wiser than your Maker, nor taste a thing in manhood which was not in any drink he gave you in your youthful days.

It may be, my children, some people will tell you that Jesus turned water into wine. True, he did; but it was wine pure as the water, and such wine is good, "and maketh glad the heart of man"—Psalm civ. 15. It was not "inflaming wine"—Isaiah v. 11. Nobody but wicked people, who called Christ "a glutton and a winebibber," would ever think that the Saviour, who was "holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners," created by miracle such wine as winebibbers love. You are too young to examine this subject fully at present; and if you become wine-drinkers you will never care to examine it. But I would tell you that the wines mentioned in Scripture were of two sorts, good and bad. The bad made people drunk. We now never see any other but this bad sort; therefore I persuade you put away the glass, and keep your souls pure from sin. Neither while at home, nor when at school, nor when put out as an apprentice to learn a trade, nor when you become a journeyman, or a master, allow yourselves to be persuaded by any body, be he relative, or companion, or master, or saint, or sinner, to taste of this accursed thing that destroyeth—the drink of inebriation. This is “the abomination of desolation” that now, alas! too often “standeth in the holy place;” the ensigus of sin, and woe, and death, are seen floating on the walls of the spiritual Jerusalem, and defiling the glory which covereth the ark of God. May children and young men rise up in every nation, and remove this dishonour from our world!

I will now tell you, my young friends, a little further why I would persuade you, the young of both sexes, to become teetotalers.

First, then, I do this for your own sakes. This is plain enough from what you have already had brought before you. I wish you to be good. Drink will not help you to be good: it cannot—the thing is quite impossible. There is nothing in it, nothing about it, nothing in its manufacture, nothing in its sale, nothing in its associations, that can morally benefit you. It may make you bad—very, very bad—very, very wicked, and ruin you for ever. A great many of you children and youths certainly will be undone if you take it at all. Your safety, then, in the mass, depends entirely on your total abstinence. When our Saviour told his disciples that one of their number would betray him, each was alarmed for himself, and began to inquire, “Lord, is it I?” So now, when you are forewarned of danger, fear every one of you lest you should fall and be lost for ever. Thou, child, who art now reading this warning, mayst be one of the ruined ones, unless thou heedest the advice of a friendly stranger. Oh, my child, my little one, take that drink no more! If thy indulgent father will not consent for thee to sign the teetotaler’s pledge, sign it in thy heart. It will be a mighty benefit to thee all thy future days. It will be to thee health, and wealth, and reputation, and a powerful means of promoting thy salvation. Let young persons only consider how many expenses will be cut off, and that such economy is gain, and ministers to success in business, as one inducement never to spend a farthing in pernicious and wasteful drink. If from first to last all the money so economized, though perhaps small in its beginnings, be spent in honourable trade and industry, in useful books, and in works of benevolence, how much better will it be even in the present life, while the advantages will prove to be great beyond conception in the final day of retribution!

Why should not a child or a youth be a teetotaler? It would only be acting out the great end of our being. For it is easy to demonstrate that teetotalism is thoroughly in agreement with the moral constitution of man, as developed in the pursuits of life.—Man is formed for perfection. Originally he was created in a state of perfection, that he might aim at higher attainments in the same state. And even now, in his days of vanity, there remain traces of this excellence of his nature, however diversified the objects that occupy his attention. It may be seen in little children, when once their minds are brought to a fondness for learning. The child is not content with knowing a, b, c, but wishes to know all the letters down to z; that is, to be acquainted with the alphabet perfectly. He is next dissatisfied with a, b, ab, but longs to read; and when able to read, he thirsts for useful books; and when a useful book is obtained, he is diligent to read it through, that he may be perfectly in possession of the knowledge it contains. Again, youth is every day desirous of advancing in his trade; and when his apprenticeship expires, he desires the best places and opportunities of becoming perfect in his business. The Christian also is always solicitous to come “unto a perfect man, unto the measure and stature of the fullness of Christ,” Ephes. iv. 13. And all who desire heaven, contemplate it as a place where we shall reach to much higher perfection than we are capable of on earth. From first to last, then—from childhood up to the heights of glory, when the mind has a true and right bias given to it, the aspirations are after and towards perfection. With this right bias, and with these lofty aspirations, of the purest minds, total abstinence from all kinds, and from every sort of drink that can intoxicate, is in universal accordance. For what is teetotalism but the perfection of temperance? And why should not a child be perfect in temperance as well as in his alphabet, or a young man in his trade? Why should not a Christian carry out the best desires of his spiritual nature by ensuring this branch of perfection at least, seeing it can be so easily ensured, and the benefits are so numerous and lasting? Let children begin betimes, and the advantages will be all their own.

Secondly, I would urge this upon you most earnestly for your family’s sake. It is written in the law, and this is also the first commandment with promise, “Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee”—Exodus xx. 12. This command, my dear young friends, binds you to shun everything that might involve your family in disgrace. Can you bear the thought that your venerable father should, through you, be dishonoured? Or your dear mother’s name be covered with shame and reproach? Does not the Bible teach you to keep out of the way of danger? Does it not say, “My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not?”—Prov. i. 10. On the same ground I would urge total abstinence; and if that sparkling wine, that foaming porter, that frothy home-brewed ale, entice thee, or be employed as an instrument to entice thee, “consent thou not.” As it would be folly for a youth to make sinners his companions, and sport with them in their pleasures, thinking that his good education and better sense would give him security against following their evil practices, and falling into a consent to their ill-advice, so it is folly to make a jest of the inebriating cup, and put it to the mouth with a smile, and an idle boast about liberty to take it or let it alone, trusting meanwhile to your own good sense and virtue to save you from excess, and keep you within the bounds of moderation. He that drinketh alcoholic drinks, and trusteth in his own heart to keep him from danger, is a fool. Or, if he profess to trust in God’s grace, he doth but “turn that grace into lasciviousness,” not perceiving that such a vain confidence proceedeth not from the Spirit of God, but from that wicked one who said unto Christ, “Cast thyself down, for it is written He shall give his angels charge concerning thee”—Matthew iv. 6. Oh! let the young be wise in time.

Now, children, I beseech you fortify your minds against the allurements of evil. If you would not run the hazard of bringing down your father’s gray hairs with sorrow to the grave, or of breaking your fond mother’s heart with anguish, while yet your own heart is tender, and your feelings of respect and affection are strong towards them, become a total abstainer. If, as becomes you, you be a dutiful child in all other things, your kind parents will grant you liberty in this matter; in many cases, one may hope, it would ensure their esteem. For surely there are but few parents who would like to incur the fearful responsibility of forcing their children, contrary to their better inclinations, to partake of those terrible drinks which have been well described as “the curse of Britain.” Surely no parent would convert his table into “a trap and a snare”—Psalm lxxix. 22—by daily compelling his child to be initiated into a relish for the drink, by whatever fine name called, that gendereth drunkenness! That were a most awful and tyrannical abuse of parental authority indeed! If any poor child be placed in such a case of extreme difficulty that his father positively commands him to drink such drink—hear me, my child, and steadily refuse; obey thy conscience and fear thy God, and it shall be well with thee. “Children,” says the apostle Paul, “obey your parents in the Lord, for this is right”—Ephesians vi. 1. But any command that is not in the Lord—that is, not founded on the Divine will, but is opposed thereto—ceases to be authoritative; and to obey it is not right, but wrong. And yours is such a case; and you must obey God, and not man, even though it should cause “your foes to be those of your own household.” Duty to God admits of no compromise with man. Only the refusal must be expressed, both as to language and demeanour, with a meekness, gentleness, and filial reverence equal to the firmness which makes you immovable in your resolution to adhere most inviolably to the blessed temperance cause.

A word of caution may here be appropriately given to young men of zeal and activity.—The children of drunkards should never expose the faults of a father. It is unseemly to descant upon them in public, and is more likely to bring upon them the curse of Ham than secure the blessings that came down on Shem and Japheth. And though there is a great difference between righteous Noah and an habitually-drunken and profligate father, yet still he is thy father, and is to be honoured with all the greater tenderness, for that he covereth himself continually with disgrace and shame. However true the story of family distress—however sad and touching the tale—it becomes not a son to be the publisher of it; for though some may urge it will do good, it is only “doing evil that good may come,” seeing it involves a breach of the fifth command. No apparent good is acceptable to God that is accomplished by disobedience to the moral law. It is sufficient for the children of drunkards that they make a sound, practical use of the miseries they have witnessed in domestic life by becoming immovably attached to the temperance cause, and zealous in spreading its principles to the ends of the earth. Temperance children and youths are more likely than any other class of young persons to do honour to the name and family from whence they have sprung. If the family be without reputation, it belongs to them to redeem it from disgrace; if it be of fair repute, it will be their distinguished privilege to hand down the family name, without blemish, to future generations.

Thirdly, I entreat you all, in the various gradations of life, from childhood up to manhood, to be teetotalers for the sake of your country and the world. Do you not love your country, and feel deeply interested in its weal or woe? Do you not honour your rulers, and feel grateful to God and your ancestors for the valuable laws and institutions of the realm? Where should patriotism glow with ardour, if not in the breasts of the young, whose spirits, fired with the most generous emotions for the true glory of the land which gave them birth, should ever respond to the words of David, "Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces." Loyalty to the supreme power, and fealty to the laws, when they do not contravene the universal laws of God, is a noble principle, to be cherished by the young with most sacred care. But I wish your patriotism to be pure, sincere, genuine, honest, thorough-going, inviolable, and consistent. And I affirm, and no man can disprove it, that you cannot be a consistent patriot unless you are a teetotaler. How glaring is the inconsistency of Christian ministers who call sinners to repentance, while they indulge in the glass that fills the land with sinners of the worst kind that are known in it. Can they honestly, earnestly, and effectually, preach against drunkenness? I trow not; hence your young people will seldom hear it specially expressed in the pulpit, though it is the crying sin of the nation. Herein "the trumpet gives an uncertain sound," or rather, no sound at all. It seems almost to lead to the thought that drunkenness is a privileged sin; and induces the conclusion that zealous Protestant ministers, notwithstanding all their persevering opposition against Maynooth and Popery, have compromised matters of morality with publicans, spirit-merchants, and brewers; for such like men-of-trade are sometimes actually put forward in office, and made chairmen and presidents of religious assemblies and institutions. It is true a portion of their ill-gotten gains are contributed to the funds of such societies. And then they are heaped for their liberality, instead of met with the rebuke, "Thy money perish with thee, thou hast neither part nor lot in the matter." Alas! there is more than one way of selling indulgences! If the pulpit be silent, the parlour will be dumb. Public and religious matters may form the staple of conversation when the cloth is removed; but the policy and religion of attempting to convert the nation to sobriety can hardly be discussed in the presence of full decanters, from which all are ready to quaff in turn. Oh! let the young beware of the hidden snares that lie spread over the parlour carpets and well-furnished tables of the respectable, the genteel, and the wealthy, in religious communities. Let them shut their eyes, and stop their ears, pray inwardly to God with earnestness, and make good use of their understanding. Young men and women, I exhort you, never sit at table after a meal where the intoxicating draught is found; but prudently and quietly retire, and find yourself better employment. You can read a chapter in the Bible, or peruse some instructive book, or commune with your own heart in meditation, till the company have done drinking. Your example will tell on the consciences of some, though at first they may be half-offended with your want of good manners. Cultivate, my young friends, real good breeding, and easy politeness, and be not willingly offensive to any one; but away with etiquette and ceremony without remorse, or fear, or shame, when you are called to be God's witnesses against customs which you know to be disastrous to your country, and dishonouring to your God.

And what a marvellous inconsistency it is to enact laws and fines against drunkenness, and yet to convert drinking-houses into a source of revenue! And for magistrates to execute such laws, and yet revel in all kinds of intoxicating drinks at their public and private feasts! And yet we call ours a Christian country. Is this Christianity? Christianity is a consistent religion. It is all of a piece. It hath neither spot, nor wrinkle, nor any such thing; But believe me, my young friends, you will meet with but few in the world who do not pull down with one hand what they build up with the other. And that is the reason why

Christianity makes such slow progress in the earth. I want you to study, to value, and to practice consistency. You are to be the future husbands, and wives, and parents; the future masters, tradesmen, merchants, and operatives; the future magistrates, legislators, statesmen, ministers, and missionaries of this kingdom, and of the world. Oh! could I draw you to the standard of temperance, what a noble race you might become! What a bloodless revolution you would produce in the customs, habits, and trade, and religion of the nation. Our old Christianity, which subdued Asia, Greece, and Rome, would put forth her ancient vigour, and subdue drunken Britain to sobriety. What a blessing you would be to your country! And what a blessing to the world! If you be Sunday-school teachers, or village-school ministers, or rise in cities to academical honours, and the professors' chair, what a prodigious educational influence of the right kind you would exert over the rising generation of your day! If you become of the learned professions, and be chosen the representatives of your country in the House of Commons,—free from the miserable slavery and servitude of drink, you will have your power at full command, and be prepared to advocate always, and everywhere, whatsoever is rational, and wise, and Christian, and nothing beside. If sent of God as Christian ministers, you will cleanse the sanctuary. If missionaries, you will carry the gospel to the heathen, without initiating them into a taste for drinks that would go far to nullify the saving effects of the Gospel. Think, for instance, of the Hindoos of the East Indies. At present they are sober, though idolators, and full of other vices. They abstain from flesh. Supposing fifty of you young men should be their future missionaries, and convert them to the faith of Christ; you would be the means of saving some of their immortal souls. But if you be not teetotalers, this people by becoming Christians would learn from you to be drinkers and many many of them would become drunkards; and thus Christianity, I mean your Christianity, would actually introduce amongst them a new vice, and so the glory of Christ's holy religion would be mightily tarnished in the very eyes of the heathen. But if you be teetotalers, you would do much to secure your victories as you win them. And such fair conduct I call prudence and consistency. So fully convinced am I of the importance of teetotalism to the purity, efficiency, and stability of Christian missions,—(to say nothing further of the church at home,) that if any man ask me a reason for being a teetotaler, I deem it a sufficient answer to say,—I have been a missionary.

And now, my dear young friends, for the present, I bid you all farewell. God Almighty be gracious to you, and help you to be wise, considerate, pious, perfectly temperate, and consistent Christians! God bless you children, and you the youth of both sexes, the rising generation of the world! Wherever you dwell, may you be the glory of your country, the pillars of the church and the throne, the regenerators of mankind, and the followers of Christ to heaven! Amen.

I am, My dear young friends, your true well-wisher for both worlds,

WILLIAM J. SHREWSBURY.

Dewsbury, May 10th, 1850.

A GOOD RESOLVE.—"What'll you take, Davey?" said Joseph—, the other night, to a young man well known for his convivial propensities. To the great surprise of the young blood, the reply was, "I'll take the pledge!" and he moved towards a temperance meeting near at hand. Joseph departed alone and in a brown study, while we ejaculated with Bunsby, "There's wisdom!"

LISTEN! FEMALES.—Every female should feel under peculiar obligations to aid in getting the land rid of such a curse as intemperance. Every young female, by signing the pledge, lessens her chance of being eventually joined to a drunken husband. Every mother, by signing, lessens the probability, or possibility, of following that playful boy, or smiling infant, to a drunkard's grave.

WEAK EYES.—An elderly gentleman, accustomed to "indulge," entered the room of a certain inn, where sat a grave friend by the fire, lifting a pair of green spectacles upon his forehead, rubbing his inflamed eyes, and calling for a glass of hot brandy and water; he complained to the friend that "his eyes were getting weaker and weaker, and that even spectacles did not seem to do them any good." "I'll tell thee, friend," replied the Quaker, "what I think. If thee was to wear thy spectacles over thy mouth for a few months, thy eyes would get round again."

GRAND TEETOTAL EXCURSION.

WE stated in our last number, that the Committee under whose management the recent series of Meetings in Exeter-hall was held, had determined upon undertaking an Excursion to TUNBRIDGE WELLS, by Railway, on Monday, July 22. A SPECIAL MEETING, for the consideration of details, was held on the 1st of May, when about forty gentlemen attended, and deputations from various Metropolitan Total Abstinence Societies. The suggestions of the Committee were considered, and Resolutions were unanimously adopted, the carrying out of which is likely to make the proposed Excursion one of the most interesting and attractive that has ever been undertaken by the Teetotalers of the Metropolis. Since the above-named Meeting, a Deputation has visited Tunbridge Wells, for the purpose of taking a cursory glance of the scenery of the locality fixed upon, and also of ascertaining what provision could be made for the comfort of the Excursionists, and what reception they were likely to meet with from the Societies at Tunbridge Wells and the adjacent towns. As to the beauty and variety of the scenery of the place fixed upon, the Deputation declare their inability adequately to describe it. The "High Rocks"—the various "Mounts"—the "Prospects," &c. &c.—render it, altogether, one of the most delightful specimens of rural and romantic scenery in the kingdom. It has been renowned for more than a century as a favourite resort of the noblesse and fashion of the country. The Teetotalers of Tunbridge Wells promise their friends a most cordial welcome, and pledge themselves to contribute in every possible way to their comfort and pleasure. From subsequent correspondence, it appears that the neighbouring Societies, including Ashford, Maidstone, Canterbury, &c., have heard of the proposed Excursion with delight, and propose to add considerably to the numbers assembling on the occasion. Some of the most distinguished and influential friends and supporters of the Total Abstinence Movement will be invited to accompany the London Societies, or to meet them on the spot: and other measures are in progress to render this Excursion at once a cheap, attractive, and memorable gathering. The TERMS on which it is proposed to convey the friends thither and back, are such as will benefit, pecuniarily, the Societies taking part in it, and leave a surplus, it is hoped, which will enable the Committee to meet the liabilities connected with the Exeter Hall Meetings, and to make some provision towards commencing a similar series in the ensuing autumn.

A Second SPECIAL MEETING, for making the final arrangements, will be held at Mrs. Watt's, Temperance Hotel, Catherine-street, Strand, on Wednesday evening, June 5, at eight o'clock precisely; when the attendance of representatives from the Societies in the Metropolis and suburbs is earnestly requested. It is hoped that they will be able, on that evening, to present such reports as may enable the Committee to form some adequate idea of the number likely to proceed with them. Further particulars will be announced by Bills and Advertisements.

The following additions have been made to the list of contributors to the Exeter-hall demonstrations since the last announcement:—

Mr. J. Rickman, near Lewes,.....	£6 0 0
Miss Rickman, Lewes,.....	1 0 0
R. Place, Esq., second Donation,.....	0 10 0
Adelaide square (Islington) Society,.....	0 3 0

Those friends who have not yet sent in their promised donations are requested to send them, without delay, to Mr. JOHN CASSELL, 80, Fenchurch-street, that the account may be closed.

SERMONS ON TEMPERANCE.

THE REV. JABEZ BURNS, D.D., is expected to preach a Sermon on Temperance, in the Borough Road Chapel (the Rev. J. Stevenson's), on Sunday afternoon, June 9th. Service to commence at 3 o'clock.

The Rev. Professor G. C. FINNEY, from America, has promised to preach a Sermon on Temperance; but the day was not fixed when this number was sent to press.

TEETOTALISM IN WALES.

WE understand that a grand Teetotal Movement is going on in the Principality. A Working Committee has been formed, and a meeting of Delegates, from various parts, has recently been held at Caernarvon. Two grand meetings, or demonstrations, are to take place on the 9th and 10th of July, at Caernarvon, where upwards of two hundred ministers are expected to meet between twenty and thirty thousand Teetotalers. A choir of singers of two thousand strong are to sing together at intervals. It is hoped that cheap trips from various other parts will be arranged, so as to make the above a most effective and memorable meeting.

REPEAL OF BEER-SHOP LICENCES.

To the Editor of the Teetotal Times.

DEAR SIR,—I think it will interest your readers to know that the teetotalers' warm and able champion, Mr. Thomas Richardson (the Honorary Secretary to the Society for the Suppression of Beer-Shops), has seen the Earl of Harrowby, and he finds his lordship actively engaged in preparing the bill for the gradual repeal of the beer-shop licences. It will contain some admirable clauses. Among others, they are to be closed for fourteen days altogether for breaking the Sabbath hours; and for two or three offences not only will the occupier lose his licence, but the house itself will not again be permitted to open in the same immoral trade; the guarantees will be personally examined before the licensing magistrates, and the rating will be strictly scrutinized; with many other searching and stringent clauses.

It now remains with the friends of true sobriety to show their zeal for their own principles. Let us see whether they really mean what they say against these moral pest-houses. To the present time only fifty petitions have been sent into the House of Commons, with 10,789 signatures.

No doubt a very large number of petitions are preparing—for instance, even in my little way, I hope to have a dozen congregational petitions ready shortly. But every man who has his country's weal at heart, should redouble the best exertions hitherto used; and begin devotedly and at once, if he has not before seen the absolute necessity there is for his most strenuous aid being brought to the assistance of this good cause.

Petition, then, abstainers! Petition now, and in earnest! and remember this does not prevent other active measures being continued. The enlightenment of the public mind, and the inducement of the individual members of the community to abstain, is, undoubtedly, the ground of our hope—to persuade the world to adopt our rule, is the star by which we direct our course. But, in the meanwhile, take such instalments as you can get.—Yours truly,

THOMAS C. PREBBLE.

MAN REVIEWED.

[BY DALMOCAND.]

PERHAPS I cannot commence this topic better than by offering a brief commentary on Shakspeare's well-known series of ejaculations. The reader, of course, may amplify ad libitum.

Who can withhold exclaiming, "What a piece of work is man!" It would be superfluous to adduce a long array of proofs in confirmation of this wonder-investing statement. Man, whether internally or externally considered, deeply or superficially examined, must be confessed a superstructure of glorious mechanism, disclosing, in the smallest minutiae, the hand of an all-provident CREATOR. Anatomy alone has been instrumental in turning some from their atheistic notions: among its converts may be numbered the celebrated GALEN. The inquiring sceptic would become his own refuter.

"How noble in reason!" This endowment man cannot estimate too highly, regard being had to its true place; otherwise, as with our French and German neighbours, it may at times become an object of adoration. By "reason" we may understand that particular faculty which takes cognizance of premises and deductions, cause and effect, and acts as controller of the mental powers. Without the presidency of reason, man's various constituents would wax disorderly and impotent. Instinct can be distinguished from reason both by the former's uniformity of action in all animals of the same species, and by the undeviating certainty with which it performs its functions before the advent of experience. Take, as a familiar instance, that amphibious wanderer, the duck, which, shortly after emerging from its shell, heedless of the tender warnings of its foster-mother, the hen, straddles to the nearest pool, and forages for sustenance. Different is man's predicament; he comes into the world the most helpless and defenceless of all animals, continuing the longest space dependant, and, if isolated at an early age, grows up inferior to many. Brutes, soon fulfilling the intention with which they are sent upon this stage, disappear; rendered more cunning and sagacious by experience, yet apparently unpossessed by means whereby the same may be transmitted to their posterity, which must learn in like manner as they; while men, assisted by the job-books of their grandsires, are capable of a continuous marching forward.

"How infinite in faculties!" This, I presume, may be set down as a dramatic flourish. Man's faculties are great, numerous, and glorious, but scarcely "infinite." To the power and wisdom of Jehovah, or to such things as cannot be limited, this term may be properly assigned: to man, however, there is held out the prospect of enjoying in a future state faculties more acute and more approaching to the infinite.

"In form and moving how express and admirable!" Express and admirable, truly, are the form and moving of man. Of all animals he is the only one ordained to walk erect; those which most approximate to him in this respect being incapacitated by their structure from maintaining that position any length of time without support.

"In action how like an angel!" Graceful are represented to be the gestures of angels: so likewise are man's.

"In apprehension how like a god!" By "apprehension" is meant the perception or intelligent grasping of such objects or propositions as may be presented for inquiry: its colloquial synonyme is "uptake." It may also signify the power of disci-minating betwixt the expedient and the improper truth and fallacy. Is it irrational to suppose that God should assimilate man to himself, however remotely, in more respects than one? But the present general verdict of truth and soberness, respecting the human enjoyers of civilization, must run—in knowledge, godlike; in practice, devilish.

Now it might be naturally inferred that man, thus pre-eminently gifted, is pre-eminently grateful; but, on the contrary, he ranks with the most thankless. A dog licks the hand of him who feeds him, and, when beaten for misconduct, only cringes downcast and penitent: man, unmindful of the wise providence of his Master, and overlooking his own demerit, at the least cross ejaculates, "Why this visitation!" It might likewise be presumed that man's solicitude to preserve his vantage-ground is intense and abiding. Alas! many are the agencies employed by him in the work of self-abasement; one of the most frequent, I need not say, being indulgence in spirituous potations. By this is that amazing piece of workmanship deranged, reason hurled from the seat of empire, each faculty impaired, his form disfigured, and his carriage rendered ungainly and contemptible: by it does the "beauty of the world," the "paragon of animals," become a loathsome deformity, creation's scoff.

We have thus glanced at the poet's physical and intellectual estimate of man; but to form a comprehensive valuation, we must consult the sacred record, looking and re-looking from Paradise to Calvary, and thence to Patmos. Many are the "moral Pecksniffs" who expatiate with fervour on human nobleness and human degradation, yet possess but little of the former, and put forth no exertion to decrease the latter. Nothing is more obviously incumbent than endeavouring to extend to others the same well-being we ourselves have gained. SELF should not sit lord paramount. What, for example, would be thought of a vessel passing by another in distress, and turning a deaf ear to the cries for succour which assailed her, though relief were practicable? Why, a burst of repudiating indignation would agitate each breast upon the avowal or discovery of this horrid deed. Or, to individualize, what would be thought of the mariner who, buffeting his path ashore, would, instead of remembering the destruction-girt vessel he had escaped from, and devising means to aid, coolly walk away, chuckling at his own good fortune? Mere personal deliverance from any evil comprises but half duty. Therefore, whether the danger to be avoided proceeds from this agency or that, let us be up and doing, persuading or dissuading as the case requires. All honour to the good Samaritan, who raises from the dust his poor bleeding brother, and pours into his wounds the balm of Gilead!

There is an interesting oriental story about a caliph and his grand vizier being, through the malice of a magician, self-changed into storks, by drawing into their nostrils a peculiar powder, and uttering the word "Mutabor!" (I will be changed!) Their pleasantries during the gradual shriveling of their members, and their subsequent wretchedness on becoming forgetful of the re-transforming word, are well portrayed. Is not "Mutabor!" too, the virtual motto of countless indulgers in debasing practices at each repetition? And the sot or debauchee, once consummated, how un-frequent the permanent restoration to anything like human! The common boast that "a Briton's house is his castle"—so far as concerns admission or exclusion—we need not now examine; many of our countrymen are not, in common language, house-possessed. But viewing the body as a domicile, the possessor's privilege to regulate admission and exclusion cannot be disputed. What visiting intelligence from another sphere could ever imagine that men should voluntarily put "a devil into their mouths to steal away their brains!" Believers are, in Scripture, called a "royal priesthood," yet the professing palace often passes into a squalid hovel, and the dedicated temple a den of thieves. The pagan's confidence in his timber gods must be shaken before the missionary's teachings can be entertained; so faith in GIN, and kindred deities, must be subverted, ere spiritual and sensual idolatry can appear repulsive and unmanly.

A house, it has been remarked, is a "quotation" from the quarry and the forest. In like manner it may be said that man is a quotation (now, alas! interpolated) from earth and heaven. We need no oracles to determine which extraction should be esteemed more excellent; nor whether mind or matter should be accounted the standard of the man; yet parties, though proud of ancestry dating, perchance, from invading William or tide-waiting Canute, seldom think of HIM who at the first "breathed into man's nostrils and he became a living soul." Instead of the query: How may I regain the primal image and favour of my Creator? the absorbing question seems: How may I obtain my fill of earthly pleasure? or acquire an earthly heritage? Thus earth eclipses heaven, till the sun of righteousness arises to reveal the glories of yon joyous spirit land, and to awaken thoughts of "home." It is a signal act of condescension to be invited as a fellow-worker by the Majesty of heaven; but near-sighted multitudes reckon a connexion with the Prince of Darkness more advantageous. Were the avowed children of the kingdom to display an equal amount of activity and devotedness, man's real interests would appear more prominent and flourishing; human bodies and human souls would receive a juster value, and wiles of wickedness increased exposure. READER! are you a soldier of the cross, or of the pit?—a propeller or retarder of the gospel chariot?—an aider or enfeeblor of your fellows? These are weighty and urgent questions, for general reviews will avail but little, if unaccompanied with personal; nor will the approving of what is good suffice for the adopting.

But to conclude. What, though man, physically, is weak, the brute creation are his vassals, and Nature's elements, his genii: spirits, when evoked from the "vasty deep," no longer linger; and metallic coursers, swifter than Camilla, "scour the plain." What, though man's intellect, like ocean's bed, is bounded, the limit has not yet been reached, and ample is the field of survey. And what, though man's moral nature is now, as respects the Divine image, a blurred daguerreotype, can he not with reverence beseech the original Designer to repolish and refix?

STRONG DRINK OR LAND?—At a meeting lately held at Gateshead, to promote the formation of a Freehold Land Association, Mr. Taylor, of Birmingham, said, "Ladies visited the wives of their husband's workmen, and encouraged them to lay by money for freeholds. If the women said they could not afford it, the ladies laughed, and told them that it was only to put the threepence itself into the old teapot, instead of the threepennyworth of rum, and the thing was done. Men could not both swallow a freehold and have it: they must bear in mind that the people of England swallowed in drink two vast Birmingham every year. Unless then they loved drink more than liberty, they might all be franchised."

TESTIMONIES OF MINISTERS TO THE EXCELLENCE OF TEETOTALISM.

Our indefatigable friend, Mr. T. B. SMITHIES, is industriously employed in obtaining testimonies from ministers, as to the personal advantages they have derived from the practice of total abstinence from strong drinks, and as to the benefits they have known to result from it, to individuals, the church, and the world. The following are specimens:—

From the Rev. Ebenezer Davies, of Llanarchymed, Anglesea, Wales.

"I have had the privilege of being a total abstainer for more than 15 years, during which period I have travelled many hundreds of miles, preaching twice and mostly three times a day for some weeks successively (which is a customary thing in Wales), and that without sustaining the slightest disadvantage by abstaining from the use of intoxicating beverages. The contrary indeed is the fact in every particular. I have also had the honour of publicly labouring in the advocacy of the abstinence cause both at home and from home, and of seeing a very great number of the most inveterate drunkards reformed from the degrading and destructive habits of drunkenness and tipping, and consequently brought under the sound of the gospel, under the blessing of which many have been found 'Weeping and asking the way to Zion with their faces thitherwards,' bearing hopeful signs of sincere and genuine repentance; and the beginning of these happy results to be attributed to the instrumentality of the Total Abstinence Society."

From the Rev. John Jones, of Rhyly, Wales.

"I have been a total abstainer now going upon 15 years, and can testify that I am healthier, stronger, and more cheerful,—although I generally walk on a Sabbath day, from 10 to 20 miles,—I can do that without any injurious effects; and, in addition to it, preach three times. Although I was 15 years younger when I drank strong drinks, I could not then do what I can now."

"Our church, which numbers 124 communicants, are nearly all teetotalers. Teetotalism, in the Lord's hands, hath done wonders in Wales. A young man, lately, who had been a very great drunkard, offered himself to one of our churches; and when asked, when he felt the power of the word first upon his mind, he replied, "It began directly after I became sober."

"We do not receive any as church members, without their promising not to frequent public houses; and, indeed, not to touch that which is so unclean, without the counsel of one well acquainted with its nature, in time of sickness. Hundreds and thousands have taken the pledge, in North Wales, these last twelve months; and, also, thousands have become members of Christian churches. Those who stand aloof have nearly emptied their chapels in many places; and those who stand firm and fight the foe, have had great increases."

"We do not allow any but professing Christians to stand up to advocate the cause publicly, as we have found bad results by doing otherwise. But at the commencement, it was well to get any one to help the boat into the water, as the professors of religion kept away; but now there is a general change, they are the first and most dear friends to truly genuine temperance."

From the Rev. Richard Tabraham, Walsingham, Norfolk:—

"I am fully persuaded that the theology, the morals, the piety, of the church would be purer; that benevolence, activity, and peace would be greatly increased; that Satan would be defeated, and sinners subdued to the faith of Christ, and God abundantly glorified; and that the world would be benefited to an untold degree, if the principles of teetotalism were universally and habitually regarded. I was never more decided in their favour than I am at the present."

Ministers who are total abstainers may greatly assist our friend Mr. Smithies in the promotion of his laudable object, by furnishing brief personal testimonies similar to the above. Any of our readers who are acquainted with clergymen or Dissenting ministers, who are total abstainers, will do well to obtain their testimonies, and forward them to our friend, addressed to him at No. 22, Upper Barnsbury-street, Islington.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

The annual meeting of this Society was held on Thursday evening, in St. Martin's-hall, Long-acre. The attendance was numerous; and on the platform, amongst other leading friends of the cause, we observed Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., M.P.; J. S. Buckingham, Esq.; J. Meredith, Esq.; Dr. Oxley; Dr. Gourley; Dr. Burns; Rev. J. R. Balne, &c. The chair was taken by Benjamin Rotch, Esq., B.C.L., and the proceedings commenced, shortly after 8 o'clock, by the Rev. W. Robinson reading the sixty-seventh Psalm.

The CHAIRMAN then rose and said: During the past winter the friends of temperance had held six large consecutive meetings in Exeter-hall; and it had been thought advisable that the present, being an annual gathering, should be associated with a new locality, in the arrangements for which the committee were able to make a large saving in the funds of the society—give, as it were, a moral character to the noble building itself, and introducing the great principles of the reformation they sought to accomplish in the midst of a densely-populated and highly interesting neighbourhood (hear). Every one knew the nature of the object they were contending for—an object based upon the first principles of Christianity—that of denying themselves the use of things not positively forbidden, for the sake of those who abused them, and became ruined in consequence. He quoted the opinion of Sir Charles Napier, Governor General of India, as read from a letter by the Deputy Judge Advocate of Scinde, at a teetotal meeting held in the town of Reading, to the effect that "drunkenness was unbecoming a gentleman and a Christian," and urged that they should persevere in prosecuting the mission to which they were called with renewed zeal and confidence (cheers).

The Secretary (the Rev. I. DOXSEY) read the report, which stated that the past year had been one of the most trying in the history of the society. Some of its staunch friends had been removed by death. The necessary funds had been obtained with greater difficulty than at any previous period, whilst the committee were beset by loud demands, not always in the most friendly spirit, to do more than they had yet attempted. The circumstances in which they had been placed had obliged them to contract their modes of agency, even with the most rigid regard to economy in their management and expenditure. They have memorialized such public bodies on the subject of temperance as opportunity had afforded—viz., the Congregational Union, in its autumnal sitting at Sheffield last year, and its recent assembly in London, and the Wesleyan Conference. In both cases the receipt of the memorial had been acknowledged, but in neither was it read. The report then proceeded to a detail of the labours of the agents and the success which had attended their efforts. This department was very encouraging, and it concluded by an earnest appeal to the friends of sobriety to unite more cordially, that success might be more signal and cheering. The financial statement showed that the receipts for the past year (including a balance of £73 19s. 4d. in hand at the last audit), were £842 6s. 4d. expenditure, £750 9s. 10d.; leaving a balance now in the treasurer's hand of £91 16s. 6d. There are, however, liabilities yet to be met, of £180 4s. 10d.

J. S. BUCKINGHAM, Esq., moved—

"That this meeting rejoices in the continued progress of the temperance society in the United Kingdom and throughout the world; yet deeply regrets that so much need still remains for the operations of temperance societies; and recommends that efforts be made to promote the cordial and earnest union of all classes of abstainers for the accomplishment of the great object contemplated by them all."

From the many opportunities afforded him of judging of the progress of their principles, he felt that he might congratulate the meeting that their cause was in higher favour than ever; and when he remembered the toilsome path through which they had had to track their way, the misconceptions and prejudices they had had to contend with, the coldness and apathy of even professing friends with which they had sometimes been greeted, he felt that their present position called for gratitude, and should urge to perseverance. He compared their efforts with those who advocated missions, sanitary improvements, and the abolition of slavery; and contended that the success of the temperance cause was more to be desired than either, seeing it embraced both, in the most complete and pleasing aspect. While at home their prospects were thus cheering, abroad the appearance was still more propitious. He referred specially to Sweden and America, in the former of which places the king and queen had given in their adhesion to the principles of temperance, and were sending out missionaries through their dominion, to urge its adoption as the only true foundation for domestic peace and social well-being (cheers). The question occurred to him, what could they, at home, do more than at present? Let them strive to feel their personal responsibility in reference to the subject, wash their own hands entirely of the foul practice of drinking alcoholic liquors, and use their utmost efforts to persuade their own families, and the immediate circle of their acquaintances, to follow the same course. He urged, also, the propriety of adopting a less exclusive style in conducting the periodical publications of the society, and recommending that a paper something similar to "Chambers's Journal" should be started, embracing well-written articles on subjects of general information, with a good sprinkling of temperance intelligence. In conclusion, he expressed a hope that the great exhibition of the works of art of all nations during the ensuing year, would be an exhibition to the world of the sobriety of England (cheers).

The Rev. Dr. J. BURNS seconded the resolution, giving an interesting account of the rise, progress, and successes of the society. The cause, he believed, was the cause of humanity, of mercy, of God, and must be conducted, not in the spirit of strife or vain glory, but with love, zeal, earnestness, and unity, and there was then nothing to prevent their efforts being crowned with all the success they could possibly desire (cheers).

LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, Esq., M.P., supported the resolution. He felt it an honour that he had been sent into parliament specifically as a teetotaler (cheers). The judges of the land had told him that the great amount of crime in the country was caused by the use of strong drinks; physicians traced to the same cause the majority of diseases which desolated society; and the poor-law commissioners testified that it was the fruitful source of the great bulk of poverty and distress which came under their notice. Knowing this to be the spring of so many and such grievous social evils, they were at once pointed to the remedy, which he urged as well on the above accounts as on the fearful revelation of the Bible, that, besides enduring such miseries on earth, "no drunkard can enter into the kingdom of heaven."

The resolution having been unanimously adopted the Rev. W. W. ROBINSON moved—

"That this meeting, convinced that the welfare of society is closely identified with the abrogation of the drinking customs, earnestly appeals to the young men of Britain, and especially of her cities and large towns, to adopt cordially, and at once, the principles of total abstinence; and to set themselves manfully to oppose the false notions of generosity and good fellowship which are unhappily identified with intoxicating drink."

Feeling a deep interest in the class particularly alluded to, he very affectionately entreated them to adopt the course recommended; at the same time warning them that teetotalism was only a physical remedy for a physical disease, and that, beyond and above all, it was necessary that they should seek for a change of heart, to fit them for God's service here, and for happiness throughout eternity.

The Rev. W. M'CREE, in an eloquent speech, seconded the resolution, enlarging upon the evils which drunkenness produced on individuals and society at large. Let them abolish the foolish drinking customs throughout the land, there would be such a revival of pure religion in our midst, as had never yet been seen. Our churches would be more pure; the work of self-education would go bravely on; crime would be diminished; and soon the ends of the earth would see the salvation of God (cheers).

The Rev. C. G. FINNEY (from America) said, that intemperance existed, and that it was one of the greatest evils under the sun, all would acknowledge; yet the practices of many were fearfully inconsistent with that acknowledgment. If he were to speak as he thought on that subject, he feared he should be considered uncharitable. He was utterly astonished every time he entered into conversation on the subject, to be met by arguments which had been answered a thousand times (hear). He had been thinking how long it was since he had seen a minister in America drink wine. For many years he had not met the breath of an alcohol-drinking minister till he came to England (hear, hear). When he heard such ministers pray, and found that their breath smelt of alcohol, he was almost ready to stop his ears, and not hear them pray. And the same feeling pervaded when he found them come from the pulpit with their breaths smelling of alcoholic drink (hear.) Hefeltas if he could not endure to see, after the solemn services at the ordination of a minister, ministers drinking alcoholic drinks, and drinking them freely (hear). Was there no remedy? There ought to be; for he had met with practices in this country which were not so much as named in America (hear). On such a question as that of temperance—a health question—a morality question—a religious question, he was utterly astonished to hear ministers gravely, and with apparent honesty, say what he had not heard said in America for nearly twenty years! Ministers, and members of churches, used alcoholic drinks, and even defended the use of them, and quoted the example of Christ and his apostles in their defence! So impressed had benevolent Christian men in America been with the importance of this question, that they had given their whole fortunes for the purpose of employing lecturers, the press, and every possible means of diffusing information, of enlightening the public mind. He, as a stranger, could not tell what had been said or done, but it appeared to him that the entire public mind of this country needed instruction on the subject. Some people seemed to doubt whether it were possible to abstain altogether. His labours had been great and incessant, but he had performed them for many years, without the aid of alcohol. Efforts must be made to hunt out the evil from the Church of God (hear, hear). Ministers must be urged to come forward and take the lead in this great work. A work of such magnitude could only be undertaken with effect by the Christian Church.

The resolution was cordially adopted.
Mr. LURY briefly moved, and Dr. GOURLEY seconded, the next resolution:—

“That the temptations to which the young and inexperienced are peculiarly exposed, by the use of intoxicating drinks as articles of ordinary beverage, and the erroneous opinions which are current respecting them, constitute a powerful appeal to parents, teachers, and guardians of youth, to lead them by precept and example to avoid the use of such beverage, and to furnish them with the most impressive reasons for adopting this course.”

S. BOWLEY, Esq., of Gloucester, moved, and Mr. J. INWARDS seconded, the following proposition, which was acceded to:—

“That the traffic in intoxicating liquors, which tend to destroy the virtue of good citizens, is politically, socially, and morally injurious to the community, a well as dangerous to those who engage in it: and that therefore every constitutional effort should be made to prevent this fearful temptation to national vice and social misery.

Dr. COFFIN proposed a vote of thanks to the chair, which was seconded by Mr. DOXSEY, and carried unanimously; and the proceedings terminated.

ISLINGTON BAND OF HOPE.

The first public meeting of this society was held on Wednesday, May 1st, in the Claremont Chapel Sunday-school, Mr. Hugh Owen presided, and the meeting was addressed by Mr. Jephcott, master of the Wilks-street Ragged-school, Mr. Biddle, master of the Holloway Ragged-school, Mr. Edward Parker, Mr. Giffin, Mr. Tidmarsh, Mr. Dresser, and Mr. T. B. Smithies. Master Hugh Owen recited an appropriate temperance hymn, and several delightful melodies were sung. It was announced that, by the liberality of the deacons of the church, the next meeting would be held in the same school-room on the first Wednesday in June.

KENTISH-TOWN.

The first of a series of monthly meetings for the advocacy of total abstinence, was held on Whit Monday evening, in the commodious British School-room connected with the Congregational Church under the pastoral care of the Rev. W. FORSTER. The room was well filled, the majority of the company being juveniles. After an excellent repast, the public meeting commenced. Mr. J. W. GREEN, who presided, addressed himself chiefly to the children present, explaining the reasons which induced the friends around him, and others in various parts of the kingdom, to promote by every means in their power the Temperance Reformation. They knew that much injury was done to the bodies, the minds, and the circumstances of thousands of their fellow-creatures, by the use of strong drinks; and therefore, as lovers of their fellow-creatures, and as servants of God, they could not but aim to check the progress of such an evil. Their object was twofold—the rescue of the drunkard, and the preservation of the sober; and while they rejoiced to know that thousands had been rescued from the miseries of drunkenness, by the blessing of God upon their instrumentality, yet, remembering that “prevention was better than cure,” they were most anxious that the young—that children—should adopt the practice of total abstinence, that they might be preserved from the evils of intemperance, and live “soberly, righteously, and godly in the world.”

Mr. KING pointed out the gradual and insidious process by which children were initiated into the practice of using strong drinks, till that practice became second nature. He explained, briefly, the properties of intoxicating drinks, and urged upon all present the practice of total abstinence by a number of appropriate motives.

Mr. SHIRLEY, the Secretary, related an interesting case of the reclamation of an inveterate drunkard, and stated, greatly to the delight of all present, that the Pastor of the Congregational Church, the Rev. W. Forster, had that morning signed the pledge of total abstinence.

Mr. BALFOUR delivered an impressive address, in the course of which he referred to the stigma which attached to the British nation, in consequence of the passion for strong drink, which prevailed among so large a portion of the population. He urged the children, as they would do honour to their country—as they would answer the end of their creation—as they would be happy in themselves and blessings to others, to become total abstainers from strong drinks. Let them tell their parents what they had heard that evening, and entreat permission to join that society.

Mr. KEMP urged the adoption of total abstinence from strong drinks upon all present, assuring them that it would be greatly promotive of their health and happiness.

The Doxology was then sung, and the names of a number of children were entered on the books. The room was fitted up with much taste, and the whole of the proceedings reflected great credit on the committee.

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

The friends of the Temperance Society took tea together on Whit-Monday, after which they held a public meeting. Mr. Alfred Serby was chairman, and in opening the meeting he set forth the injurious effects of strong drinks upon the physical system and upon society at large; and, in contrast, the beneficial effects which would result from the general adoption of temperance principles. Addresses were also delivered by Mr. Green, Mr. Dove, Mr. Plamer, Hardy, and Saunders. We had in attendance seven members who had been confirmed drunkards, but who have become useful members, and five of them have joined Christian churches.

BRIGHTON.

On Wednesday, May 15, between one and two hundred of the members of the Brighton Juvenile Temperance Society made a public demonstration of their principles in celebration of their second anniversary. At a quarter to two o'clock they started in procession from Bethesda Chapel; and, after perambulating the principal streets of the town, returned to the chapel, where they were regaled, gratuitously, with tea, &c. They then sallied out to the downs, where they amused themselves in various ways, while the adult friends took tea. At six o'clock the members collected, and again returned to the chapel, when the meeting was opened by the Rev. W. Hill, with prayer; and Mr. Yewen occupied the chair. The meeting was addressed by Mr. Powell, who spoke of the hardening tendency of the drinking usages. He alluded to several privations he had undergone, through intemperance; and contrasted them with the blessings and privileges enjoyed during the last eleven years, which period he has been a total abstainer.

Mr. AUSTIN spoke on the connexion between intemperance and crime. Both he and Mr. Powell interspersed their addresses with appropriate anecdotes.

The Rev. Mr. HILL spoke on the alliance of temperance with religion, both having God for their author.

During the evening four recitations were given, and several temperance hymns sung. The meeting, which was very well attended, was closed with prayer, and separated highly gratified with the day's proceedings.

FROME, SOMERSET.

We have again been favoured with a visit from Mrs. Stamp. On Sunday, May 13th, the large Wesleyan chapel the use of which was granted by the respected ministers and the trustees) was crowded; it is computed that not less than 2000 persons were present, and hundreds were obliged to go away, after vainly trying to gain an entrance.

Mrs. Stamp's address, from the last sentence of the Book of Daniel, was listened to for an hour and a quarter with profound attention; and there is reason to believe that her labour was not in vain. On Monday she lectured in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, which was crowded; and on Tuesday and Wednesday, after tea meetings, in the school-room. Zion Chapel was courteously granted for her lectures by the pastor, the Rev. W. Fernie. Thirty-eight signatures to the pledge of abstinence were the fruit of her three addresses. On Friday evening she pressed the claims of the temperance movement on Woman, at a numerously-attended meeting of females, in the school-room of Rookham Chapel, and 23 pledges were taken at its close, with the important resolution to form, as soon as practicable, a Female Association.

GAINSBOROUGH.

We have had a Temperance Society in this place for many years, but it was never brought prominently before the public till the beginning of 1848, when weekly meetings were held with considerable success. At the latter end of the year our committee engaged a missionary, from which time we have steadily progressed. About six months ago, in conjunction with some of our friends who reside in a small village (Bransby) between here and Lincoln, we tried to establish the principle of true Temperance there, and in a few of the neighbouring places, and met with great encouragement, holding the meetings monthly during the winter. At the above place our friends held a Teetotal festival on the 16th ult., which did great credit to the parties engaged in preparing a plentifully-supplied table for about 200 guests. The meeting, which was well attended, was presided over by a respectable farmer, who had been an abstainer thirteen years. Amongst other advocates was our respected missionary, who ably spoke on the various questions bearing on this subject. We separated about ten o'clock, highly delighted with the evening's entertainment. Eleven persons signed the pledge.

A. PALION, Sec.

NOTTINGHAM.

Mrs. Theobald has recently delivered six lectures on Total Abstinence, to crowded audiences, in the Mechanics'-hall and Assembly-rooms. Her lectures have been productive of much good, great numbers having signed the pledge, and the committee are making every exertion to carry out the agitation on a plan that they hope will prove successful.

MARKET DRAYTON.

On Tuesday, the 21st ult., was held in the Primitive Methodist Chapel the first anniversary of the Market Drayton Juvenile Band of Hope. "The children met in the above chapel in the afternoon, and afterwards went in procession through the principal streets of the town singing temperance hymns. It was pleasing to see seventy-six dear children showing to the inhabitants of Market Drayton that, young as they were, they proposed leading a sober and godly life. After a procession through the town we returned to the chapel, where they were provided with currant-bread and tea, and after tea we concluded this our first Juvenile Band of Hope Meeting with singing and prayer, and dismissed the children."

MANCHESTER.

Teetotalism in Manchester and its vicinities, in reference to the branches, was never in so healthful a condition as at present. We have six temperance halls; we hold 104 meetings weekly; we have 65 meeting-places; bands of hope, juvenile, Wesleyan union, and meetings of females. The advocates' meeting is held once in each month. More than £500 is paid yearly for rent of the different rooms and halls; there is an average attendance of 30,000 weekly, addressed by local advocates, principally working men, aided by William and David Morris Esqrs., Rev. W. M'Kerrow, Archibald Prentice, Esq., and others. Many of the branch committees distribute weekly from 600 to 700 temperance tracts. We have several meetings conducted solely by reformed drunkards. We have a first-rate set of hand bell-ringers, the bells (used by whom), have been bought from a beer shop. The advocates' meeting is getting into a more healthful working order. We have a new hall opened lately, through D. Morris, Esq.'s, exertions. Preparation is making for a cheap trip to Fleetwood by the Mather street branch. More might be said in praise, but for the present this must suffice.—Yours, TUNCLIFFE.

IMPORTANT PUBLICATION.

ON THE USE AND ABUSE OF ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS, in Health and Disease. Prize Essay. By W. B. CARPENTER, M.D., F.R.S., &c. &c. London: Charles Gilpin, Bishopsgate-street Without.

We cannot take up this volume without looking back to the period when Teetotalism was first introduced to the notice of an astonished and incredulous public, by some half dozen plain, simple, working men; and when its only printed organ was a penny monthly, having no very remarkable attractions either of paper or typography. Here we have a handsome volume, containing upwards of three hundred pages, printed with beautiful type, upon superfine paper, written by a gentleman having the right to place a number of honourable titles after his name, generally acknowledged to be one of the most accomplished physiologists of the age; with a unanimous testimony borne to the pre-eminent excellence of this particular Essay—after a careful examination, by three distinguished physicians, Drs. Forbes, Roupel, and Guy, of fourteen others, many of them possessing great merit—and dedicated, by permission, to His Royal Highness Prince Albert! Surely this is a movement in advance, which even the most sanguine of the early Temperance Reformers could hardly have anticipated.

But handsome volumes are not always intrinsically excellent. The penny monthlies to which we have referred, contained a large amount of solid and substantial truth, and greatly served the cause they were intended to advance. These have been succeeded by other monthlies and weeklies, and by tracts, pamphlets, and volumes almost innumerable, published at so low a price as to render them accessible to the humblest classes; but their very cheapness, in connexion with their plain attire, has, no doubt, proved a barrier to their introduction to those circles where some stress is laid upon outward appearance, and where, in order to secure courteous and respectful attention, there must be a respectable "introduction." The volume now before us has intrinsic excellence; is most respectably introduced; and those who entertain it, be of what class in society they may, will find it a most interesting, and, we earnestly hope and confidently believe, a most persuasive companion.

It appears that, in consequence of the earnest desire of a distinguished friend to the Teetotal movement to get the subject introduced into circles from which Temperance literature has hitherto been excluded, a prize of One Hundred Guineas was offered for the best Essay on the Use of Alcoholic Liquors in Health and Disease. The modesty of this distinguished friend has induced him to withhold his name from any printed advertisement, nor does it appear in this volume. It has, however, oozed out, that he is no other than JOSEPH EATON, Esq., of Bristol, who has added this to numerous other substantial acts of beneficence. The Essay was required to contain answers to the following questions:—

"First. What are the effects, corporeal and mental, of alcoholic liquors upon the healthy human system?"

"Secondly. Does physiology or experience teach us that alcoholic liquors should form part of the ordinary sustenance of man, particularly under circumstances of exposure to severe labour, or to extremes of temperature? Or, on the other hand, is there reason for believing that such use of them is not sanctioned by the principles of science, or the results of practical observation?"

"Thirdly. Are there any special modifications of the bodily or mental condition of man, short of actual disease, in which the occasional or habitual use of alcoholic liquors may be necessary or beneficial?"

"Fourthly. Is the employment of alcoholic liquors necessary in the practice of medicine? If so, in what diseases, or in what forms and stages of disease, is the use of them necessary or beneficial?"

As we have intimated, fifteen essays were sent in for competition. After what we have said of the reputation of Dr. Carpenter, and the qualifications of the adjudicators, we need do little more than present a very brief analysis of the contents of the volume, and an epitome of the conclusions at which the author has arrived, after a serious investigation of the whole question.

Chapter 1st takes a scientific and professional view of the subject, and is one to which the attention of medical men cannot fail to be especially directed, since, by the correctness of the views there advanced will the soundness of the author's conclusions be judged. Dr. Carpenter describes the influence of alcoholic liquors upon the physical, chemical, and vital properties of the animal tissues and fluids; the immediate and remote consequences of their excessive use on the nervous system and the various organs, and the special diseases they tend to produce; and concludes with valuable observations on their influence upon the duration of human life, attested by the experience of insurance offices, and the statistics of the Indian army.

Chapter 2nd inquires into the safety and advantage of these stimulants in relation to bodily and mental exertion, to the endurance of heat and cold, and resistance to morbid agencies; and remarks upon the consequence of their habitual moderate use upon the bodily system; which the author declares to be highly prejudicial to health, deranging the functions of the excretory organs, the stomach and nervous system, and interfering very materially with the processes of circulation and nutrition.

Chapter 3rd enters upon the inquiry of the advantage of alcoholic liquors in peculiar conditions of the system short of disease—as under extraordinary exertion, the want of adequate sustenance, deficiency of constitutional vigour, and during the conditions of pregnancy, suckling, childhood, and old age. The author admits that circumstances may arise in which the use of alcoholic liquor for a short time may be beneficial; but he, at the same time, contends that “the evils resulting from an unnecessary use of stimulants are so great, that recourse should never be had to them until every other more natural method of sustaining the vital powers has been tried without success; they should never be employed to replace any hygienic requirement, such as fresh air, mental repose, muscular exertion, &c.; and they should be disused whenever it may appear that the necessity for them no longer exists.”

Chapter 4th and last, describes the properties of alcohol as a medicinal agent, and shows that in this respect, as in others, its value has been greatly exaggerated.

The following are the “conclusions which appear to the author to be legitimately deducible from the facts and arguments which he has brought forward.” We give them in his own words:—

“In the first place—That from scientific examination of the modus operandi of alcohol upon the human body, when taken in a poisonous dose, or to such an extent as to produce intoxication, we may fairly draw inferences with regard to the specific effects which it is likely to produce, when repeatedly taken in excess, but not to an immediately-fatal amount.

“Secondly. That the consequences of the excessive use of alcoholic liquors, as proved by the experience of the medical profession, and universally admitted by medical writers, being precisely such as the study of its effects in poisonous immediately-fatal doses would lead us to anticipate, we are further justified in expecting that the habitual use of smaller quantities of these liquors, if sufficiently prolonged, will ultimately be attended, in a large proportion of cases, with consequences prejudicial to the human system; the morbid actions thus engendered being likely rather to be chronic than acute in their character.

“Thirdly. That, as such morbid actions are actually found to be among the most common disorders of persons advanced in life, who have been in the habit of taking a ‘moderate’ allowance of alcoholic liquors, there is very strong ground for regarding them as, in a great degree, dependent on the asserted cause; although the long postponement of their effects may render it impossible to demonstrate the existence of such a connexion.

“Fifthly. That the capacity of the healthy human system to sustain as much bodily or mental labour as it can be legitimately called upon to perform, and its power of resisting the extremes of heat and cold, as well as other depressing agencies, are not augmented by the use of alcoholic liquors; but that on the other hand, their use, under such circumstances, tends positively to the impairment of that capacity.

“Sixthly. That where there is a deficiency of power on the part of the system to carry on its normal actions with the energy and regularity which constitute health, such power can rarely be imparted by the habitual use of alcoholic liquors; its deficiency being generally consequent upon some habitual departure from the laws of health, for which the use of alcoholic liquors cannot compensate; and the employment of such liquors, although with the temporary effect of palliating the disorder, having not merely a remotely injurious effect per se, but also tending to mask the action of other morbid causes, by rendering the system more tolerant of them.

“Seventhly. That, consequently, it is the duty of the medical practitioner to discourage as much as possible the habitual use of alcoholic liquors, in however ‘moderate’ a quantity, by all persons in ordinary health; and to seek to remedy those slight departures from health, which result from the ‘wear’ and ‘tear’ of active life, by the means which shall most directly remove or antagonise their causes, instead of by such as simply palliate their effects.

“Eighthly. That whilst the habitual use of alcoholic liquors, even in the most ‘moderate’ amount, is likely (except in a few rare instances) to be rather injurious than beneficial, great benefit may be derived in the treatment of disease, from the medical use of alcohol in appropriate cases; but that the same care should be employed in the discriminating selection of those cases, as would be taken by the conscientious practitioner in regard to the administration of any other powerful remedy which is poisonous in large doses.”

Though some portions of this volume will be best understood by medical practitioners, there is much to interest and instruct the general reader. Teetotalers will do well to make themselves familiar with its facts and reasonings; they will by this means gain establishment and confirmation in their principles and practices, and will, we feel assured, be encouraged to new exertions in reference to those around them, who are still indulging in practices fatal to their health and happiness. If Societies would unite for the purpose of purchasing copies of this work, to place in the hands of medical gentlemen, ministers, and persons of influence in their localities, they might be instrumental in imparting an impetus to the temperance movement which would gratify and delight them.

We cannot conclude without commending this Prize Essay to the serious perusal of all who may read this notice, and of tendering our sincere thanks to the learned author, and to our zealous and munificent friend, the donor.

"MY CHILDREN SHALL NEVER BE TEETOTALERS."

THE RUINED PROFESSIONAL MAN: A TRUE NARRATIVE.

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

THE above were the words of a lady, on hearing that the family of a relative had signed the teetotal pledge. We should state, that the person who used this expression was the member of a church from which several had been expelled for drunkenness and debauchery brought on by strong drink. Her husband was a professional man, an office-bearer in the church, and a sly drunkard. She knew all these facts, and yet she determined that her children should never abandon the demon that brought them all to beggary. The following narrative will show how deeply she suffered for her resolution.

At the period of her marriage, her husband had a good fortune, and one of the first businesses in a large and populous town. He then stood high in character, was the trustee of the chapel where he attended, and was always looked up to, and consulted on all subjects respecting the prosperity of the church. He was considered a sound theologian, and very moral in his deportment. His father, mother, and sisters were also distinguished for their piety, and very highly esteemed. As the only son, he was a great favourite with his relatives, and particularly so after the death of his father. His widowed mother, pious aunt, and fond sisters doated upon him, and never addressed the Throne of Grace without remembering his name. There was, also, no example of drunkenness in the family to lead him astray. He was in himself a very amiable and lovable man. In fact, nature, circumstances, and religion placed him in the most enviable position for making his fortune, surrounding himself with honour, blessing his generation, and then, at the end of his days, passing to his rest amidst the sympathies and tears of thousands. We say he had all these prospects before him, and entirely within his reach, when he commenced life. How all these hopes were blasted for ever by strong drink, the following narrative will painfully show.

We may state, that, when he became a house-keeper and started in business, there was nothing said about temperance or teetotalism; consequently, no one felt very squeamish at having plenty of ale, beer, cider, wine, and spirits on the table. It was always so at his mother's and his father-in-law's. Call when you would, there was placed before you the decanters, the grog-stand, or the tankard. It was considered by all a sacred duty of hospitality and religion to tempt you with these poisons, and you were actually called unfriendly if you refused to drink. The pious mother of the gentleman in question took daily a certain portion of beer, wine, and spirits. His father-in-law, one of the most sober of moderate drinkers, was fond of his daily glass; the sisters, also, had no objection to these liquors, and both drank and commended them. The dwelling of our friend was a kind of ministerial rendezvous. The chapel was supplied by various preachers; and these gentlemen often called, and as strangers, or old friends, were frequently invited to dine. This, which ought to have been a blessing to the family, became its bane. In entertaining these guests, he ought to "have entertained angels," and would have done so but for the BOTTLE!

On every morning call of our ministerial friends, this promising young man was called in from his business to assist in draining his decanters, or else to take a glass of grog; and thus both idleness and love for the poison were induced; and we only give utterance to a deep and honest conviction when we say, we verily believe that our ruined neighbour has had, either in this world or in eternity, to curse most bitterly the supposed spiritual friends who used his hospitality, tempted him to drink, and brought him to poverty and an early grave. Alas! the tale is soon told. In consequence of these various allurements he became fond of anything in the form of alcoholic liquor; so that at last, when business was gone and money wanting, he would sit in a low pothouse kitchen and fuddle himself with swipes. His profession dwindled until he had nothing to do; his debts increased; his health declined; drinking led to debauchery, lying, and dishonesty. He spent every farthing of his own ample fortune; the dowry of his wife also was wasted; as far as he could he robbed his fond sisters and relatives; and then, in the middle of life, he sank into eternity, leaving his wife and children in a state of pauperism, and his creditors without any prospect of having their just demands liquidated.

There remains to be stated one fact more awful than all. During the whole of his downward career he kept up the show of religion. He believed in the atonement, and adopted it as an indulgence. Yes, he went, not to the Pope, but to heaven itself for licence to sin, and thanked God that he was not as other men, nor even as yon Catholics! The death of Christ, which was to others an incentive to virtue, was to him a motive for secret iniquity. For he contrived to do all in the dark; his debts, and a large portion of his viciousness, were not fully known until the grave had closed on his remains. Indeed we have reason to believe that he had so stupefied himself with drink that he was a stranger to the state of his affairs, and deceived as to the condition of his soul.

Here, then, is a brother slain, his family brought to poverty, his relations, friends, and creditors robbed, society and the church deprived of a member that might have been the ornament of his native town and of religion; and all this misery and desolation originating in what has been called MODERATE DRINKING! But for these destructive liquors our friend would now be a living man, the support and joy of his family, with an ample fortune at his command, and all the influence of virtue and piety to bless the world. But he is gone! The worms feed on his body. In fact, he was a living sepulchre before he breathed his last. As for his soul, we shudder to follow it. Even his surviving relatives blush to mention his name, while some of them pronounce it with a malediction. Here all the misery is irreparable. No tears can bring him back, or restore the glowing prospects that dawned on the morning of his public life, when his pious mother looked on him as her chief worldly joy. We have often sat with them at the same table, knelt with them at the same altar, and congratulated the widow, who had such a prop to her old age. Providence saved her the anguish of seeing his downfall. She descended to the grave before his iniquity was brought to light, and thus was rescued from the pangs with which his ruin must have pierced her soul. Their meeting in eternity we dare not divine; but we view it with dread.

READER! this was the husband of the lady who said, "My children shall never be Teetotalers!" At the time she uttered these words, she knew that he was on the road to ruin. He often came home drunk, or actually intoxicated himself at his own table. He was then wasting his fortune and hers; and yet she kept the decanter on the sideboard, and regularly quaffed her glass of grog! Oh! there is an infatuation about these moderate drinkers which throws the folly of the drunkard into the shade. We lately heard of a lady who most stoutly condemns Teetotalism, and will not allow her husband to abstain, although her two brothers were beggared by drink in this country, and compelled to flee to America. There they signed the pledge, joined the church of Christ, made their fortunes by their sobriety; and actually sent home and paid their creditors; and yet, were they to come home, the first thing their pious sister would do, would be to invite them again to take the fatal cup, and would place it before them on the table to tempt them from their steadfastness!

At the moment when writing these lines, we are called away to aid a family of six orphans, whose history adds another dark page to the tale of Moderation. Their father was an occasional preacher, whose conscience was so tender that he could not sign the pledge "for fear of sinning against the Bible," because, he said, "it recommended wine." It is true, he never could drink the wines of Palestine, and the Scriptures say nothing about port, sherry, or ginger-wine; but still, as they mentioned wine, he felt it a duty to drink porter, beer, gin, &c.!! He abhorred water, and felt no conscience about not drinking it, although so highly spoken of in the Bible. Nay, he even laughed at water-drinkers as a species of infidels who neglected "the wines of Scripture!" The Scriptures say more in praise of water than of wine; and yet, in his creed, it was a sin not to drink wine, but was no sin to abstain from water! Well! his history has been brief and sad. He drank, and preached against Teetotalism, until tippling made him give up preaching. At length, these liquors destroyed his religion, made him a bankrupt, covered him with disease, and brought him to a premature grave. He died a young man, and the only legacy he has left to the world is a widow and six children altogether unprovided for. Yet who drinks the less? These orphans are living lectures on the importance of Teetotalism; but they are read in vain; and some of those who ask charity for these little paupers, recommend the cup that brought their father to pauperism and an untimely end!

How long shall this desolation prevail? and especially be propagated from the sanctuary? Poets and prophets have represented the Church as a fountain of living waters, from which streams of salvation flow to bless mankind; but in modern times we have what, to the old-fashioned apostle James, seemed an impossibility, for the same source "sends forth sweet waters and bitter." The pulpit commends the cross and the goblet. There seems a dread lest the bowl should be cast aside. It is feared that the thousand artifices of publicans, gin-sellers, &c., will not be effective; that "the harp, viol, tabret, and pipe" of the tavern have not sufficient allurements, and therefore the herald of the cross stands not merely by the well of salvation, but by the poisonous vat; and cries, "Ho! every one that thirsteth come to the distillery and brewery, and drink; and thus spend your money for that which is not bread, and your labour for that which satisfieth not!"

Those of us who have adopted total abstinence, and induced our children to do so, have little alarm for our offspring, except from the moderate drinker, the church, and the ministers of religion. Drunkards will disgust them, for their conduct and history is a beacon. If they are ruined, it will be by the insidious moderate drinker. He will talk of the use as not being an abuse; as if the use of a poison would be anything but an abuse! He will laugh at their parents' extravagance and folly. Every time they sit down to a meal there will be a tirade against Teetotalism, and an eulogium on the drunkard's cup. The minister of religion will ply them with misinterpretations of Scripture, and, above all, by his pernicious example; and thus, perhaps, our son may be induced to take the deadly bowl,—may have a thirst for the poison created, and may become a drunkard; and we may meet at the left hand of the JUDGE the child who, but for these religious tipplers, might have been our joy through eternity. These thoughts make us rejoice more over the children that sleep in the grave than those which we leave behind, especially when we reflect that the church, which ought to be to them an ark of safety, is become, by its goblet of poison, in so many instances, a decoy to allure them to perdition!

The pious father and mother of the gentleman, whose narrative heads this article, died in hope that the earthly and eternal career of the son they left behind would be brilliant; but the drink they commended clouded his brain, slew his constancy, corrupted his heart, frustrated their prayers, and blasted all his prospects. He had from the cradle been nursed in pious moderation; but he was so often called upon by ministers and others to take the morning glass and the hospitable bowl, and to drink "the health" of every one but himself, that he was made feverish with an unnatural thirst, became idle and reckless; and was thus brought to the end we have seen. He died a murdered man—self-murdered! and yet, not altogether so; there were those who abetted the suicide, and among these we find almost a host of religious people!

When shall this desolation stop? When will ministers of religion, and other followers of Christ, dash the goblet from their lips, and thus say to the Destroying Angel, "IT IS ENOUGH! STAY NOW THY HAND?"

WHISKEY TRIED.—At a recent trial in Wisconsin, the subject of controversy was a demijohn of whiskey, which was ordered to be brought into court. The defendant was tried, and so was the whiskey—in other words, the whiskey was drunk; the jury were drunk also!

THE POWER OF MUSIC.

By T. S. ARTHUR.

"Dear father," says Mary Edwards, "don't go out this evening;" and the young girl, who had scarcely numbered fourteen years, laid her hand upon the arm of her parent.

But Mr. Edwards shook her off impatiently, muttering, as he did so, "Can't I go where I please?"

"Oh, yes, father!" urged Mary, drawing up to him again, notwithstanding her repulse. "But there is going to be a storm, and I wouldn't go out."

"Storm, Nonsense! That's only your pretence. But I'll be home soon—long before the rain, if it comes at all."

And, saying this, Mr. Edwards turned from his daughter and left the house. As soon as she was alone, Mary sat down and commenced weeping. There had been sad changes since she was ten years old. In that time her father had fallen into habits of intemperance, and not only wasted his substance but abused his family; and sadder still, her mother had died broken-hearted, leaving her alone in the world with a drunken father.

The young girl's trials, under these painful circumstances, were great. Night after night her father would come home intoxicated, and it was so rare a thing to get a kind word from him, that a tone of affection from his lips would move her instantly to tears. Daily the work of declension went on. Drunkenness led to idleness, and gradually Mr. Edwards and his child sunk lower and lower in the scale of comfort. The pleasant home, where they had lived for years, was given up, and in small, poorly-furnished rooms they hid themselves from observation. After this change Mr. Edwards moved along his downward way more rapidly, earning less and drinking more.

Mary grew old fast. Under her severe trials and afflictions her mind rapidly matured; and her affections for her father grew stronger and stronger as she realised more and more fully the dreadful nature and ultimate tendency of the infatuation by which he was led.

At last, in the anguish of her concern, she ventured upon remonstrance. This brought only angry repulse, adding bitterness to her cup of sorrow. The appearance to which we have alluded gave Mary an excuse for urging her father not to go out. How her remonstrance was received has been seen. While the poor girl sat weeping, the distant rolling of the thunder indicated the approach of the storm to which she had referred. But she cared little for it now. Her father had gone out. She had spoken of it only with the hope that he might have been induced to remain with her. Now that he was away, the agitation within was too great to have any concern for the turbulent elements without.

On leaving his home, Mr. Edwards, who had not taken any liquor for three or four hours, and whose appetite was sharpened for the accustomed stimulus, walked quickly in the direction of a drinking-house, where he usually spent his evenings. On entering, he found that there was a little commotion in the bar-room. A certain individual not over-friendly to landlords had introduced himself, and, his character being known, the inmates were disposed to have a little sport with him.

"Come now, fellow," said one, just as Edwards came in. "Mount this table and make a first-rate temperance speech."

"Do, and I'll treat you to the stiffest glass of whiskey-toddy the landlord can mix," added another. "Or perhaps you would like a mint julep or gin cocktail better? Anything you please. Make a speech and call for the liquor. I'll stand the treat."

"What d'ye say, landlord? Shall he make the speech?" said another, who was eager for sport.

"Please yourselves," replied the landlord, "and you'll please me."

"Very well. Now for the speech, old fellow! Here, mount this table." And two or three of the most forward took hold of his arms.

"I'm not in the humour for making a speech," said the temperance man, "but, if it please you as well, I'll sing you a song."

"Give us a song, then. Anything to accommodate. But come, let's liquor first."

"No," said the other firmly, "I must sing the song first, if I sing at all."

"Don't you think your pipes will be clearer for a little drink of some kind or other?"

"Perhaps they would," was replied. "So, provided you have no objection, I'll take a glass of cold water—if such a thing is known in this place."

The glass of water was presented, and then the man, who was somewhat advanced in years, prepared to give the promised song. All stood listening attentively, Edwards among the rest. The voice of the old man was low and tremulous, yet every word was uttered distinctly, and with a pathos which showed that the meaning was felt. The following well-written temperance song was the one he sang, and while his voice filled the room every other sound was hushed:—

"Where are the friends that to me were so dear,
Long, long ago—long ago?
Where are the hopes that my heart used to cheer,
Long, long ago—long ago?
Friends that I loved in the grave are laid low,
Hopes that I cherished are fled from me now,
I am degraded, for rum was my foe,
Long, long ago—long ago.

"Sadly my wife bowed her beautiful head—
Long, long ago—long ago.
Oh, how I wept when I found she was dead!
Long, long ago—long ago.
She was an angel—my love and my guide,
Vainly to save me from ruin she tried,
Poor broken-hearted! 'twas well that she died
Long, long ago—long ago!

"Let me look back on the days of my youth;
Long, long ago—long ago.
I was no stranger to virtue and truth,
Long, long ago—long ago.
Oh, for the hopes that were pure as the day!
Oh, for the joys that were purer than they!
Oh, for the hours that I've squandered away,
Long, long ago—long ago!"

The silence that pervaded the room when the old man's voice died, or might rather be said sobbed away, was the silence of death. His own heart was touched, for he wiped his eyes, from which the tears had started. Pausing scarcely a moment, he moved slowly from the room, and left his audience to their own reflections. There was not one of them who was not more or less affected, but the deepest impression had been made on the heart of Edwards. The song seemed as if it had been made for him. The second verse, particularly, went thrilling to the very centre of his feelings:

"Sadly my wife bowed her beautiful head!"

How suddenly arose before him the sorrow-stricken form of the wife of his youth at those words! and when the old man's voice faltered on the line—

"Poor broken-hearted! 'twas well that she died!"

the anguish of his spirit was so great, that he only kept himself from sobbing aloud by a strong effort at self-control. Ere the spell was broken, or a word uttered by any one, he arose and left the house.

For many minutes after her father's departure, Mary sat weeping bitterly. Tenderly did she love her parent, but this love was only a source of the keenest anguish, for she saw him swiftly passing along the road to destruction without the power to save him.

Grief wastes itself by its own violence. So it was in this instance. The tears of Mary were at length dried; her sobs were hushed, and she was about rising from her chair, when a blinding flash of lightning glared into the room, followed instantly by a deafening jar of thunder.

"Oh, if father were home!" she murmured, clapping her hands together.

Even while she stood in this attitude, the door opened quietly, and Mr. Edwards entered.

"I thought you would be afraid, Mary, and so I came home," said he, in a kind voice.

Mary looked at him with surprise. This was soon changed to joy, as she perceived that he was perfectly sober.

"Oh, father!" she sobbed, unable to control her feelings, and leaning her face on his breast as he spoke—"if you would never go away!"

Tenderly did the father draw his arm round his weeping child, and kissed her pure forehead.

"Mary," said he, as calmly as he could speak, "for your mother's sake"—but he could not finish the sentence. His voice quivered, and became inarticulate.

Solemnly, in the silence of his own heart, did the father, as he stood thus with his child in his arms, repeat the vows he had already taken. And he kept his vows.

Wonderful is the power of music! It is the heart's own language, and speaks to it in a voice of irresistible persuasion. It is a good gift from heaven, and should ever be used in a good cause.

BET BRODIE,
THE DRUNKEN FISHWIFE.

[BY R. W. VANDERKISTE, CITY MISSIONARY.]

AMONG other men who view human nature in the aggregate is the City Missionary. Imagine him plunging into the depths of some apparently interminable neighbourhood of gordian-knotted courts and alleys, from day to day. He has opportunities indeed of studying human nature; and he finds that—

"Lawless and unrestrain'd, the human race Rushes through all the paths of wickedness."

Traces of grace received are few and far between—

"Oases in the moral desert rare."

Perhaps the reader may afford to spare a tear over poor Bet Brodie.

My acquaintance with her commenced about four years since, in one Frying-pan-alley. Here she was a terror to many. She always reminded me of the fabled accounts of the Amazons. She was of colossal stature, and a fiery red complexion. I have seen her a little more than half-dressed, her long, coarse, jet-black hair streaming almost to her waist, sally forth from her room, maddened by drink, and, armed with a long broom, daring the whole court to combat. Surely, if ever any case appeared almost hopeless it was hers.

I shall not conceal that I felt afraid of her. Not so much afraid of her, however, as of suffering her soul to change worlds without warning; but I expected to be knocked down; and although it would not have been the first time I have been knocked down, that is not, after all, a matter to which a man becomes perfectly used and reconciled. But Bet Brodie never knocked me down; she has insulted me; but her broom she reserved for Mrs. — and others, who furnished themselves with brooms to match.

I have read, in the affecting "Life of Silvio Pellico" (who has, I find, gone to his long home), that, whilst in the fortress of Spielberg, he formed an amicable acquaintance with a spider and a mouse. Now, a spider has fangs, and a mouse sharp teeth, but kindness will do much. Bet Brodie, fierce as she was, at last appeared to listen to my warnings, as the warnings of a friend, and permitted me, when sober, to read and pray with her; but her drunken habits continued the same. About this period the National Temperance Society sent a good man to labour here—Mr. Williamson—with whom I worked most pleasantly in concert, and to whom I at once introduced Bet Brodie.

We succeeded in forming a Total Abstinence Society, and one of the earliest members was this woman. Many drunkards, sweeps, costermongers, dustmen, &c., joined, and about sixty inebriates became reformed characters. I shall not soon forget sitting on the platform at a tea festival of this our society, and seeing Bet Brodie and Bill C—, a costermonger, and a dozen or twenty others, handing the good things of this life about with the most astonishing activity. "Mind yourselves, gentlemen!" said one (who has spent a guinea a week in drink when costermongering was better than it is now), handing a huge teapot down to the boilers, and roaring out, "More water, you there!" Mrs. Brodie also was indefatigable in handing round the cake and bread-and-butter; the rest were equally alert in attending to the comfort of the party; and it was a pleasant sight.

But something better remains. Bet Brodie not only became a Teetotaler, she became a frequenter of public worship; and I can almost see her now, sitting in the side aisle, with her arms a-kinbo. Not a word uttered by the speaker escaped her. Well, she saved money; she was well dressed; she relinquished Sunday trading; she attended my meetings, and the big tears have I seen roll one after another down her cheeks, as I discoursed concerning the love of Christ; and no one who saw her and knew her would doubt but that they were tears of the right sort.

Bet Brodie could neither read nor write; but she could pray, and she did pray. She prayed for mercy. Her prayer was answered; and she could soon talk about her blessed Saviour—and mean what she said, too—as well as if she had been at college, and better than some can who have been there.

It were well could we end here, but we cannot. She went on well for a long time; and then, alas! a shadow came over her heart. That shadow was pride; a dark shadow, come when and where it may. She bought trumpery, in the shape of trinkets, rings, &c., and disfigured herself with them. Then, an unfortunate dissension took place; men of infidel sentiments insinuated themselves among the committee; and our society, which had effected so much good, and promised to effect so much more, was broken up!

Bet Brodie very soon became as bad, or, if possible, worse than ever. Nearly the last time I saw her alive was one night: she was drunk, and had risen from her bed to fight with a sweep's wife. Her face was partly covered with blood, and a crowd of costermongers, thieves, &c., were looking on. I made my way through the mob, and, approaching her, requested she would follow me in doors, leading the way to her room; and after giving her suitable exhortations, I left. Scarcely, however, had I cleared the adjoining court, when, as I afterwards found, the fray was renewed. Shortly afterwards I was sent for to visit Bet Brodie, and was informed that she was dying. I found her very ill; and she cast up such an awful look in my face when I spoke to her, that I felt almost chilled. She cried bitterly.

Preferring drink to food, and being unable to obtain both, she had gone without nourishment until the cold had so struck her that she sunk down—to die!

She appeared truly penitent, but possessed with an awful dread that her soul would be lost. On questioning her closely, however, I discovered so much reliance on Christ, as to prevent me from deeming hers a hopeless case. "If you perish," said I, at last, "will you perish at the foot of the cross?" "Yes!" said she, with an agony of earnestness. "None," said I, "ever perished there." Pointing to her fatherless child, for she was a widow, she made me promise, with the resistless eloquence of a dying mother, more, perhaps, than I should ever have been able to perform had the boy lived. She had few more hours to spend on earth. My prayer that night was the last prayer I was permitted to make for her.

Bet Brodie is dead, and her child too!

TEMPERANCE AND HOME MISSIONS.

THE progress of Temperance in the congregations of the missionaries, we cannot so accurately note in statistical returns, as in the earlier days of the Reformation; inasmuch as the pledge is not so universally the test of temperance principles. Associations, in some sections of the country, have been injudiciously managed, and have brought the cause temporarily into disrepute; and little can be accomplished in this form, until these organizations give place to those which shall secure more general confidence and respect. Temperance, however, is preached as a religious duty, and urged as a matter of principle, no less than ever; and many missionaries report that their churches are temperance churches, their congregations, temperance congregations; and some of them state that there are no intoxicating drinks sold in their townships and counties. Those who are pledged to entire abstinence are so connected in these associations with other denominations, that their number cannot be stated very definitely; from the reports which we have received, however, we may safely say, that in the communities where the missionaries labour, the number of pledges cannot be less than 105,000. *American Home Missionary Society. ## FRIENDSHIP'S WARNING!

A TEMPERANCE MELODY, BY C. MEADLEY.

Air—"Jeannette and Jeannotte."

Come away, my lads, now come, from the low and drunken set
Who lounge about the alehouse fire, and indulge in "heavy wet;"
They will ruin health and soul, and your reputation too,
And if you follow in their course, you'll oft have cause to rue;
For, depend on it, you'll find the Temperance plan's the best,
To keep you out of evil ways, and set your mind at rest:
When sinners, then, entice you in, I pray consent you not,
Nor look upon the wine that's red—strong drink is raging hot.

Oh! enter not the wicked path, or ways of evil men,—
They drink the wine of violence, their mirth is quickly gone;
They stagger in their vomit, and are reeling to and fro;
The curse of God is on strong drink, the drunkard's future woe:
Oh! had I but the power, throughout the world I would roam,
And have no drunken men abroad, no weeping wives at home;
All the children I'd have fed, and with clothing clean and neat,
Seated around the happy hearth, with shoes upon their feet.
These comforts may be had, ay, and many more beside,
If you sign the pledge of abstinence, and throw strong drink aside.
Be resolved, my lads, I pray! and now take a friend's advice,
And quit those "little drops," that lead to drunkenness and vice.
Then leave your drink at once, I pray, and don't become a sot,
Nor lounge about the ale-house fire, with 'bacca, pipes, and pot:
'Twill undermine your health, bring on disease and want of bread,
And we will be your fate when you're numbered with the dead!

A FEW WORDS FROM "CON."

CON! and who is CON?—a question which will very naturally be asked, and various conjectures may be made in consequence. He is well known in the locality where he is at present residing; nor is he confined to his own home; he has acquaintances who are scattered about in various parts of the country, and on the Continent, to whom he is as familiar as a gill of ale; and it is not improbable, in these "go-a-head" days of Teetotalism, that the name will be recognised by many who have become converts to the cause, and to such he offers his congratulations. Be firm to the pledge, and be not ashamed to confess it.

CON has had considerable experience as a young man in public-houses, where much of his time, to say nothing of his money, has been consumed in intoxication. Having conformed over his past life, and conquered the desire to continue the use of strong drinks, he is now desirous of making amends for the future, and of moving in a sphere more congenial to his present feelings; in consequence of which he is constant in his endeavours to console and convince those who are "heavy laden" to contrive and take some "rest"—to fly from the error of their ways, and to instil into their minds the text from the standard of Divine truth: "If sinners entice thee, consent thou not."

And as CON sees the conjugal happiness of many individuals or connections impaired, and their homes in confusion, through the contemptible conduct of the head of the concern, he would offer his condolence in a spirit of charity, and try to convey such persons away from "the path of the wicked," that they may "no longer live the rest of their time in the flesh to the lusts of men, but to the will of God;" and so continue in the work of consolation, that contentment, health, peace, concord, and unity may be brought under their constant consideration; and, by placing the contrast of their former contaminations before their minds, convince them that their course would probably have ended in confirmed intemperance, and they become condemned convicts, or be consigned to the drunkard's grave!

The contemplation of this subject is so continually brought before the mind of CON, that he conceives nothing can be more conducive to the happiness and well-being of man than his conversion to the habits of temperance and sobriety. By the frequent use of strong drink evil habits are contracted, his condition is lowered, and foolish in his conversation, confused in his ideas, his conscience becomes seared, his vicious propensities strengthened, and his character ruined.

The dreadful consequences of intemperance have so long been before the world, and the misery and crime it entails upon the nation, that "twere a consummation devoutly to be wished" to have the intoxicating cup utterly banished from all hearths and homes, that there may be a contented, happy, and industrious community. That drinking customs are contrary to nature, and can with safety be entirely dispensed with, CON is fully convinced. The highest medical authorities concur in their conviction that intoxicating drinks are not congenial, but absolutely poisonous to the human constitution, and consequently are not conducive to the full development of a healthful condition.

In conclusion, CON hopes that this contribution may be the means of bringing others to conform to the system of Teetotalism, to control their appetite for strong drink, and to consign their "little drops" to perdition. Thus they will confer a lasting benefit on themselves and their connections, and render service to the community at large, by becoming consistent members of a society whose principles are so consonant to the mind of

CON.

TESTIMONY OF A GAS LABOURER AND STOKER.

I have been for fifteen years a labourer and stoker in the Phoenix Gas Works. During that time I have seen many ills arise out of the drinking customs. Ten years ago I was addicted to intemperance, brought on by drinking with those, who thought, with many others, that intoxicating drinks enabled them to perform their very laborious calling as gas stokers. The habit of drinking was then ably supported by that cruel system of tyranny, "fines and footings." It affords me much pleasure to tell you what God has wrought in me and through me by the instrumentality of total abstinence. By God's blessing I was the first man that made a public avowal of the temperance principle in the gas-works with which I am connected. With all the power of deep-rooted custom, and the influence supporting those customs, arrayed in opposition to the total abstinence principle—with all this, and the tempers of many to deal with, I dared to sign the temperance pledge; I dared to believe Mr. Sherman's tale of Dr. Beddoes and his anchormen; and I dared to believe it would save me. And have I been deceived? Ask my wife, ask my children—

"Now comfort and happiness reigns,
Where sorrow and anguish once dwelt."

And I dared to raise the temperance standard in the gas-works, and there it now waves in triumphant majesty over the graves of the fines and footings, showing the power of mighty truth.

The effect teetotalism has had on my circumstances, family, &c., space forbids me to enter into. Suffice it to say that I am in comfortable circumstances, and, while I think of my wife and children's comfort at present, I have been led to think of continuing a portion of that comfort in case of my death. I have, therefore, effected a policy in the Temperance Provident Institution. My situation in life has been improved by the adoption of the temperance principle. I am now foreman of the works in which I was labourer and stoker, and have been so more than two years. Taking all into consideration, I have no hesitation in saying that I consider the temperance principle to be beneficial in every respect to the working man.

IMPORTANT REPORT ON THE SALE OF BEER.

THE Select Committee appointed by the Lords to inquire into the operation of the present acts for the sale of beer, have brought in a report which is worthy of the serious consideration of all those interested in the progress of temperance, and of the health and morals of the working classes.

It will be recollected that when the act was passed allowing beer-shops to be opened for the sale of that liquor, and with licence to allow its being drunk on the premises, it was argued that it would enable the working class to obtain a pure and home-brewed article. It was to supersede the doctored and poisonous compounds sold under the name of beer, in which cocculus indicus, tobacco, grains of paradise, and various other stimulating and stupifying drugs, played a far more conspicuous part than malt and hops. It was, in fact, to bring back malt and hops into the national beverage, and to give the working man a pot of ale as genuine as the farmer brewed under his own eye.

How miserably these rose-pink promises were falsified, the whole country knows. Thousands of beer-shops, Tom and Jerrys, or Kindley Winks, as they were called in different parts of the country, were opened, and the working man, instead of being tempted by one sign on his way from the factory or the workshop home, was beset with twenty. He had to run the gauntlet of a whole row of these new pot-houses from his place of labour to his home. At every corner, and in every obscure nook, he heard the song and loud clamour of voices, and the fumes of tobacco were wafted to him, and added strength to his desire to see what was going on, and to join in the discussion and the merriment.

The effect of this was soon seen, and is found in this Report in an increase of the houses for the sale of intoxicating liquors from 88,930 to 123,396, or an addition in England and Wales alone of 34,466 such places. As might have been expected, the increase of crime has been proportionate—the commitments for trial in England and Wales in the years 1848-9 being in proportion to those of 1830-1, the two first years after the passing of the Beer Act, of 156 to 100. Fifty-six per cent. of crime and demoralization, of commitments and county expenditure, are the direct result of the extension of the sale of beer, which was to work such wonders amongst the labouring population. Wonders, indeed, have been worked, but they are of a frightful and deplorable character. No single advantage which was promised has been realized, but the contrary. The beer, so far from being, in these new beer-shops, superior to that of the old ale-houses and taverns, has been found to be infinitely worse. Such a thing as a home-brew has rarely taken place, except such a brew as witches were celebrated for—a decoction of deleterious stuffs.

The Report of the Lords' Committee states, on the fullest evidence, that while the object of the Beer Act was to create a class of houses of refreshment, respectable in character, brewing their own beer, only one-twelfth of these houses brew their own beer, but are the property of brewers, or are tied to them by advances. Thus, the act has only operated to extend the very evil which it was meant to diminish; it has extended the field of operation of the great brewers, and what of objectionable was existing in their liquor was perpetuated and diffused through no less than eleven-twelfths of these new houses.

The Act, according to its promoters, amongst whom conspicuous was Lord Brougham, was to diminish the use of ardent spirits by the substitution of a cheap and wholesome beverage, and thus greatly contribute to the health and happiness of the masses. How it has contributed to these objects, the records of the magistracy and the criminal courts show. As to the use of ardent spirits, that is far from having decreased, as witness the Excise returns. What, then, has the Beer Act done? Has it effected one of its proposed objects? Totally the reverse. It has not substituted a purer beverage; it has not diminished the use of ardent spirits; it has not promoted the health and happiness of the people.

Where the beer—that is, in eleven-twelfths of these houses—is the same as before, it is the beer of the brewers; where it is not so, it is often of a still worse description, from the poverty and ignorance of the people who make it. The number of beer-houses is multiplied immensely, of a quality and precisely in those locations which are most likely to do the most mischief. In towns they abound in the most obscure quarters, and are the resorts of the lowest characters; in the country they draw the rustic population from their own firesides, and are often opened in those remote spots where they are convenient for the worst of practices. In every way they have become an immense physical and moral nuisance. When we recall the terrific accounts of destitution and depravity existing in numerous populations in our cities, we can readily conceive to what an extent these low resorts, these fountains of poison, both to body and soul, continue to create that destitution, and to augment that depravity. Fifty thousand of such houseless and vagabond people, in London alone, find in these haunts the means of dissipating their ill-earned gains, and deepening the tide of moral corruption.

The Lords' Report recommends to increase the difficulty of obtaining licences for these houses. At present all that is required is a certificate of character from six rate-payers, and a licence must be granted. This amounts to no security for the decent character of such a house whatever; six certifiers can always be found; and this is made plain enough by numbers of such houses being kept by people who have forfeited their licences as victuallers by their misconduct, and by thieves and convicts. To put an end to this the Committee propose that all such houses shall be open to the visits of the police. That overseers or guardians of the poor may object to the granting of licences in remote or unfit places. That no houses rated at less than £10 per annum shall receive a licence, and that this rating shall advance to £15 and £20, according to the amount of population. Timely notice to be given of the intentions to demand a licence, and heavier securities on the part of certifiers; that is, such persons certifying character shall be those rated at not less than £8, £10, and £15, according to population.

These are all judicious and highly-necessary recommendations, as far as they go; but there is another, which we regard as still more important, and that is, that no debts for intoxicating liquors shall be recoverable at law.

We sincerely trust that the issue of this Report will be followed by a measure converting its recommendations into laws. The act creating such laws is not merely a failure—it has become a serious nuisance; and the retracing our steps in this particular would be a decided advance in our career of moral and sanitary improvement. We trust that no pleas of necessary income, on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, will be allowed to stand in the way of this most desirable reform. If it were likely to produce a real loss to the revenue, we would say, let it be so, rather than the present awful loss of health, happiness, and moral purity, to millions of the industrial population; but we are quite sure that the reduction of the number of those poison-shops would reduce materially the poor's-rates, and add to the revenue itself, by the increased consumption of a great variety of tax-paying but healthful commodities.

GRAND EXCURSION OF TEETOTALERS.

WE stated in our last that the COMMITTEE, under whose management the recent SERIES OF MEETINGS IN EXETER-HALL was held, had determined upon undertaking AN EXCURSION, upon a large scale, during the summer. Several meetings, numerously attended, have been held, and as the result, the particulars contained in the Advertisement on the first page of this Number have been extensively circulated. We direct particular attention to that Advertisement, and recommend an immediate application for tickets. The Committee have determined that the profits arising from the Excursion shall be divided between the Societies taking part in it, and the Committee of Management of the Exeter-hall Meetings; the latter portion to be applied to the balancing of the account for the late Series, and the preparing for ANOTHER SERIES on a still larger scale, to commence in the ensuing AUTUMN. Of this particulars may be expected in our next number. In the mean time any of the friends who promised donations and have not yet paid them in, are requested to do so without delay, addressed to the Treasurer, Mr. JOHN CASSELL, 80, Fenchurch-street, London.

HYMNS

SUNG AT THE MEETING OF THE MARKET DRAYTON JUVENILE "BAND OF HOPE," MAY, 1850.

I.

Peace to the world! let mortals sing,
The drunkard's cure is found;
Let earth with loud Hosannas ring,
Till heaven shall catch the sound.

Peace to the world! the drunkard's woes
Are swallowed up in joy,
The deadly stream no longer flows,
To darken and destroy.

Peace to the world! for alien hearts
Are joined with bands of love;
And pard'ning grace true joy imparts,
With blessings from above.

Peace to the world! let mortals sing,
The drunkard's cure is found;
Let earth with loud Hosannas ring,
Till heaven shall catch the sound.

II.

We love to hear the hymn of praise,
By happy children sung;
And God himself, well pleased, will bless
Our efforts for the young.

We plead the high, triumphant cause,
Of mercy, peace, and love;
Though evil men revile, we know
"Angels" rejoice above.

Then, lovely children, come and join
Our hopeful little band,
T'will drive away the greatest foe
That ever scourged our land.

WATER.—The Spaniards have a proverb that, "Drinking water neither makes a man sick, nor in debt, nor his wife a widow."

SCURVY AND ARDENT SPIRITS.

THE above disease, and, according to Dr. Vaughan, its remedy, having been given some notoriety of late, it may be well to put on record, in the pages of a Teetotal periodical, the following facts bearing on the subject, calculated as they are to disabuse the public mind of the wrong impression likely to be made on it, to some extent, by the doctor's official lucubration.

In the Medical Times, of March 23 and June 15, is a contribution from the pen of Alexander Bryson, M.D., R.N., entitled, "The respective value of Lime-juice, Citric Acid, and Nitrate of Potash, in the treatment of Scurvy," wherein is examined, at some length, the comparative value of these drugs, and then there is detailed an attack of scurvy, as that troublesome disease appeared amongst the crews of certain French and English ships engaged in warlike operations in the River Plate. After various statements, Dr. Bryson thus winds up his communication:—"The following are the conclusions that seem to be fairly deducible from the preceding observations: First, that although lemon-juice and sugar—that is, lemonade—will not prevent scurvy for an indefinite length of time, and in despite of all kinds of privation with respect to vegetable substances, yet it will generally, in vessels provisioned according to the present system, retard its evolution, according to the presence or absence of other predisposing causes, for three, four, or perhaps for six months; and when given in increased doses after the disease has broken out, it will for a time lessen the severity of the symptoms, and sometimes effect a cure. Secondly, that SPIRITS are totally devoid of anti-scorbutic properties, and injurious to the health of men deprived of vegetable diet. Red wine, on the contrary, is, under similar circumstances, conducive to health, and assists materially in warding off the scorbutic diathesis." [I suppose from the vegetable acid it contains.—H. M.] "Thirdly, as the best means of preventing scurvy from breaking out in large masses of men is a wholesome, nutritious diet, consisting of fresh meat, vegetables, and farinaceous substances, so when the disease has occurred, these are the best, and perhaps the only remedies required to effect a cure." H. MUDGE.

A TRUE STORY.

A young man, apparently about nineteen years of age, coming down the Bowery, met another about the same age, at the corner of Grand-street, where the following conversation was held:—

"You look mighty sober, Jem," said the first-mentioned person; "if any of the suckers should see you, they would mark you down as turned parson, or temperance lecturer."

"I feel sober," said the other, "which is more than you have done for a month; and as for the suckers, I care not what they think or say."

"Then you're going to cut them, I s'pose, and give up all their fine speers."

"I have cut them already, Tom; and I advise you, if ever you wish to be anybody, to do the same. I've had speers enough to last me as long as I live, and I mean to live a temperate and virtuous life hereafter."

"Well, Jem, I don't intend just yet to leave the club, because you know one-half of my liquor-money comes from it by virtue of my station among them. But I'd just like to know where you got your sanctimonious notions, that I may drop in some time and get a small bite. Been to a temperance meeting, I suppose."

"Yes."

"Signed away your freedom, eh!"

"No! I have regained my freedom."

"How so?"

"Why, I used to be a slave to the custom of speering and drinking; now I am free from both."

"Who stuffed such foolish notions into your head? I thought you an ornament to society before."

"Tom, you wanted to know where I got my new impressions from. If you will listen to me you shall hear. You know I have not met with the club for two weeks. The last time I was at the meeting of the club I started from home about ten o'clock, and as I was passing through a dark street near home, I heard something like a woman screaming. I followed the sound as well as I could through an alley to a rear house, from which I heard the cry of 'Murder!' 'Help!' and such like cries of distress. I hurried upstairs to a room in which I saw a light, and, opening the door, saw a scene that made me mad. A fine-looking woman was bound down to the rail of the bedstead, while her brute of a husband sat on the head of a barrel, beating her with the leg of a table he had torn to pieces. I sprang upon the monster, and, clenching him by the hair of his head, fairly dragged him to the top of the stairs, and pushed him down headlong. I had scarcely done this when the brute again entered. I started back in horror, for it was my own brother! He had come back to New York unknown to me, and lived here a life of drunkenness. The next night I recorded my pledge never to taste, touch, or deal in strong drink. This, Tom, is the reason I shall meet no more with the club. It has brought my brother to the madhouse, and might do more to me did I not abandon his footsteps."

"I begin to feel, since you have told me about your brother John, that the club ain't exactly the thing, after all."

"You may be sure of that, Tom; and if you will go to the temperance meeting with me this evening, and sign the pledge, depend upon it you will never regret it."

"Well, Jem, I am satisfied; I will go."

He did go. Jem is now a preacher of the Gospel, while Tom is a celebrated temperance lecturer.

LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, ESQ., M.P.

THE following letter has recently been addressed to this gentleman by the Teetotalers of America:—

"SIR,—When several of us were at Liverpool, returning from the 'World's Convention,' we were entertained by you in a Christian and princely manner, and made to feel that, if the cause of Temperance had not pervaded all the high classes of Britain, there were at least a few of wealth, intelligence, and extensive influence who understood its merits, and were looking to it as the hope of England, amid all the pauperism and suffering of its crowded population. We then learned, not from yourself but others, that you had made the great sacrifice of a seat in Parliament because you would not violate your strict and truly correct Temperance principles, and pander to the depraved and degenerating custom of bribing the electors with strong drink. It is with great pleasure that we now hear, in America, that you have been returned a member by the electors of Derby, without your expending a single sixpence in this degrading custom. Sir, we congratulate you on this result. And all honour, we say, to the men of Derby! Your election will strengthen the hands of Temperance men on both continents, and enable you to go into Parliament the consistent and, as we know you will be, the noble advocate of principles which might save fifty millions annually to your country, and deliver her from the most debasing and destructive bondage. With grateful remembrance of your politeness and hospitality, and in the hope that your good Temperance influence will not only be felt in Parliament but will reach the throne, we are, yours respectfully, LISTEN, ENGLISH CHRISTIANS!—In a letter recently received from Dr. Poor, Missionary to Ceylon, is the following:—"Not only the John Jacob Astor, of Calcutta, but the Cingalese, the Atheistical Boodhists of South Ceylon, have recently formed a society 'to resist the swelling tide of intoxication,' that now, by means of European and Christian influences threatens to overwhelm them! Will not God be avenged on such a Christendom?"

THE EVILS OF MODERATE DRINKING an Argument for Total Abstinence from all Alcoholic Liquors. An Address. By the Rev. W. REID. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

THE object of Mr. Reid in this Address is to show that Temperance advocates "have more to do with moderate drinkers than with drunkards, and that the true way to get rid of drunkenness is to suppress moderate drinking." In prosecution of his design, he enumerates what he conceives to be the chief evils of the moderate-drinking system:—"1. Moderate drinking is prejudicial to health. 2. It is often the occasion of accidents fatal to life. 3. Its cost is immense. 4. It invigorates the native depravity of the heart. 5. It tends to drunkenness. 6. It exposes the weak to a temptation which only the strong can resist. 7. It is difficult to determine the point where moderation ceases and drunkenness begins. 8. It utterly unfits those who support it for being of the slightest service in reclaiming its victims. 9. The moderate drinker is incapacitated for consistently reproof or sitting in judgment on one who has erred through strong drink. 10. It is a temptation to reformed drunkards." These points are well reasoned, and fully illustrated by facts. Well knowing that moderate drinking is not only a great evil in itself, but the chief obstacle to the success of the Temperance Movement—a movement which has brought blessings to thousands, and would bring blessings to thousands more but for the inconsistent conduct of professing Christians—we rejoice that Mr. Reid delivered this address, and that the Committee of the Scottish Temperance League have published it in so cheap a form. It is just the tract to put into the hands of those who drink moderately; and as that is a very large class, we hope this Address will be circulated by thousands.

DEVIL'S SPRINGS.—An old Indian chief, in a letter addressed to President Taylor, has the following:—"We cannot trust your people. True, they take our pipes, and smoke with us, but their spirits and tempers are not made better; for with the other hand, they give us water from the springs of the devil's country."

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

KNOWLEDGE FOR THE WORKING CLASSES.

On Wednesday, June 5th, an address was delivered in the Temperance Hall, King-street, Seven Dials, by Mr. W. TWEEDIE, on the Importance of Knowledge to the Working Classes. After an eloquent introduction on the tendencies of the present age, and the great facilities afforded to all classes for the acquirement of useful and important information on almost every subject, and on the interesting part borne by the Press in this great work, Mr. Tweedie adverted particularly to the publications now issuing by Mr. JOHN CASSELL, namely, "The Working Man's Friend," and "The Working Man's Library." Those publications, he said, were emphatically what they pretended to be; and it remained to be seen whether the working classes would support them in a manner worthy of the spirit which called them forth. He who put knowledge within their reach was their friend, but those who would receive benefit from that friendship must themselves make exertion—must, with their best ability, sustain the enterprise. Some persons, well meaning persons too, seemed greatly to underrate the intellectual capacities of working men, and doled out literary aliment to them as if they were mere children. But as Mr. Cassell had a personal knowledge of the class for whom he was publishing, and had learned to sympathize with them, he (Mr. Tweedie) had no doubt but the forthcoming "Library" would be worthy its great object. The Essays which had appeared in the successive Supplementary Numbers of "The Working Man's Friend," must have convinced all who read them, that deep, earnest, and vigorous thought could be exercised by persons engaged in the humblest occupations. Those Essays were a credit to the age, and for philosophical acumen and beauty of expression, were worthy of a high rank in the world of letters. Two things, Mr. Tweedie observed, were essential to bring "The Working Man's Library" into the working man's home; first, the ability, and secondly, the desire, to purchase it. Now, he maintained that Teetotalism would do much, if not all, to enable men to overcome both those difficulties. He must be a very moderate drinker whose drink cost only 3d. per week; and this would be enough to purchase both "The Working Man's Library," and "The Working Man's Friend." Then the question was, could the working man dispense with the drink and yet retain his strength and vigour? In reply, he would point them to the thousands who found themselves not only as well, but much better, without the use of strong drinks than with them. In cold and in heat, in damp and in danger, in all occupations, in all climates, and under every vicissitude, they had found by experience that strong drink was a delusion and a snare. Chemistry and physiology, also, demonstrated the utter impossibility of deriving benefit from strong drink so as of meet the wear and tear of a working man's life. Then, if strong drink could be safely dispensed with, the means to purchasing information were at hand. The abstainer, too, would have more time to apply to the cultivation of his mind; he would, also, have a clearer brain. Then, the abstainer would find it necessary to defend his principles, and to do that with success, he must possess information; and the strictly sober man, with an awakened intellect, would be able and willing to seek after and to investigate; and as each investigation was successful, his desire after more knowledge would increase; and his highest desire and ambition would be to have a useful library. It was a fact, that many who, before they were teetotalers, were unable to read, had now some of the best books, which they read with eagerness and delight. The teetotal platform furnished proofs of this continually. In fact, Teetotalism, directly and indirectly, had done more to promote the progress of education than any reformatory scheme which had ever been introduced to the world since the advent of Christianity. It had inspired moral courage; it had taught men to exercise self-denial and self-control; it had subdued the animal propensities; and had drawn out the intellectual and moral faculties. And when the working masses had generally adopted Teetotalism, they would rise up as a new race; and instead of being abject petitioners for an education for their children, they would, by the manly use of the powers God had given them, educate their own children; and as their children rose around them, intelligent, industrious, virtuous, they would bless the day that they became teetotalers—the day that they awoke to a sense of the duties devolving upon them as parents, as men, and as Christians. In the progress of Temperance, therefore, he (Mr. Tweedie) saw approaching the period when gross ignorance and foul superstition would be banished from the land, and science, piety, and comfort, be the inmates of each home; when the library of the peasant, as well as that of the peer, would be stored with the treasures of knowledge. Already he could point to humble mechanics who had libraries ranging in value from twenty to sixties pounds. Was not that the beginning of a mighty revolution—a revolution which would break down the social inequalities which at present existed? Channing had well said, "Books are the true levelers. They give to all who will faithfully use them the society, the spiritual presence, of the most gifted of our race. No matter although the prosperous of my own time should not enter my obscure dwelling—if the Sacred writers will take up their abode under my roof. If Milton will cross my threshold to sing to me of Paradise—and Shakspeare to open to me the world of imagination and the human heart—and Franklin to enrich me with his practical wisdom—I shall not pine for want of intellectual society; and I may be a cultivated man, although excluded from what may be called the best society, in the place where I live."—Mr. Tweedie concluded his very interesting address by reminding his audience that books were not the only things they would need; they were but tools wherewith to work—but instruments to enable them to fight the battle of life. They must present to the world a pure and holy life. They might not have time sufficient to become great readers, but they must aim to be great thinkers; and then, whether in the murky garret, or the dingy work-room; whether before the furnace fire, or in the deep and dangerous mine; whether in the crowded street, or in the lonely field—they would be able to find time for great thoughts and for honest purposes.

SOUTHWARK.

On Sunday afternoon, June 9, a sermon, recommendatory of the Temperance Movement, was preached in the Borough-road Chapel (Rev. J. Stevenson's) by the Rev. JABEZ BURNS, D.D. He selected for his text Nehemiah vi. 3.—"I am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down." After a brief introduction, the preacher proceeded to show, FIRST, that the teetotal cause is a "great work." Having explained that by teetotalism, he meant, the system of entire and absolute abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, he said, that it is a great work, 1. As to the enormous evil it is aiming to remove—intemperance and the drinking customs of society. 2. As to the inestimable worth of the materials it seeks to redeem—human beings, with bodies wonderfully made, and souls destined to live for ever. 3. As to the numerous important interests involved in its progress—the physical, mental, social, and religious interests of man. 4. As to the difficulties to be encountered in its prosecution—such as the pecuniary interests of thousands, deep-rooted customs, the influence of habits, delusive opinions, &c. SECONDLY, that those persons who are engaged in this "great work" will have many solicitations to desist from it. See context. 1. Moderate drinkers accuse them of pushing matters to extremes; and yet their use of strong drink gives respectability to its use. Self-control is so difficult that if persons use strong drink at all, they are in danger of excess. 2. Religious persons accuse temperance reformers of invading the work of the ministry. But if the ministry of the gospel itself had been effectual for the removal of drunkenness, there would have been no need of temperance advocacy. If to check intemperance is the work of the church, then the church has done its work very badly. And if, as they allege, the grace of God will keep a man sober, how is it that so many who profess to have that grace fall? It is the sincere wish of all consistent teetotalers to make temperance subservient to the furtherance of the gospel. Let all engage, for the work is great and urgent. THIRDLY, that many reasons may be assigned why teetotalers should persist in their work. 1. Our exertions are founded on conscientious conviction. It is not the result of mere excitement, or the charm of novelty. We believe we should sin if we did not persevere. 2. We are publicly and professedly pledged to this great principle. Our decision is made and recorded, and our watchword is "Onward!" 3. Our success has been so great that we should be recreant indeed, and most ungrateful, were we to desist. 4. The claims upon our exertion are still so mighty and pressing. Thousands are still under the curse—families are miserable—the nation is disgraced—the hopes of the church are blighted—God is dishonoured. So that we "cannot come down." In conclusion, who will come and aid us? We are anxious to have benevolence, morality, piety, on our side. We appeal to you, by the value of souls, to come and help us. Let those who labour in this work aim to carry it on in a right spirit, in love and with patience; firm and energetic in argument, but forbearing, exercising the candour and charity which become Christians.

The sermon, which was delivered in a very earnest and impressive manner, was listened to with deep attention by a large audience.

On the following Monday the first festival of the Borough-road Total Abstinence Society was held in the commodious school-room, Great Suffolk-street. The Rev. J. STEVENSON, A.M., occupied the chair, and furnished a narrative of some affecting incidents of which he had been an eye-witness in the immediate neighbourhood; he stated the anxiety he felt in reference to those members of the Church who were not engaged in opposing the dangerous drinking habits of the community. The piece "Joyful Day," was then sung in capital style, and Mr. Prebble, the secretary, briefly referred to the past operations and future intentions of the society.

Dr. J. BURNS made a stirring appeal in favour of the first sentiment—viz., "The drinking customs a delusion, a mockery, and a snare. May our beloved country be speedily purged from the evils which they produce, and intoxicating liquors be universally and for ever banished from society!"

The Rev. I. DORSEY spoke to the second sentiment:—"The traffic—a means of enriching the few, by the ruin, temporal and eternal, of multitudes. May public opinion emphatically and unmistakably pronounce its condemnation, and declare the manufacture and sale of intoxicating beverages opposed alike to the integrity of enlightened citizenship, the purity of Christian profession, and the sympathies of a generous philanthropy!" Mr. F. STEVENSON followed on the same subject.

The third and fourth sentiments were, "The Churches of Christ—organizations for the recovery and elevation of man, and the extension of the reign of Christ; may they soon withdraw all their patronage and participation of the drink practices, both personal and social, and unequivocally express their conviction that strong drink has proved itself a foe of God, an antagonist of the Gospel, a destroyer of men, and a powerful ally of the devil!" "The Youth of Britain—the hope of the country, and the charge of the Church. May they be earnestly warned of the dangers of using strong drink, and induced, by the force of argument, the light of knowledge, the persuasions of love, and the influence of example, to abstain." These were spoken to by Mr. Tweedie, the Rev. G. Ashton, secretary of the Christian Instruction Society, and the Rev. J. R. Balme. After singing a temperance hymn to the tune of the National Anthem, and passing resolutions of thanks to the chairman and the ladies of the Decoration Committee, and securing about twenty signatures to the temperance pledge, the company dispersed, fully satisfied that great good would result from an evening so profitably spent.

HAWKSTONE-HALL, WATERLOO-ROAD.

The weekly meetings held in this commodious hall for the advocacy of temperance, lose none of their interest. The hall continues to be attended, notwithstanding the numerous attractions of this delightful season of the year, with large and attentive audiences.

On Tuesday, June 4, a lecture, illustrated by large coloured diagrams, was delivered by Mr. W. H. FREEMANTLE. The lecture was entitled, "The People Poisoned," and the object was to prove that, in consequence of the use of alcoholic beverages, a large portion of the people of this country were literally poisoned. On the Tuesday following, June 11, Mr. J. W. GREEN delivered a lecture, entitled, "The People Cured," the object of which was to show that, by entire abstinence from alcoholic beverages, individuals, families, communities, a whole nation, might be restored to physical soundness, mental excellence, social comfort, and moral worth. The lecturer was much cheered.

On Tuesday, June 18, a meeting was held for the purpose of presenting a number of very important statistics, showing that, of the criminals in various prisons and penitentiaries, a large proportion had received instruction in Sabbath-schools. Mr. J. W. GREEN, who was called to the chair, referred to a portion of the report of the Sunday-school Union, the object of which was, evidently, to throw discredit upon certain statistics which had recently been published. He said that the complaint made by the temperance advocates was not, as that report insinuated, that Sabbath-school teachers were abettors or promoters of crime, but that they contented themselves with general exhortations instead of bringing their instructions to bear specifically on a great and specific evil. They taught their people to cease to do evil and learn to do well; but they neglected to furnish them with armour proof against the temptations to the use of strong drink, to which they were sure to be exposed. Mr. T. B. SMITHIES then presented a large body of statistics, proving that a fearful proportion of the criminals in various jails had received instruction in Sabbath-schools, including some who had been teachers; and to prove the authenticity of these statistics, he furnished the names of the chaplains and superintendents of prisons, by whom the returns had been made after careful examination. Mr. Smithies added some very impressive observations of his own.—Mr. GORDELIER admitted the authenticity of the returns, and, to a considerable extent, the inferences drawn from them; but at the same time he wished the audience to remember that there were other evil influences beside those of strong drink. He recommended patient and persevering efforts to communicate information both to the teachers and children.—Mr. SELWAY moved a resolution, expressing the confidence of the meeting in the integrity of the statistics furnished by Mr. Smithies, and recommending them to the serious consideration of Sabbath-school teachers, and of the Sunday-school Union.—The Rev. J. R. BALME seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.—

Tuesday, July 25, the chair was occupied by J. T. TYLER, Esq., when Messrs. Lee, Culverwell, Parker, &c., made important statements, proving the necessity which existed for the exertions of Teetotalers, and the certainty that those efforts would ultimately be successful to accomplish a delightful moral revolution in the land.

SOMER'S-TOWN.

The annual meeting of the St. Pancras Total Abstinence Society was held on Monday evening, June 24. After a number of friends had taken tea, the chair was occupied by GEORGE CRUIKSHANK, Esq. He said that the first teetotal meeting he had ever attended was one in that hall. It was with much reluctance that he was then induced to take the chair; but he had never regretted his so doing. It was, as to him, the beginning of a career of usefulness—of usefulness in the promotion of a great and glorious reform. Next to religion, sobriety claimed the attention of all as an imperative duty. Great necessity existed for exertion, not merely for the reclamation of the intemperate, but for the training of the rising race, the bringing up a class safely to be reckoned upon as an improved class of society. He used to think that the teetotal advocates bore rather hard upon moderate drinkers; but he now found that moderate drinkers were the great teachers and abettors of intemperance. Much depended upon mothers; let them beware how they allowed their children to acquire an appetite for strong drink. Every degree of drunkenness was intemperance. He wished to exercise charity; but, at the same time, he would strongly urge the advocates to exert themselves to put a stop to moderate drinking, and to train up a new race of sober persons.

Mr. E. TACKLEY read a brief report, in the course of which it was stated that upwards of 600 persons had signed the teetotal pledge in that hall; many of the persons so signing, however, in consequence of not residing in that district, could not be reckoned members of that society.

The Rev. Mr. SEAVIL moved the adoption of the report. He rejoiced in the identity of the total abstinence system with that of Christianity, which required that men should do themselves no harm, and that they should exercise self-denial for the good of others. He rejoiced, too, to find that working men had taken the lead in the work. He reminded them, however, of the great importance of advocating the cause temperately; let them not withhold the truth, but let all their deeds be done in charity. He directed the attention of the audience to the exertions made in various parts of the United States of America, to put down the traffic in strong drink. In America the advocates had taken the high ground that to manufacture strong drink was a crime, and that those who committed it ought to be punished. It was of importance not only to adopt the practice personally, but to circulate all possible information respecting it, and to urge the practice upon others by a good example.

Mr. BURTT, of Poplar, stated that he had adopted the practice of teetotalism upon moral grounds, and to add to his influence in the work of reclaiming drunkards. He gave a fearful description of the condition of a large portion of the population in the East of London; remarking at the same time that all ranks were exposed to danger, as strong drink was no respecter of persons. The advocates, therefore, should bring their efforts to bear upon all.

Mr. J. WOOD, stonemason, signed the pledge fourteen years ago at Preston. It was said by some that the teetotalers were an unproductive set of men, that they did no good for themselves or for others. But he would ask, how was trade benefited by the manufacture of drinks, twenty shillings worth of which could be manufactured for 6d. or 8d.? Let that sum be expended in useful articles, and trade, in all its branches, would soon flourish.

Mr. SPRIGGS moved a resolution approving of the principles of the society, and recommending their adoption to all the friends of order. He showed that the use of strong drinks tended very materially to promote disorder, even in case where but small portions were taken. On the contrary, teetotalism was eminently promotive of order. Having exposed the nature and properties of strong drinks, he concluded by reminding the working people present, that no movement made for their improvement and elevation would materially benefit them, unless they would elevate themselves, and to do this they must be habitually sober.

Mr. J. W. GREEN seconded the resolution, urging the practice and advocacy of teetotalism upon all who aspired to be patriots, philanthropists, or Christians, in deed as well as in profession.

W. N. NORWAY, Esq., of Weybridge, rejoiced in the opportunity of standing in a hall reared by the efforts of working men, and in the presence of the Chairman, who had proved himself one of the most able and successful advocates of temperance. He had, both by his productions as an artist, and by his personal and public advocacy, been the means of introducing the subject of temperance into places and circles in which it would not otherwise have been known. Mr. Norway then remarked on the drinking customs of society, and on their tendency to enslave and enervate, to ruin and destroy. No remedy would suffice for the removal of the evil short of total abstinence.

J. T. WILMORE, Esq., associate engraver of the Royal Academy, moved a resolution of thanks to the chairman. In doing this, he bore testimony to the excellence of the total abstinence principle, to remove indigestion, and many other disagreeable sensations which owed their origin to the use of strong drinks. He cautioned mothers against administering it to their children in any form; and also against the use of opiates, whether in "cordials," "carminatives," "elixirs," &c. Thousands of children were thus drugged, and their constitutions injured; and what wonder if, as they grew up, they resorted to unnatural stimulants, and became drunkards?

Mr. R. TACKLEY seconded the resolution, which was carried with cheers.

A person at the end of the hall, stated that he had greatly injured himself by the use of strong drinks, and that he had ridiculed the system of teetotalism. But having seen the plates of "The Bottle," by Mr. G. Cruikshank, he determined at once to become a teetotaler; to that gentleman, therefore, he owed an unspeakable debt of gratitude.

The CHAIRMAN, in acknowledging the vote which had been passed so cordially, expressed the pleasure with which he heard of any good effected by his instrumentality. He had many other things in contemplation, by which he believed service might be rendered to the great cause, which he should bring forward as circumstances permitted. He stated that he had recently been honoured with an introduction to the Neaples Embassy, and that the eyes of the Chief and his friends sparkled with pleasure while he (Mr. Cruikshank) informed them that there was in England a numerous caste who had forsown the use of wine and intoxicating drinks. The Chief, and his friends of the Embassy, were, of course, abstainers, by virtue of the tenets of their religion.

WESTMINSTER BAND OF HOPE.

On Tuesday, June 11th, the Westminster Band of Hope, in connection with the Wesleyan Union of Total Abstemious, held their annual meeting and tea festival, at the Wesleyan Chapel, Prince's-place, Westminster; on which occasion the chair was taken by W. SIMS, Esq., of Camberwell. The interesting appearance of the dear children, more than eighty in number, and the distinct and impressive manner in which they delivered the religious and teetotal truths they had committed to memory, together with their sweet voices raised in sacred harmony to the Great Father of all, deeply affected a large and respectable assembly, especially the worthy chairman, who is the father of a large family of Teetotalers. He expressed his warm approbation of the respectable appearance and orderly conduct of the children, and of the correct and beautiful manner in which they sang the sacred music selected for the occasion. This Juvenile Band holds a public meeting on the second Tuesday in each month.

STEAM-BOAT EXCURSION.

On Monday, the 3rd of June, a steam-boat excursion to Chatham and Rochester took place, intended to aid the testimonial which has been for some time in process of subscription, to be presented to Mr. T. A. Smith, as a regard for his efficient services in the cause of popular education, and to enable him to apply his knowledge more fully to the advancement of temperance reformation. Early in the morning the "Vesper" left the Hungerford and Old Swan Piers, and proceeded down the river with a cheerful company of nearly 300 persons. Landscapes, mansions, fortifications, and other objects of interest occupied the company's attention during their progress to the point of destination. After an hour spent at Chatham, the boat was brought alongside the flag ship "Poictiers," of seventy-two guns, when the passengers were politely received by the commander, and considerable pains were taken to explain, to the wonder and admiration of the men of peace, the extraordinary structure and fittings of the man-of-war. Having contemplated, each according to his bias, the anomalous mission of this marine battery (to preserve justice and destroy life!), the "Vesper" pushed away on her return, amidst the cheers of the gallant seamen. The weather was exceedingly beautiful. A large number of the friends congregated on the steerage deck, when Mr. McCurrie gave some of those striking contrasts which are furnished by the vicissitudes of his own family, presenting a glowing picture of domestic happiness. Mr. T. A. Smith entered on the philosophy of the teetotal question, enlivening his sentiments with many pointed and witty turns. Mr. Spriggs made serious reference to his own painful experience of the bane of intoxicating beverage. Other speakers followed, and a visible impression was made upon minds not ordinarily within the range of temperance agitation. The boat arrived at Hungerford at half-past nine, when the company separated, without one incident to operate against the delightful character of the excursion.

AQUATIC EXCURSION.

On Monday, June 17th, the annual water party, under the guidance of the committee of the Fitzroy Teetotal Association, took place, when a company of about 550 persons proceeded on board the Gem steam-packet from London-bridge to South End, which place they reached just after twelve o'clock at noon, when they landed and enjoyed themselves in a variety of ways till the time for return. During the passage home, several temperance melodies were sung, and addresses were delivered by Messrs. Hodgson, Alford, G. C. Campbell, J. P. Draper, Pickett, Brown, &c. A quantity of tracts were distributed among the company, and to the inhabitants of South End, as also on the wharfs previous to the departure in the morning. The friends arrived in London at nine o'clock, having experienced a most delightful trip.

J. P. DRAPER.

ROCHDALE.

The teetotal cause in this place is progressing rapidly. A few individuals here lately engaged the services of Mr. W. H. Chadwick, of Manchester, who has rendered essential service to the cause. One notorious drunkard has become a teetotaler through his instrumentality.

H. WHITTAKER.

PERSHORE, WORCESTERSHIRE.

The annual sermon on behalf of the funds of the Pershore Temperance Society was preached in the Temperance-hall, Pershore, on Sunday evening, June 9th, to a crowded and attentive audience, by Mr. J. Shapcott, of Exeter. On Monday evening the annual tea-meeting was held in the hall, when nearly 200 friends were present. After tea, Mr. R. Warner, President of the Society, was unanimously voted to the chair. The Secretary read a report of the progress of the society during the last year. Addresses were delivered at intervals during the meeting, by the chairman and Mr. Shapcott, in advocacy of the claims of Temperance.—A grand selection of Sacred and classical music from the works of the great composers, including Handel, Haydn, Rossini, König, Braham, Mornington, Bellini, Jullien, &c., was performed by Mr. Shapcott and his seven sons, who, by their splendid performances on their Sax-horns, delighted and astonished the audience.

We were first favoured with a visit from the Shapcott family in February last, when all who heard them were highly interested, as much by the excellent addresses of Mr. Shapcott, as by the musical performances of his seven teetotal sons. We believe that the visit of Mr. Shapcott and his family will form an important era in the history of the Pershore Temperance Society, inasmuch as several young men were induced, by the example set them by this musical and sober family, to turn their attention to music in connection with Temperance, which ended in the purchase of an excellent set of instruments from Mr. Shapcott, and the formation of a band, composed of young men, members of the society, and called "The Pershore Temperance Sax Horn Band." Their progress hitherto has been quite satisfactory.

We have amongst us those who can sing as well as play, and we have it in contemplation, if spared through the coming winter, to give a series of vocal and instrumental concerts; and we think that those humble efforts, in connection with our usual Monthly Lectures, may be made the means of winning some few of our fellow-townsmen from the degrading vice of drunkenness.

The Messrs. Shapcott are now, we believe, on their way home to Exeter, having made a most successful nine months' tour, during which they have visited Birmingham, London, the Midland Counties, and the North of England, also Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c. &c., where they have been listened to by audiences who have received them with unbounded applause. No society having it in their power to do so, should lose the opportunity of engaging them for a Temperance Festival, for they really are splendid performers; indeed, the appearance and performance of little Frank, the drummer, only four years old, is perfectly captivating; and of this we are assured, that wherever they visit, they cannot fail to leave behind them a great moral influence.

WILLIAM CONN, Secretary.

MANCHESTER.

Our annual festivities commenced on Whit-Wednesday. A teetotal procession took place at a neat little village some four miles from Manchester, a place noted in former years for bull baiting and all such like brutish sport. After the processions, the members took tea in the Primitive Methodist Chapel; and after tea a public meeting was held, presided over by Robert Duxbury. The meeting was addressed by friends from Manchester, and Mrs. Gray, from Hull, whose labours have been blessed while remaining with us. We have made many attempts, but have never been able to get a footing till now. One of the villagers observed, "I have baited the bull for the publicans, and I had to find a bondsman to see that I paid 1s. 3d. per week for a cellar rent; but now I am baiting teetotal, I am my own maister, and pays 5s. 6d. weekly without bondsman."

On Saturday the long looked-for procession came off, and a right good one it was. At the usual time it proceeded through the principal streets of the two boroughs, headed by bands of music, flags, colours, devices, members three abreast, carriages, carts, &c.—police, as usual, assisting in keeping order. The procession, which took near three-quarters of an hour in passing any given point, reached above two miles in length. Great good has already resulted. On Wednesday and Thursday we had two cheap trips—one to Fleetwood, and one to Wortley. After the procession had returned, they repaired to their meeting rooms, when the following branches had public tea-parties and meetings:—Millers-street, Miles Platting, Percy-street, Mather-street, Grosvenor-street, Ormond-street, Willmot, Crown-street, Artillery-street, Lombard-street, George-street, Salford, Crumplall, Fallfield-street-hall, York-street, Victoria-place, Moss-lane. After tea, speeches were delivered by Mr. G. E. Lomax, and other local advocates.

SCARBOROUGH.

Two eloquent lectures were delivered in this town on the 19th and 21st of June, on total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, and the evils attending the vice of drunkenness. The lectures were given by Mr. HENRY CLAPP, from Massachusetts, America. He gave a beautiful description of the working of the temperance principles, and the labours of Father Mathew in that country, together with some graphic sketches of several of her eminent statesmen, in connection with this movement. He was listened to with much attention; and, at the close, a vote of thanks was proposed by E. Thompson, Esq., and seconded by Mr. Thos. Whittaker.

These lectures were given in Ebenezer Chapel, kindly granted for the occasion by the Rev. B. Evans. The meeting on the 21st was enlivened by the attendance of a portion of the Clitheroe Temperance Band, who played a selection of pieces.

HASTINGS.

The cause of teetotalism in this town and neighbourhood is growing; much prejudice is removed—the public meetings are better attended—and more zeal is displayed among the members. An impetus has recently been given by the delivery of five physiological lectures, by Mr. P. W. Perfitt, of London. The meetings were well attended, and thirty members added to the society. Another means of advancing teetotal principles has also been commenced—namely, the establishment of a Juvenile Temperance Society, to include all young persons under sixteen years of age. Mr. D. G. Paine, of Deptford, has also lately given us a lecture on the Elevation of the Working Classes. Our numbers in society are greater than at any previous period.

F. BECK, Secretary.

OLDHAM.

On Sunday following, the first of a series of Missionary Temperance Meetings was held in Zion Chapel, Oldham-street, presided over by Mr. R. Davies. Several persons addressed the meeting. On the same day we had camp meetings in various parts of the town, and on the following Sunday at Middleton and Crumpsall. Out-doors meetings are held every Sunday in all parts of the two boroughs, and every evening in the week. The friends seem determined to do something this summer.

ALNWICK.

A lecture was delivered to a large and respectable audience, in the Town Hall at Alnwick, on Tuesday May 28th, by Dr. Lees, of Leeds, on the "Harmony of Teetotalism with the Will of God, as expressed in the authorised version of the Bible." The views advocated were new and striking, and were listened to with marked attention. The principles of total abstinence are steadily advancing in this place, through the unwearied efforts of the committee of the society. During the last few months, courses of lectures have been delivered by Edward Grubb, Esq., an agent of the Scottish Temperance League, and others. The Committee are taking preliminary steps for the formation of a Juvenile Band of Hope, and expect soon to be able to add another to the present large catalogue of these promising institutions.

GAINSBOROUGH.

A course of lectures has recently been delivered here by Mrs. Theobald, of Derby. Her lectures were very interesting and effective. They were attended by large and respectable audiences, and several persons signed the temperance pledge after each lecture.

T. O. WILKINSON.

FILLEIGH, DEVON.

On Wednesday, June 12, was held the annual festival of the Filleigh Total Abstinence Society. The attendance consisted of about five hundred people. A procession took place, headed by the Filleigh band; after which, a public tea, of which nearly four hundred partook.

A public meeting was held in the evening, presided over by the secretary, and addressed by Mr. Hargreaves, of South Molton; Mr. Pudney, of Barustaple; Mr. Reed, of Plymouth; Mr. Hoidge, of Chumleigh, and Mr. Thom, of Shebbear. The principles of teetotalism were very ably advocated by the different speakers. Fifteen signed the pledge.

A. SAUL, Secretary.

THORPE ON THE HILL, LINCOLN.

The Teetotal Society of this place held its thirtieth anniversary in Mr. Spafford's barn, on Tuesday, May 28, when a large party sat down to tea. A public meeting was afterwards held, presided over by Mr. Blyton, of Swinderby; and after he and Mr. Dolphin had addressed the meeting, a lecture was delivered by Mr. Houghton, of Swinderby, near Newark, the subject of which was, the inconsistency of those christians and philanthropists who sanction the use of intoxicating drinks. His lecture was powerful and convincing.

MORE DOINGS OF STRONG DRINKS AMONG THE MINISTERS OF RELIGION.

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS].

WITHIN a few months from the present, a minister of religion, at the age of about fifty-five years, has been carried to the grave. For some years his ministerial course has been ended in consequence of his having completely lost his character; and now the same foe that destroyed his usefulness, robbed him of his domestic comforter, drove him from home, demoralized his life, rendered his body a mass of disease, and his temper unsufferably irritable, has cut short his days, and carried him prematurely to the bar of the Judge of quick and dead. This foe, Christian reader, was STRONG DRINK!

The gentleman of whom we are speaking was an individual with a strong constitution, a fine healthy appearance, superior talents, good education, eloquent address, and, along with all, was a sound divine. There was a time when he ranked as one of the first orators of the day. We well remember the period when his ministry was attended by all the distinguished persons in the locality; and, whenever he preached, churchmen and dissenters, scholars, philosophers, infidels, believers, the polite, the rude, and the illiterate thronged to hear him. The man, if he had chosen, might have been a second Whitfield; he had all the natural elements requisite, and might have been as eminent for spiritual attainments. We speak advisedly when we use these expressions, because we feel assured that the Almighty is just as willing to pour out a large effusion of his SPIRIT upon his servants now as in any former time; and as the lamented individual of whom we speak had superior mental powers, a clear voice, a most copious vocabulary, and a fascinating elocution, he might have had the grace of a Whitfield, and have been living as one of the most popular preachers of his day. Every one who knew the deceased when he was in the height of his popularity, some years ago, would at once accede to every sentiment here advanced.

Perhaps the first step towards the downfall of the individual we allude to was his POPULARITY. He was invited to preach everywhere, and everywhere had crowded congregations. After sermon, and sometimes before, there was the usual supply of vestry wine and spirits. Deacons and others often begged him to take the glass beforehand, to fit him for such great exertion; and then, after he had done, of course he must have the customary supply of these poisons. At dinner, hospitality demanded a full store of intoxicating liquor; and after the meal was over, the decanters went merrily round. Evening service came, and there was a splendid sermon, great excitement, considerable exhaustion, rather from drink than talking, and again the vestry-bottle was administered freely; then the supper, the porter, the wine, the pipe or cigar, and the final bumper of brandy-and-water! These supposed good things were gratefully bestowed by those devout friends who had been delighted, enchanted, and, as they said, everlastingly edified by the eloquence of the young minister. And thus his popularity, and the generosity of those who almost drenched him with glass after glass, proved his ruin.

What a tragedy the vestry wine would furnish! or, rather, what a host of tragedies! The ministers who have been ruined by it, and the souls which have been lost, will present one of the most awful groups in the world of spirits. And then, what has not false hospitality done? We knew a minister, almost at the very climax of popularity, driven from his church, and condemned as an outcast by the very deacon who had plied him with wine, and aided, perhaps more than any one else, to make him a drunkard. What a tale this dinner wine, this supper tipping, these last comforting glasses of grog could tell! And yet we have professing people who sport with them as carelessly, and laugh over them as merrily, as if they had never cast down to the earth any of the stars of the sanctuary, nor plunged a single soul in perdition.

The next step in the fall of our friend was his PROPERTY. He had the misfortune to marry a rich wife. This event rendered him independent of the churches. He was now resolved to "put up with no nonsense or impertinence (as he said) from any of the deacons or people," and therefore he resigned the pastorate. He was too rich to face or overcome difficulties. He ran away from care, and lived in pleasure. Perhaps he imagined that a popular itineracy would be useful to others, give him a kind reception everywhere, call for little study, and afford ample time for ease and enjoyment. He lived in a fine house, was courted for his wealth and generosity,—for he was eminently good-natured,—and was free from all control. He was responsible to no one, subject to no church discipline, and therefore had nothing to fear from a little luxurious indulgence. Wealth often goes further than a bull from the Pope, in placing men above the stricter matters of the law. If people asked him to preach, he preached; if they did not, he enjoyed his ease.

By degrees his character went down. Some that envied his prosperity were very unmerciful and exaggerated his faults; others, who wanted him to preach charity sermons, were very charitable to his errors; but all allowed that his piety was becoming doubtful, and that strong drinks had reduced him to this ambiguous state. But, alas! matters became worse and worse, and, at last, every one admitted that he drank too much. His health was sadly impaired; his face was sallow, flabby, and wrinkled. So awful had been the inroads of disease, through drink, that we once sat opposite to him in a railway carriage, and travelled for miles, without the least idea that it was the man we had formerly known so well, and, indeed, should not have recognised him, if he had not introduced himself and given us his name. His property became less and less; drink broke up all domestic comfort; he parted from his wife, became a wanderer upon earth with a small sum to live upon, and, a few weeks ago, entered eternity at least twenty or thirty years before his time. His after-state we dare not look at. So much talent, so much gospel knowledge, so much eloquence, and so much usefulness, and, along with all, so much vigour of constitution, and such amiability and benevolence, ALL sacrificed on the altar of BACCHUS, is, to us, a tale of folly and crime which has few parallels. Our heart sickens as we record these facts, and nothing would induce us to undergo the pain of committing them to paper, but the deep conviction that Jehovah intends such occurrences to be made known as warnings to others, and especially to religious people and ministers of the word.

Rarely has there been an individual who commenced life more hopefully, or who ended his career more awfully. But for strong drink, our friend would now have been in the vigour of his days, and in the height of his usefulness, instead of lying in a grave the victim of strong drink. He might now have been the loving husband of a happy wife, the parent of a cheerful family, the pastor of a thriving church, the possessor of large property, the benefactor, by his occasional labours, of a large circle of congregations, a citizen, surpassed by none for his patriotism; an exemplary sojourner to a better country, leading on, and encouraging the Lord's hosts in their pilgrimage; a Moses, or rather a Joshua, conducting Israel to the promised land. We have not mentioned his name, because we have no wish to inflict pain on the minds of survivors; but if we had done so, all who knew him would shake their heads, feel sick at heart, and confess, whether they are teetotalers or not, that all the mischief, crime, and ruin we have mentioned, was the result of his use of intoxicating beverages.

Last month we brought forward the professional man, the offspring of religious parents, the child of many prayers, the inheritor of good property, who commenced life with every prosperous omen, degraded, demoralized, bankrupted, beggared, and slain thirty or forty years before his time by these accursed liquors. Now we have had to tell of one of the brightest stars of the church quenched, and expiring in utter darkness, by these infamous drinks. And we regret to have to add, that this work of desolation is still going on, and is, as yet, hardly checked by the church. Lately, we became acquainted with a minister's son, in rags, a wanderer from home, with not a penny to bless himself, with a wife and family in the grave, the victims of his intemperance. Not long since, the son of a popular man, and capable of being more popular than his father, died in a pot-house. A brother of this same man, we are told, is a noted tavern orator. In fact, the tale might be enlarged almost indefinitely. Would that all our religious folks would only tell us all they know! There is hardly a minister, a deacon, or private Christian, but could write a book on this subject, more harrowing than any of the tragedies of our best authors—tragedies in which fiction would not be needed to add effect to the scene; for facts would throw fiction into the shade. But our good people are become rather cautious on this point, and even drunkenness is not denounced with the zeal that it was twenty years ago, lest the total abstinence should be present, and deem it an inconsistency for men to condemn a vice which, by their unnecessary and wanton use of strong liquors, they so effectually perpetuate.

For, whatever men may say, it is the individual that renders a vice reputable, and not the person who brings it into contempt—that gives it the surest and most steady support. All drunkards come from the ranks of moderate drinkers. Were all drinkers of wine drunkards, the bottle would be abandoned by myriads this very day. But, alas! such crowds seem to use the bane with impunity, so many reputed good men and good women drink, that our youths are decoyed, and find themselves ensnared by a new craving, a burning thirst, and a nervous frame, before they are aware.

TEETOTALISM affords a severe test to the piety of our time. One of the great virtues of Christianity and which shone resplendently in the life of CHRIST and his Apostles, is "self-denial." Our Lord gives us three steps to his kingdom—"Deny thyself," first; "Take up thy cross," second; and "Follow me," third. But he puts self-denial as the threshold. This grace, however, is too ascetic for our age, and perhaps was never practised less. And yet we know that, by abandoning a vile poison, we could rescue myriads from penury, from disease, from erime, from irreligion, and from premature death; and should have millions of wealth to cast into the sanctuary of the Lord for the conversion of the world. But THE CHURCH is not ready to sacrifice a cup of poison for the salvation of the world; and, therefore, the destroying angel slays his victims by the thousand, and the altar of BACCHUS is THE SUCCESSFUL RIVAL OF THE ALTAR OF CHRIST!

THE PLEDGE.

At eve and noon I'll on it gaze,
That Pledge of hope for me;
My voice shall ever sing its praise,
For it has made me free.
I'll keep it, as a treasure far
Above earth's jewels bright;
And prize it as a polar star
To guide my steps aright.
I'll press it ever to my heart,
My best, my dearest friend;
From thence it never shall depart,
Till life itself shall end.
That holy pledge had power to save,
When almost in the tomb;
It saved me from a drunkard's grave,
And from a drunkard's doom.
I love that Pledge, and none shall dare
To take it from my side;
In life 'twill ever be my care,
My hope, my joy, my pride;
And on the ever-blooming plains,
Its praises I will ring;
In loud and sweet angelic strains,
"The Pledge! the Pledge!" I'll sing.

CAUTIONS TO WINE AND SPIRIT DRINKERS.

TRICKS OF THE TRADE.

A FUNDAMENTAL doctrine of Teetotalism is, that alcoholic drinks, in the purest form in which they can possibly be administered, are poisonous, and highly injurious to the constitutions of those who use them, even when taken in moderate portions, and only occasionally. The fact, however, cannot be concealed, that the public rarely obtain these drinks in their pure form; adulterations are practised to a most awful extent. In the 23rd number of the "Financial Reform Tracts," issued by the Liverpool Association, a great number of modes of adulteration are collected, and collected from sources that are indisputable. A few specimens are subjoined. It may be proper to state, that the object of the Financial Reformers in collecting these cases is, that they may argue with greater effect for a repeal of the duties upon wine and spirits, because, as they state, the duties upon those which are genuine give the adulterators such a certain profit, that they bring into operation all manner of scientific frauds to produce cheap wines and spirits.

Passing over "quassia, cocculus indicus, opium, colouring matter," and other ingredients used in the adulteration of malt liquors, we quote a few as to WINES:—

"To make Port.—Take of good cider four gallons; of the juice of red beet, two quarts; brandy, two quarts; logwood, four ounces; rhatany-root, bruised, half a pound. First infuse the logwood and rhatany-root in brandy and a gallon of cider for one week, then strain off the liquor, and mix the other ingredients; keep it in a cask for a month when it will be fit for bottle."

"Large quantities of fictitious Sherry are manufactured in this country, of which some of the cheaper wines form the basis. To these are added brandy-cowe, extract of almond cake, cherry-laurel water, gum, benzoin, and lamb's blood, as occasion or variety may require. Claret is equally adulterated as other wines. A small portion of Spanish red wine, with a portion of rough cider, previously coloured by means of berry dye, or tincture of Brazil-wood, is added to a cask containing inferior claret."—Wine and Spirit Adulterations.

"The Cape wine generally sold to the public is composed of the drippings of the corks from the various casks in the adulterator's cellars, the filterings of the lees of the different wines in his cellar, any description of bad or spoiled white wines, with the addition of brandy or rum-cowe, and spoiled cider. The delicately pale Cape Sherry, or Cape Madeira, at astonishingly low prices, and, of course, for ready money, is composed of the same delicious ingredients, with the addition of extract of almond cake and lamb's blood to decompose its colour, or, in the phraseology of the trade, to give it complexion."—Wine and Spirit Adulterations.

Champagne, from its high price, is a fruitful subject in the hands of British wine-makers. Most of these second-rate champagnes sold in this country are prepared from the juice of acid fruits—such as the gooseberry. A species of pear is now grown for the purpose, on a large scale, in Herefordshire. Many of the ingredients in the imitated champagne are of a highly deleterious character, indeed positively dangerous, and, in some instances, productive of sudden death.

"Such is the common adulteration, by means of lead, which is practised to a great extent. It consists of a solution of sugar of lead in water, with a small allowance of alcohol. By adding a little nitric acid, and then a little sulphuric acid, to a tumbler full of this fluid (champagne), I have lately seen a deposit of sulphate of lead, in the form of white flakes, filling one-third of the glass."—Dr. Lee.

"To hinder Wine from Turning.—Put a pound of melted lead in fair water in your cask, pretty warm, and stop it close." And "To soften Gray Wine.—Put in a little vinegar wherein litharge has been well steeped, and boil some honey to draw out the wax, and strain it through a cloth, and put a quart of it through a tierce of wine, and this will mend it."—Secrets belonging to the Mysteries of Vintners.

"To clear Muddy Wine.—Gypsum or alabaster is used to clear muddy wine, also fresh-slacked lime, and the size of a walnut of sugar of lead, with a teaspoonful of sal enixum, is put to forty gallons of muddy wine; and hence, as the sugar of lead is decomposed and changed into an insoluble sulphate of lead, which falls to the bottom, the practice is not so dangerous (!) as has been represented."—Licensed Victuallers' Guide.

But listen if it be not dangerous.

"Wine merchants persuade themselves that the minute quantities of lead employed for this purpose are perfectly harmless; but chemical analysis proves the contrary, and it must be pronounced as highly deleterious. Lead, in whatever state it is taken into the stomach, occasions terrible diseases, and wine adulterated with the minutest quantity of it becomes a slow poison. The merchant or dealer who practises this dangerous sophistication adds the crime of murder to that of fraud, and deliberately scatters the seeds of disease and death among those who contribute to his emolument."—Accum's Culinary Poisons.

"Oxides of lead, having the property of forming with the acid of vinegar a salt of an agreeable taste, which does not alter the colour of the wine, and which, besides, has the advantage of stopping fermentation and putrefaction, might be very well employed to remedy the acidity of wine, if lead and all its preparations were not pernicious to health, as they occasion most terrible colics, and even death, when taken internally. We cannot believe that any wine merchant, knowing the evil consequences of lead, should, for the sake of gain, employ it for the purpose mentioned; but, if there be any such persons, they must be considered as the poisoners and murderers of the public."—Chemical Dictionary. Article Wine.

But we have just seen lead recommended in the "Licensed Victuallers' Guide," and it is alleged by several authorities that nearly all the imitations of champagne, called by that name, and extensively in use in this country, contain it less or more. But lead is not the only deleterious ingredient in use. Arsenic, and even corrosive sublimate, are mentioned. Professor Christison, of Edinburgh, relates a case in which arsenic was taken in champagne to the immediate danger of life.

"The family of a Baronet, in Roxburgshire, with several visitors, in all six persons, were taken severely ill after partaking, during dinner, of champagne. The symptoms were severe pains of the bowels, sickness, and vomiting, which continued until next morning. During the night all were affected with a sense of heat in the stomach, throat, and mouth, and in the morning the lips became encrusted, and the skin cracked and peeled off. For three or four days the whole party had a disinclination to eat. The remains of a bottle of champagne, used on this occasion, were tested with sulphuretted hydrogen gas. Two ounces of the wine gave one grain and a quarter of the sulphuret of arsenic, corresponding to one grain of the oxide of arsenic."—Edinburgh Medical and Surgical Journal, vol. 23, page 67.

"Factitious wines have the following articles added to them in the publican's cellar, to give them flavour as they may require:—Bitter almonds to give a nutty flavour; sweetbrier, orris-root, clary, cherry-laurel water, and elder flowers, to form the "bouquet" of high-flavoured wines; alum, to render meagre wines bright; Brazil-wood, cake of pressed elder berries, and bilberries, to render pale faint-coloured port of a deep rich purple colour; oak sawdust, and the husks of filberts, to give additional astringency; and the tincture of raisins, to flavour port wine that has no juice of the grape in its composition."—Abridged from Licensed Victuallers' Guide.

"To PRODUCE A CRUST ON THE BOTTLES FOR AGE.—Take a saturated solution of cream of tartar, coloured with Brazil-wood, or cochineal; also, stain the lower part of the corks to imitate the red colour of port, so that when drawn they may indicate the length of time the wine has been bottled."—Ibid.

Next come lists of the articles used in adulterating of SPIRITS:—

GIN—Water being, in the first place, used to increase the quantity, strength and flavour fail. It is then necessary to use the following ingredients, more or less, according to circumstances:—Oil of vitriol, oil of cassia, oil of turpentine, oil of carraways, oil of juniper, oil of almonds, sulphuric ether, extract of capsicums, extract of grains of Paradise, extract of orris-root, extract of angelica root, sugar, &c. &c. The flavour and taste of the genuine liquors require to be imitated by the exercise of knowledge that may be called scientific. Various guides are printed and privately supplied to members of the trade, particularly in London. "Palmer's Publican's Director," and also the "Vintners' and Licensed Victuallers' Guide," give the following recipes for gin:—

"Take one hundred gallons of unsweetened gin, three pounds of coriander seeds, four ounces of bitter-almond cake, three ounces of orange-peel, two ounces of angelica seeds; cassia, one ounce; orris-root and capsicums, of each half an ounce. Steep the seeds, &c. (first bruised), in a portion of gin for six days; strain and press them out, and add the rest; then add eighteen pounds of lump sugar. Fine with one pound of alum, and four ounces of salt of tartar, dissolved in water."

"To make up thirty gallons of raw spirits into cordial gin, get as follows:—Two pennyweights of oil of turpentine, three pennyweights of juniper berries, two pennyweights of oil of vitriol, two pennyweights of oil of almonds, one pint of elder-flower water; kill the oils with a pint of spirits of wine, and add about eight pounds of loaf sugar, twenty-five gallons of spirits, one in five, which will bear five gallons of water; rouse it well, and, in order to fine it, take two ounces of alum and one of salt of tartar; boil it till it be quite white, then throw it into your cask, continually stirring it for ten minutes; bung it up, and when fine it will be fit for use."

But should the gin, from too much water, or other cause, lose the heads or heading on top of the measure, when drawn for use, it may get a new head to indicate strength thus:—

"Take oil of vitriol one desert spoonful, one ditto of common oil of almonds, mix them well with a portion of spirits of wine, and add the whole to one hundred gallons of made-up gin."

COGNIAK BRANDY.—This is generally adulterated with the cheaper Spanish aguardiente, Bourdeaux brandy, old neutral-flavoured rum, rectified spirits, British-brandy-bitters, British brandy, cherry laurel-water, extract of almond cake, extract of capsicum, extract of grains of Paradise, and colouring sugar." The "Licensed Victuallers' Guide" says—

"To improve the flavour of brandy (which, of course, has been reduced in quality to enlarge the quantity, and so evade the tax to the revenue), take a quarter of an ounce of English saffron, and half an ounce of mace, steeped in half a pint of brandy for ten days, shaking it once or twice a day; then strain it through a linen cloth, and add one ounce of terra japonica, finely powdered, and three ounces of spirits of nitre; put it to ten gallons of brandy, adding, at the same time, ten pounds of prunes bruised."

And, "To give new brandy all the qualities of old; to one gallon of new brandy add thirty drops of aqua ammonia (volatile smelling liquor), shaking it well, that it may combine with the acid, on which the taste and other qualities of the new liquor depend."

RUM.—Rum is adulterated variously. The first fraud is by purchasing low-priced Leeward Island rum, and by the introduction of the following articles, vending it as fine old Jamaica rum of peculiar softness and flavour:—Ale, porter, shrub, extract of orris-root, cherry-laurel-water, extracts of grain of Paradise, or capsicums.

What are the RESULTS of using these nefarious compounds? Listen:—

"It is, no doubt, to the unprincipled adulterations of food, spirits, malt liquors, &c., that a great number of sudden deaths, which are constantly happening in and about the metropolis, is assignable. The adulteration, it is true, is not sufficient to cause instant death; but it operates slowly, and silently, and imperceptibly, so as not to excite sufficient suspicion and inquiry respecting the cause. This is a remark founded on much observation and very probable grounds. It is hoped that it will awaken public attention and inquiry respecting these nefarious transactions."—Oracle of Health.

"We have reason to believe that the drugs with which the ordinary kinds of gin, as well as malt liquor are universally adulterated, have greatly tended to this melancholy result—the recent increase of insanity."—Report of the Hanwell Lunatic Asylum, Middlesex.

We have no room for further extracts. But who is to ascertain whether the malt liquors, wines, and spirits which are presented to the public in such tempting forms are genuine or adulterated? None but experimental chemists, and not even they without careful analysis. What, then, shall we advise? Shall we say, use no one of these liquors till you have had them carefully analyzed? Nay; but we say, use them not at all. Abstain from every one of them; abstain at once—ABSTAIN FOR EVER!

§ QUESTIONABLE DRINKS.—If I drink wine, what am I sure of? Acids, sloe-juice, logwood, liquorice, and an inconceivable combination of pollutions. If I take brandy-and-water, I know that every sort of Cogniac is a poisonous mixture. Gin—what is gin? Turpentine, vitriol, and, I have no doubt, arsenic and prussic acid in equal proportions. Bitter Ale? Aloes and gamboge, to say the best of it. Porter? Treacle, quassia, senna, black dose, and no one knows what infernal medley of horrible drugs, which must pull me down gradually to the grave! The BOTTLE is sheer poison, as I know from Mr. Cruikshank's excellent work.—We take these things, but we know how they are to end—in death—DEATH—DEATH!—Punch.

MUSIC AND TEMPERANCE.—It has been urged that the study of music leads to dissipation, that musical men are not of the most temperate or domestic habits. If it be so, it is deeply to be deplored; but surely there is no essential connection between music and wine. Apollo and Bacchus are not Siamese twins; wine glasses, and quavers, and semibreves are not sisters, nor even second cousins. In the natural world music and temperance are plainly sisters. The blackbird, thrush, canary, and nightingale, all exquisitely musical, drink nothing but water, and smoke nothing but fresh air. A grove or wood in spring echoes with feathered musicians, each a teetotaler, temperate without a pledge, and ever singing and never dry.—From a Lecture on Music, recently delivered in Exeter-hall, by the Rev. JOHN CUMMING, D.D.

THE CARDINAL VIRTUES.

TEMPERANCE, FORTITUDE, PRUDENCE, AND JUSTICE!

In what light are we to look upon this brilliant array of goodness? What exquisite delight may we not experience by the faithful practice of these virtues? Oh, how many may yet be saved from the misery and degradation of intoxication, through the influence of Temperance, the handmaid to Religion, and the blessed of many thousands who have already embraced it! What hardships and fatigue may we not undergo, by the possession of sufficient Fortitude to help us on our way! and with Prudence to guide our steps, many obstacles and difficulties may be overcome. Justice, evenhanded justice, tempered with Mercy, will find place in the hearts of all good men, in every nook and corner of the globe, where civilization has made the least of progress.

TEMPERANCE, the greatest blessing that can be given to man, stands first in this list of virtues, as the bright star that leads to happiness and comfort. May its benign influence spread and multiply over the earth! Drunkenness has become a national curse—blasting the happiness of the people, and spreading poverty and wretchedness, crime and misery, disease and untimely death. Let Temperance spread her arms and stay this torrent of destruction, as Aaron of old did the plague. We shall then have "the good time that's coming,"—happiness on earth, peace, good-will among men. It is stated in holy writ, "Woe unto him that giveth his neighbour drink, that putteth thy bottle to him, and maketh him drunken also." Let this scourge, this forerunner to poverty, the drunkard's idol, be totally banished from him, "for the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty, and drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags." Let abstinence prevail. Proclaim its blessings

"to every land,
The work of an Almighty hand."

Let Fortitude and Prudence aid you in this noble cause—the reclaiming of drunkards. Let the misanthropists laugh at the idea of Teetotalism; pity them and their weakest point, their want of love for their fellow-men; their jaundiced eye cannot bear the refulgent light of this God-like institution. Go on, and prosper; "let those laugh who win!" there is more to laugh at in joining a Temperance Society than in being picked up in a gutter, or carried to the lock-up. Persevere in the great struggle; the cause is a good one; and "let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works." The cause is a charitable one, and it is the cause of humanity and love: persevere, and your reward is sure.

The Temperance Reformation has hitherto prospered most wonderfully; may it still continue to do so, that thousands may yet enjoy its fruits who are now rioting in the paths of drunkenness; "who reel to and fro, and are at their wits' end;" for "strong drink shall be bitter to them that drink it."

"How oft the sons of riot find
Pleasure the poison of the mind:
'Tis Temperance gives the richest wealth,
Contentment, peace, and lasting health;
'Tis Temperance that forms the sage—
Is youth's best guardian, and the friend of age."

Who, then, would lose the enjoyment of beholding the happiness of the people, and the delight and admiration of seeing Experience leading Youth in his hand to the temple of Temperance, Fortitude, Prudence, and Justice. Sign the pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, and you will add one more towards furthering this grand object, in alleviating the miseries of thousands of your countrymen, and probably save many from the drunkard's grave.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

WHEN, in the course of social events, it becomes necessary for one party to dissolve the ties which have bound it with another, and to assume among the parties of the earth that separate and superior station to which the laws of nature, and of nature's God, entitle them; a decent respect to the opinion of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to their separation.

We hold these facts to be self-evident, that all men are created sober; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain faculties; that among these are reason, and (to a certain extent) self-control, &c. That to assert and secure these faculties, Total Abstinence Societies are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of their members; that whenever any custom becomes destructive to the happiness of mankind, it is the duty of mankind to abolish it, and institute other customs, laying their foundations on such principles, and organizing their powers in such forms, as to them seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

Prudence, indeed, will dictate, that customs long established should not be attacked for light and transient causes; and, accordingly, all experience has shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the evils to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same end (to wit, the making of all men drunkards), evinces a design to reduce them to such drunkenness—it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such customs, and to provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient suffering of the members of these societies, and such is now the necessity which constrains them to abolish the custom of drinking. The history of King Alcohol is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over the world. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a sober world.

He has refused his assent to customs the most wholesome and necessary for the public good. He has forbidden his subjects to be governed by laws other than his own. He has refused to pass laws to promote the happiness and good of mankind. He has endeavoured to prevent the population of the world, for which purpose he causes his subjects to murder the innocent and offending citizen, to break the heart of the mother and wife, to starve and freeze the helpless child, and to close the final, awful scene, by putting an end to his own life. He has obstructed the administration of justice by debasing the judge, perjurying the witness, and exerting an evil influence on the jury. He has erected a multitude of poor-houses, and sent hither swarms of paupers to live in wretchedness, and die in misery. He has kept among us, from time immemorial, armies of drunkards to harass our people and eat out their substance. He has imposed taxes on us without our consent. He has been, and is now, burning our towns, plundering our people, destroying their lives, and thus carrying on the work of death, desolation, and tyranny, with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy never paralleled in the most barbarous ages even of a sober world. In every stage of these oppressions we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms. Our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injuries. A king whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a devil, is unfit to exist among a sober people. Nor have we been wanting in attention to our drinking friends. We have warned them from time to time of the dangers of their course. We have reminded them of their wretchedness, and misery of their families and of themselves, and held out in contrast the joys and happiness of a peaceful and sober home. We have ever held out to them the saving pledge, and entreated and implored them to enlist under our own glorious banner.

They, too, have turned a deaf ear to the voice of reason, of justice, and of soberness. We must, therefore, acquiesce in the necessity which demands our separation, and hold them, as in reason bound, enemies in drunkenness, in soberness friends.

We, therefore, the Total Abstinence World, do, in the name, and by the consent of each and every one of our members, thus solemnly publish and declare, that these Total Abstinence Societies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent societies. That they are absolved from all allegiance to his Alcoholic Majesty, and that all social connection is, and ought to be, now and for ever dissolved. And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the blessing and assistance of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honour.

SOBER SERVANTS.

THE following extract from one of "Martha Makepeace's" letters on "Household Economy," in "The Working Man's Friend," will show that the Total Abstinence question is not lost sight of in that popular periodical. Mrs. Martha is writing on the choice of servants:—

"I shall not surprise you, Mr. Editor, if I say that I should require SOBRIETY in a servant. And here, again, my inquiries would be strict; because if she were not habitually sober, I could not reckon with any confidence on her honesty, modesty, diligence, cleanliness, good temper, or anything else that I regard essential. Many a woman has, to my knowledge, lost her situation, and lost her character for life, in consequence of having indulged a fatal passion for strong drink. Lately, in my neighbourhood, one has been discharged, because she could not be trusted to go out on an errand without calling at a public-house for a dram. Her wages would not sustain her in this practice, and she pilloined several little articles of dress, &c., belonging to her mistress. She, besides, brought disgrace upon herself and her family in another way, which I will not now explain. Here, again, see the importance of training. The poor creature to whom I have just referred was the daughter of parents who, though not in very good circumstances, used strong drink pretty freely. They were not what many would call drunkards; but they drank often enough to make their daughter regard strong drink as necessary to existence, strength, and enjoyment. Thus an appetite was created for it; that appetite was indulged, and now the whole family is reaping the bitter consequences! Now, to tell you the truth, Mr. Editor, I see no positive security against this practice—so destructive to all that is good—except total and entire abstinence from every kind of strong drink. I wonder that parents, and masters and mistresses, do not see this, and insist upon sobriety—strict sobriety—in their children and servants. But how can either parents or employers consistently insist on abstinence, unless they are abstainers themselves? 'Do as I say' will not go far, unless they can add, 'Do as I do.' If a servant has to draw or fetch beer for a family; if she has to place bottles, and decanters, and glasses upon the table; if she sees that her master or mistress connect the use of strong liquor not only with their ordinary meals, but with all occasions of festivity or pleasure, and that the greater the occasion the stronger or more plentiful are the drinks supplied; what wonder if desire after a taste—just the least taste in life—is created; and what wonder if that taste leads to liking—the liking to habit, and the habit to ruin!"

RATHER SUSPICIOUS.—The unlicensed liquor-shops of Boston, U.S., are selling what they call "the essence of molasses;" but it tastes marvellously like brandy, rum, or gin.

STREET CHILDREN.—One of the most important questions which can agitate the public mind is, How shall we stay the tide of pauperism and of crime which is sweeping hundreds of children into the road of ruin. There is one efficient means of doing this: banish all that intoxicates, make fathers and mothers sober and temperate, and these evils will no longer be paramount. It will be objected, "But this is easier said than done;" true, but are you doing your part towards it?

GROSS VIOLATION OF THE RIGHTS OF HUMANITY.

WITH feelings of deep sorrow, not to say indignation, we read the following letter, which we received last week with our usual advices, from the United States of America :---

"Boston, New England, June 16, 1850.

"Sir,—we have been much grieved by the almost unanimous decision of the National Division of the 'Sons of Temperance,' in session at this place, excluding the coloured people, throughout our country, from all their divisions! This is the first time that any person in our country has ever been ejected from a Temperance Society on account of his complexion, and that the Temperance cause has ever been brought to bear decidedly upon the question which is now agitating the whole country, whether the coloured man shall be placed on a level with his fellow man. A few dissenting voices were heard, and a protest entered. The subject, I can assure you, will not rest here. The stigma must not remain upon the Temperance cause. With such contracted views, and thus succumbing to the South, I am sure the 'Order' cannot meet with much favour in England.—Yours in the spirit of universal freedom and brotherhood."

We are informed, through another channel, that as soon as the above vote was announced, W. A. WHITE, Esq., of Boston, Editor of the "New Englander," and a noble champion of freedom and human rights, immediately resigned his seat in the "National Division," and withdrew from the Hall. Six gentlemen entered a protest against the decision, for the reason that, "by the constitution, the ONLY disqualification for membership into this Order is by reason of immorality of character, or incapacity of earning a livelihood, or the want of means of support; and because there are already in membership with this Order coloured brethren, of high moral character and general excellence, upon whom is placed, by the adoption of the foregoing report, an undeserved stigma."

The concluding sentence of the letter will be better understood by our readers when they are told that two ministers of the Gospel are now in England endeavouring to establish this "Order," and that they have already formed "divisions" at Liverpool and elsewhere. We do not mean to insinuate that these gentlemen (one of them, we believe, from New Brunswick, the other from Nova Scotia,) sympathize in the least degree with the ninety-seven "Sons of Temperance" (?) who, at Boston, sustained the action of the Grand Division of Ohio, refusing the admission "of all coloured persons into the Subordinate or Grand Divisions of the Order of the Sons of Temperance, as contrary to the highest interests of the Order, and at war with its harmony and prosperity." We would not, we say, for one moment, include the gentlemen now in England amongst those who sympathize in this outrageous movement. We perceive that the dissenters to this proposition—six only in number—were from New England and the province of Canada West. We have called this an outrageous movement; and we put it to our Temperance friends in England whether they ought, in any manner or degree, to place themselves in connection with a society "Grand Divisions" of which can deliberately resolve upon committing such an outrage. Nor was this act committed under the influence of strong excitement. Listen to the vindication published in the "Middleton Son of Temperance:"---

"No one will dispute the fact that coloured ministers of the Gospel—able, judicious, and good men—have been expelled from the Order because they were black. It is of no use to disguise the truth. Our Order is made up of men, with passions and tastes like other men who do not see fit to join it. Few advocate the expediency, whatever they may think of the rightness, of an amalgamation of the races. It is hardly right for those who cannot advocate that plan for elevating the human character, to insist on the duty of granting to the negro all the other immunities of the whites. The union of our fraternity is close—it is heart to heart. Still, it gives us pleasure to learn that in Massachusetts negroes are not prohibited from joining our Order. We too often forget that it is soul, not skin, which gives value to a man. As society advances a little further towards that ideal perfection, of which we hear so much, the cry of despair will no more be heard because human rights are trampled ruthlessly in the dust. But, for the present, it must not be expected that every voluntary organization, like that of our Order, shall free itself from all the prejudices of custom, and be so far ahead even of the church and the age."

"For the present," therefore, we advise the temperance men and women of Great Britain to have no fellowship with this "Fraternity." We blush not to "advocate" both "the RIGHTNESS" and "the EXPEDIENCY" of "an amalgamation of the races" whom "GOD has made of one blood." We subscribe—heart and soul—the sentence with which an able article on the subject, in the July Number of the Journal of the American Temperance Union, concludes namely, that "TEMPERANCE ORGANIZATIONS ARE INVALUABLE TO THE CAUSE; BUT A CURSE WILL ATTEND THEM WHEN, IN THE GREATNESS OF THEIR POWER, THEY TRAMPLE ON HUMAN RIGHTS AND HUMAN FEELINGS."

* * Since writing the above, some influential friends have suggested the importance of having some distinct resolution moved at the principal Temperance Meetings throughout the kingdom, expressive of honest indignation at this atrocious outrage.

THE REFORMED HUSBAND TO HIS WIFE.

(From The Working Man's Friend.)

No more for me the festive board,
My wedded nights too oft beguiling!
No more for me the faithless bowl,
The lips of wedded love defiling.
Too long I've rolled in Folly's round,
And left my home deserted—dreary;
For long I've sought delusive joys,
And met thy love with wrongs, my Mary.

Oh! didst thou think, when oft I woo'd,
And called thee all my bosom's treasure,
The guiltful draught, or nightly song,
Away from thee, would yield me pleasure?
I vowed to guard and cherish thee—
Thy spouse—thy lover—ne'er to vary;
But cold my heart, and false my vow,
To leave thee lonely, thus, my Mary.

How oft beneath the waning star,
As home my truant steps were bending,
I saw thee gaze with straining eyes,
To catch me down the hill descending;
And then the task to hide thy tears,
To look a welcome blythe and cheery,
Lest I should feel one moment's pang
To know thou hadst been weeping, Mary.

'Tis o'er! but oh! what keen remorse
Can woman's patient wrongs awaken!
Forgive the past, and trust me well,
No more shalt thou be left forsaken.
Thy days of deep repining over—
Thy nightly watchings, lone and weary;
By every grief that wrung thy breast,
I'll prove, at last, I love thee, Mary.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

GRAND TEETOTAL EXCURSION.

On Monday, July 22, a large party of teetotalers, comprising the leading members of most of the metropolitan societies, and several from various parts of the country, proceeded, by special train, to TUNBRIDGE WELLS. They left the London-bridge terminus about a quarter before nine o'clock in the morning, and arrived safely at Tunbridge Wells soon after eleven. They were met there by the committee of the Tunbridge Wells Total Abstinence Society, and conducted along the Parade and public walks to the Common, where, on the spot called "Mount Ephraim," a large tent or booth was erected. This eminence commands a delightful panoramic view of the Wells, Tunbridge, and the adjacent country for many miles round, and evidently afforded a rich treat to the excursionists, the great majority of whom visited the interesting spot for the first time. The tent was very commodious, and, to secure the comfort of the excursionists, a large piece of ground adjoining was neatly enclosed. After partaking of various refreshments, the majority of the company proceeded to Eridge, permission to visit the Warren having been kindly granted by the Right Hon. the Earl of Abergavenny. The principal object of attraction in the Warren is the range of rocks extending for nearly a mile. The great height and fantastic forms of these, together with the gigantic trees and smaller herbage growing out of their fissures, and the graceful pines and other fir-trees around, excited the astonishment and delight of the whole company. The day was remarkably fine; and as the sun at this time shone forth in the fulness of its strength, the shade afforded by the trees, which, touching the rocks, formed pleasant avenues, was most agreeable and refreshing.

After enjoying a delightful ramble through a large portion of this beautiful demesne, on their return to the entrance gate, a suitable spot presenting itself, it was determined to hold "a meeting" for a short time. A Temperance hymn was sung, and numbers soon gathered round. The Rev. Mr. BALL, of Ipswich, delivered a warm, congratulatory address, expressing his hearty sympathy with the friends and brethren with whom he was happy to meet, and who were engaged, like himself, in promoting the excellent cause of Teetotalism. Mr. T. B. Smithies, after remarking on the delightful associations of that day, said that the friends could not think of leaving the charming scenery by which they were surrounded without presenting a grateful tribute of thanks to the Right Hon. the Earl of Abergavenny, for the kind permission granted them to view that remarkable spot. That visit had added greatly to the interest and enjoyment of the excursion; and, therefore, in the name of the committee and of the friends present, he proposed a resolution to that effect. This proposition was most cordially welcomed; and, after being ably seconded by F. Engall, Esq., surgeon, of Euston-square, London, it was responded to by three hearty cheers.

On returning to the Common, no time was lost in preparing the favourite and refreshing beverage, tea; and this, with the usual accompaniments, was partaken of by great numbers of healthy, happy-looking men, women, and children. The very able and efficient band, from the Parade, was in attendance, and played some favourite pieces. A large number of persons, from the town and adjacent places, having arrived on the Common, it was judged advisable to sally forth and address them on the important subject of total abstinence. Several advocates volunteered their services, and a meeting was commenced in right good earnest. A hymn being sung, a large company soon collected, who were addressed, in regular teetotal style, by Messrs. Punch, West, Driver, Howlett, and other well-known hard-workers. The Rev. J. Doxsey engaged the marked attention of an audience, in another part of the Common, by a very energetic and instructive address. It is believed that much good will result from both these meetings.

In the mean time preparations were made within the tent for the principal meeting which had been announced. About six o'clock the chair was taken (pro tempore) by the Rev. Mr. Ball, of Ipswich. His address consisted of some general remarks on the necessity which existed for the Temperance Movement, arising out of the prevalence of intemperance, and the fearful injuries inflicted by it on individuals, on families, on the Christian Church, and on the community at large; illustrating the same by instances, both of the evils of intemperance and the benefits of total abstinence, which had come under his own observation. The Rev. J. Doxsey followed in a brief but very animated and animating address. Mr. J. W. Green having announced that the time had arrived when it was necessary for those who intended to return to London, to proceed to the station, Mr. T. B. Smithies moved a resolution of thanks to the Committee of the Tunbridge-wells Society, for the great exertions they had made to accommodate the visitors, and to contribute to the interest of the excursion. This was seconded, and carried with great cordiality. A Londoner then proposed three cheers for the Tunbridge teetotalers, which were heartily given; when one of the Tunbridge society proposed a similar compliment to be paid to the Londoners; this also met a hearty response.

As the Londoners were returning, intelligence was brought, that BENJAMIN ROTCH, Esq., who had been announced to preside over the evening meeting, had just arrived on the ground. The grounds were then thrown open to the public, and a second large audience was soon collected. Mr. Rotch, on entering, was heartily welcomed. On taking the chair, he explained the reason of his not having sooner appeared among them. He had just returned from Paris, and it was not without great effort that he was able to fulfil his engagement. He then addressed the audience for upwards of an hour, during which period he enunciated the principal truths involved in the temperance question with great felicity of language and aptness of illustration. Mr. J. H. Esterbrooke delivered an eloquent and impressive Address, in which he enforced the claims of the Temperance Movement, more especially on the female and youthful portion of his auditors. Mr. W. Spriggs proposed, and Mr. Dodd, of Tunbridge Wells, seconded, a resolution of thanks to the chairman, which, being very feelingly responded to, the meeting terminated, those who composed it being evidently refreshed and encouraged by what they had seen and heard relative to the benevolent enterprise of the Temperance Reformation. Upwards of forty signatures to the temperance pledge were obtained during the day.

This excursion, we understand, was under the management of the gentlemen who conducted the series of temperance meetings recently held in Exeter-hall, and who are expected, shortly, to issue the prospectuses of a similar series, to commence in September or October next.

At the meeting of the Committee, held on Wednesday evening last, a resolution was passed, expressing the thanks of the Committee to the stewards of the Tunbridge Wells Common Estate, for their kindness in refusing to allow any booths or stands to be erected on the Common that day, for the sale of any kind of intoxicating drinks; an arrangement which contributed greatly to the comfort of the teetotalers, and to the good order and conduct of the numerous spectators.

AN IMPRESSIVE INCIDENT.

On the memorable day of the grand temperance gala held on Mount Ephraim, Tunbridge Wells, I was delightfully musing upon the beautiful and romantic scenery around me, when my attention was arrested by a delicate-looking little girl approaching me, who, in a mild and affecting tone, addressed me thus: "Sir, I am very anxious to take the pledge of you." I felt deeply impressed with such an interesting application, and curiosity constrained me to elicit the cause of such a noble resolve. After a moment's hesitation, she replied, with tremulous lips, "My poor dear sister, who had been a teetotaler for a length of time, implored me the other day, when on her dying pillow, never, never, to taste strong drinks, and at once to become a pledged teetotaler. I wish now to fulfil my poor sister's expiring request." Here her artless voice failed; a tear trickled down her pretty but sorrowful face; her young heart seemed ready to break. I gladly received her pledge, embraced her tiny lily-white hand, and acknowledged her as my little teetotal sister. She smiled for a moment, but it was quickly followed by a tear. On retiring I invoked a prayer at the throne of heaven, that God would bless this affectionate and youthful disciple of the glorious cause of temperance.

FITZROY TEETOTAL ASSOCIATION.

The 15th of July, 1850, was a proud day both for the Fitzroy Society, and their truly deserving secretary, and was equally honourable to both. Too often, men act virtuously, wisely, and nobly, and their exertions are received with cold indifference by those to whom their lives have been devoted, and even the empty meed of approval is denied them. Even the Temperance Movement, where nothing but brotherly love, liberality of sentiment, mutual confidence, and a reciprocity of generous feelings should exist, is too much infected with this narrow-minded and niggardly economy, equally injurious to the cause, and unjust to those who work hard in its advancement. The Fitzroy Association on many occasions has been a noble exception to this too-general rule, and the demonstration on Monday evening will long be remembered by those who had the happiness to be present in this Model Hall. The tea festival was numerously attended. After the feast of love, and the singing of a hymn, the grand purpose for which the meeting was called was proceeded with, viz., to present a Testimonial to Mr. J. P. DRAPER, the long-trying, zealous, and respected secretary, for his gratuitous services, and untiring exertions in the sacred cause of temperance, in the duties of his arduous and fatiguing office for the space of ten years. These consisted of a beautifully-written tablet, richly framed and glazed, setting forth the merits of the receiver, and grateful feelings of the committee and members, and an elegant gold watch and appendages of the value of £28. This was a rich gift, but its chief value lay in the merit that won it, and the benevolent and fraternal spirit with which it was awarded.

Mr. GEORGE MILLER, treasurer of the association, filled the chair, and opened the proceedings in a speech springing from the genuine convictions of his long experience of the high merits of the honorary secretary; his testimony elicited deserved applause.

The several members of the committee present followed, and spoke in unqualified terms of the zeal, benevolence, and ready co-operation in all things for the good of the cause of temperance of their respected friend.

Mr. VALLANCE, after displaying the elegant tablet, and reading it aloud to the meeting, called on Mr. Draper, to whom he presented it, saying: The committee and members of this association presented it to him as a token and testimonial of their approbation, and hoped he would long live to enjoy it, and leave it as an honourable heirloom in his family. He then invested him with an elegant gold watch and appendages, and in the name of the committee and members, hoped he would wear them as a remembrance of the regard of those who presented them. Mr. Draper was much affected, and returned his acknowledgments in a voice that spoke the inward workings of his heart. The only visitors that took part in the proceedings were, Mr. Brown, the Boston poet, who sung a fine temperance melody; and the writer of this sketch, who read a short paper testifying his obligations to Mr. Draper, and to the committee, who, when he was in extreme poverty, offered him the hand of friendship, and raised a new hope in his bosom. Through such men our cause will prosper. May other associations follow their example, and a rich harvest will ensue, of brotherly love, sober enjoyment, and domestic happiness.

TOTTENHAM AND EDMONTON TEMPERANCE UNION.

The Annual Rural Festival of this society was held on Monday, the 15th July, in the beautiful and extensive grounds attached to Bruce Castle, Tottenham, which were most readily placed at the disposal of the committee on the occasion. The weather proved very favourable, and the picturesque appearance of the Park was increased by marquees, with gaily floating streamers, erected in different parts for the purpose of supplying refreshment, and accommodation to tea-parties. During the afternoon, between two and three thousand persons assembled from the surrounding neighbourhood, and many came from London, to enjoy a day of rational pleasure and healthful recreation. The juveniles found ample employment in cricket, archery, donkey riding, and other amusements, in which they were joined by some of the seniors; whilst others promenade in the pleasant walks which surround the Park, or reclined under the shade of magnificent trees, engaged in conversation, and enjoying the performances of a German band, which at intervals gave pieces of their national music in excellent style. A more respectable, well-conducted, and cheerful assemblage it were impossible to conceive.

At six o'clock, the committee, with several of their friends, were most courteously entertained at tea, by Arthur Hill, Esq., and family; after which the company gathered round a temporary platform, erected in the centre of the Park for the meeting. GEORGE CRUIKSHANK, Esq., occupied the chair, and commenced the proceedings with a lively and convincing speech, detailing some of the good results of Total Abstinence in his own personal experience. He was followed by the Rev. I. Doocey, Messrs. C. Campbell, J. P. Edwards, and W. Tweedie, who, in brief but telling addresses, exhibited the various claims and aspects of the Temperance movement, and elicited repeated expressions of satisfaction and applause from the audience. Among those present we observed, besides several members of the family at the Castle, the Rev. J. S. Winter, Dr. Lovell, Roger Dawson, Esq., John Drewett, Esq., A. Harris, Esq., — Clarke, Esq., Wm. Janson, Esq., R. S. Pinching, Esq., and many other gentlemen. The meeting terminated with a vote of thanks to the Messrs. Hill, and the Chairman, which was responded to by three cheers; after which the band struck up, and retired from the grounds, followed by the company; thus concluding one of the most delightful days in the history of the Temperance movement in Tottenham and its neighbourhood.

BRIGHTON BAND OF HOPE TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

A meeting was held at the Friends' Meeting-house, Brighton, on Tuesday, 25th ult., for the purpose of forming a society under the above name. Mr. Wakeford, in moving the first resolution, said he felt convinced there was plenty of room for another society in Brighton, especially such an one as they intended that evening to organize; but it would require exertion and perseverance to enable them to succeed in their great undertaking. Let them not, now they had commenced operations, incline to be backward in carrying them out. Let them join together, feeling sure of success, and in the end they would reap a plentiful harvest, gained through their own industry and exertion. — Messrs. Austin and J. Hilton, jun., were appointed vice-presidents; Mr. R. Patching, treasurer; and Mr. J. H. S. Wakeford, hon. secretary. A vote of thanks was then given to the chairman, and likewise to Messrs. Austin, J. Ripley, and R. Patching, for their kind attendance.

GLOUCESTER.

On Monday, July 15, the tectotalers of this city held their annual festival. The members of the society, accompanied by many friends—for whose accommodation a special excursion train was provided—walked through the principal streets, headed by the celebrated Ebley brass band. About half-past four o'clock they arrived at Mr. S. Bowley's farm, where about 1,000 sat down to tea. After tea a public meeting was held, at which addresses were delivered by Mr. S. BOWLEY, who presided, Mr. J. Inwards, Mr. R. Horne, and the Rev. W. H. Turner, vicar of Banwell. On Tuesday the juveniles of the city had a "turn-out," and, in imitation of the elders, had a procession and a tea-meeting. After tea, a public meeting was held, which was addressed by Mr. R. Horne, Mr. J. Inwards, and others.

WIDCOMBE.

On Tuesday, 16th July, the annual Conference of the Bristol and Somerset Temperance Society was held at the Temperance-hall, where the delegates, representing the various branches of the district, met at two o'clock for the transaction of business. An interesting report of the progress of the principles advocated by these societies was given, and at the termination of the proceedings the delegates and their friends dined together in the hall. In the evening a public meeting was held at the Guildhall, when the chair was taken by R. CHARLETON, Esq., of Bristol, who introduced the subject of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors, and spoke of the advantages, mental, moral, and physical, resulting therefrom. Several other speakers addressed the meeting.

ASHTON KEYNES.

The friends of the Ashton Keynes Temperance Society held their first anniversary on Thursday, June 27th. At two o'clock the members assembled in the appointed place, were soon joined by friends from Cirencester, Tetbury, Oaksey, South Cerney, and other neighbouring villages. Having taken refreshments, they proceeded in order through the streets of the village, most of them carrying flags, or banners, attended by the Ashton brass band. At five o'clock they returned to the house of Mr. F. Wilkins, near which a tent was erected, under which two hundred and fifty sat down to tea. After tea they proceeded partly round the village, and on their return were accompanied by a vast number of people. Addresses were delivered by Mr. Wm. Wilkins, of Seddington, who occupied the chair, Mr. A. Gibbons, Mr. J. Jeffries, Mr. Wm. Hall, and Mr. G. Bird.

The Temperance cause has made great progress since its first introduction into Ashton Keynes by the Temperance friends from Oaksey, and the change that has taken place in the habits of the people in consequence would hardly be credited by any but those who are witnesses of the fact.

BIDEFOLD.

Our half-yearly meeting, held on the 27th ultimo, went off well. We had a tolerable procession—a good tea meeting—and an excellent meeting in the evening at the Mansion-house. The chair was taken by J. Thompson, Esq., surgeon, and the meeting was ably and effectively addressed by our good friend, C. Veysey, Esq., of Torrington, and by the Rev. Messrs. Hinks and Arthur, of Bideford, and the Rev. J. Clapp, of Appledore.

I had just intimated to the Rev. Mr. Clapp, that at the close of his excellent address, he should name to the audience that we proposed to give an invitation to J. Cassell, Esq., of London, to visit us at Christmas next, and at the mention of it a general burst of applause ensued; and I mention this with great pleasure, to show that a good feeling exists, and that there is hope of seeing a revival of the right sort of teetotalism. We purpose to go to work in good earnest, and trust to Providence for success.

J. PICKARD, Sec.

MIDDLESBOROUGH.

The annual meeting of the Temperance Society of this place was held last month, in the Independent school-room. In the report then presented it was stated that, on an average, two meetings had been held every week, which, in general, had been well attended. The number of signatures to the pledge had been—adults, 565; children, 66. A meeting of children had been held, when about 500 had assembled, who were addressed by Mrs. Jackson. Mr. J. Teare had lectured for six nights successively, with very striking success. There had occurred many deeply interesting cases of reformation in persons of confirmed intemperate habits, and the testimony some of them had voluntarily borne to the physical, moral, and religious change they had experienced since they had abstained from intoxicating liquors, was very striking and encouraging. A series of highly interesting and attractive public meetings was held during the week. At one of these a lecture was delivered by Mr. Edward Grubb, in which he laid before his hearers the various disadvantages and evils of intemperance, especially to the working classes; and recommended and enforced, by a variety of powerful arguments and illustrations, the principles of the Total Abstinence society. On another of the evenings, there was a Working Man's Temperance Demonstration, where the meeting was addressed by numerous workmen from the various manufactories, who gave most interesting and instructive accounts of their experience of the beneficial effects of total abstinence on their mental and physical health, and on their social and domestic comfort and happiness. Several of the speakers having thrown out hints that their voices would be able to furnish some interesting accounts of their increased comforts at home, another meeting was held for that purpose, which excited deep interest, and drew together a very large audience. Several females addressed the meeting. One of them stated that her husband had been a teetotaler for about three years, and that they had enjoyed more comfort during that time than for the nine previous years; and they were better off now, though her husband was earning only 14s. a week, than they used to be formerly when he was earning double that amount. Many gave thanks for the blessings they had received.

NORTHAMPTON.

On Monday, June 24th, a meeting of a somewhat novel kind was held at the Temperance-hall; Mr. GADSDEN in the chair. It has been frequently urged against Teetotalism, that no person could do hard work without some kind of intoxicating liquor. At this meeting, twelve workmen undertook to prove from their own experience, that hard work could be done better without these drinks than with them. The meeting was opened by singing. After which

Mr. D. HALL, carrier, came forward, and stated that he had been a teetotaler ten years, and found himself much better in consequence in every respect. He made a humorous speech, and drew a pleasant contrast between his past and present condition.

Mr. JOHN SMEATHERS announced that he had been a teetotaler eleven years; and showed the hardships that a drunkard's child had to undergo. He proved to demonstration the moral benefits arising from total abstinence; and concluded by reciting a pathetic appeal to the audience to abstain from those moral and physical poisons.

Mr. PRATT then sang a beautiful Temperance melody, "The drunkard is free."

THOMAS ESSON, coal-porter, stated that he had been a leader among the drunkards, and that previous to his becoming a teetotaler he was in a most wretched condition; but since he had been an abstainer he had become healthy, happy, and comfortable.

W. OLIVER, shoemaker, said that he had been delivered out of the "house of bondage" ten years. He was at one time a drunkard, afterwards a moderate drinker; but was never so well, mentally, morally, or physically, as now.

RICHARD JONES, labourer, said that in his youth he abhorred strong drink, and always suffered from it when he had any. But as he grew up, he became a notorious drinker. Had always found professing Christians his greatest opponents. Can work as well now as ever he could. Had risen at 3 o'clock that morning, and had done a day's work previous to coming to the meeting. He also stated that he belonged to a society of water drinkers, who neither drink tea, coffee, nor any other useless beverages. Thought it would be well if all other teetotal friends would do likewise.

Mr. HENSMAN, shoemaker; Mr. LACK, gardener (and local preacher among the Wesleyans); and Mr. GIBBS, shoemaker, made speeches, showing the evil effects of drinking, and the beneficial effects of total abstinence.

BENJAMIN BLAKE, engine-driver; Mr. KNIGHT, shoemaker; JOHN NEWMAN, and W. JOHNSON, followed in the same strain, and made interesting speeches; but the small space at our command will not allow us to give a report of them.

A glee was then sung by G. CORBY, J. and D. PRATT, and the meeting broke up. It is to be regretted that so few persons attended the above meeting, as it was calculated to do so much good. However, the thanks of all sincere teetotalers are due to Mr. Wells, and the committee, for the trouble they have been put to in making the necessary arrangements.

YOUTHS' ASSOCIATION.—In order to counteract the evils resulting from attending such places as Boughton fair, the Youths' Total Abstinence Committee resolved on producing attractive entertainments on the evenings of Tuesday and Wednesday, June the 25th and 26th; the first of which was opened by a recitation, written by a friend in Northampton, and recited by J. K. Applebee. Mr. J. C. Caulcutt presided at the piano. The amusements of the evening consisted chiefly of several admired and popular songs, and recitations from the most approved authors, very well sustained, and received by the audience with great applause. On Wednesday the entertainment was of a more dramatic character.

BRADFORD.

The seventh annual festival of the Long-pledged Teetotal Association commenced on Sunday, June 16, with an out-door meeting in the open space near the railway station, Kirkgate, when addresses were delivered by several friends to a numerous and well-conducted meeting. In the evening, the meeting announced to take place in the Teetotal-hall, Southgate, was adjourned to the front of Goodchild's Temperance Hotel, when D. Lightowlers, of Bradford, and J. Shaw, of Leeds, delivered very powerful and animating addresses to a numerous assemblage of people. On Monday a public tea party was held. On Tuesday evening the annual meeting was held; Mr. J. Bamford in the chair. The report having been read, its adoption was moved by W. Jackson, seconded by H. Chadwick, supported by J. A. Binns, and unanimously adopted by the meeting. From the report we gather that, during the past year, a number of interesting and instructive lectures have been delivered, which, with two or three exceptions, have been well attended—the subjects of an attractive and useful character. Three lectures, by Mr. Jabez Inwards, on—1st. Teetotalism the Temperance of Nature; 2nd. "An Ethical Dissertation on Public-house Signs;" and 3rdly. "Cruikshank's Illustrations of the Bottle." Also a lecture, numerous and respectfully attended, has been delivered by Mr. Binns, of Bingley, the subject being "Free Inquiry—Influence of Intoxicating Liquors on the Human System—the Eyes of Woman, as described by the most eminent British Poets; the Destruction of their Beauty by Intoxicating Liquors—Relations of Drinkers and Teetotolers to Social Reform and General Progress." Lectures have been delivered gratuitously by Messrs. Starkey and Lightowlers, of Bradford, and C. Shackleton, of Queen's Head.

During the early part of the year, some very successful bands of Hope meetings have been held; but in consequence of the great difficulty to obtain speakers, they have unavoidably been discontinued. In the months of October, November, and December, Mr. J. C. Booth has been engaged as the Town's Temperance Missionary, during which period a numerous accession of signatures to the pledge has been obtained.

The establishment of a reading and discussion society has been the means of disseminating a great amount of Temperance information; while other good and laudable ends have been pursued in conjunction, the object of the committee being to combine utility and instruction. Among the publications purchased were the "Working Man's Friend," and the Standard of Freedom. The reading-room was open on the evenings of Monday, Wednesday, and Saturday; and in the early part of the present year several special meetings have been held for the discussion of a very important question, viz., "Is it the duty of Government to abolish public-houses, and prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors?"

By the lamented death of Wm. Wilson, Esq., the Association has sustained the loss of a valuable friend, having been indebted to him for many pecuniary aids, and donations of tracts. Even at his death, he has shown his unbounded attachment to the cause by leaving the sum of £100 to his favourite object—the purchase of tracts for distribution.

The annual Whitsuntide United Temperance Gala has been attended with greater success than on any previous occasion. There were not less than 20,000 persons present; the total number of visitors could not have been less than 30,000. The total receipts of the gala were £265 6s. 9½d., including the donations that were given by the refreshment-booth proprietors.

Last year an appeal was made to the members, in order to induce them to support the Temperance literature, and in consequence of the efforts of Mr. H. Chadwick, above one hundred publications (among which are THE TEETOTAL TIMES, &c.) are now regularly purchased by the members.

The committee feel that it would be a dereliction of duty on their part, if they did not render their hearty acknowledgments to J. Cassell, Esq., and the other promoters of the Exeter-hall Monthly Meetings, feeling convinced that those meetings must have operated most favourably on the minds, not only in the metropolis, but on the whole of the intelligent public, inasmuch as some of the best talent has been brought to bear on the question, and reports of the meetings have been inserted in some of the leading public newspapers. The fact that intoxicating drinks are articles of unnecessary consumption is nearly universally admitted; and, hoping that their injurious effects will be, to the same extent, acknowledged, and confident that their principles will reach the lofty eminence in public estimation when they shall be far above the sneers of ignorance, or the short-sighted opposition of prejudice, the report concludes, soliciting co-operation and sympathy for the coming year.

BRITISH ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROMOTION OF TEMPERANCE.

The sixteenth annual conference of this Society was held at Halifax on the 16th, 17th, and 18th of July. A principal source of attraction was the Grand Temperance Bazaar, held on behalf of the association, in a large room adjoining the Northgate Hotel. The general arrangements were under the controul of Messrs. Millington, Sugden, Garlick, Horsfall, Thomas, and Smith; and to their unceasing exertions much of the success which crowned the whole affair is owing. The receipts are as follow: First day, £78 19s. 9½d. 2nd day, £100 0s. 1½d. 3rd day, £99 2s. 7½d. The deliberations of the conference were commenced on Tuesday afternoon, when, after some time spent in preliminary arrangements, in suggesting topics for discussion, and the appointment of a business committee, the meeting was adjourned to the following morning. On Wednesday morning the delegates assembled in the Town-hall. There was a goodly attendance, many having come from a considerable distance. Mr. John Andrew, of Leeds, was voted into the chair, in the absence of W. Morris, Esq., the president. The following are some of the more important resolutions passed at the conference:—

"That this conference regards with pleasure the influence of the efforts which have been made to secure the repeal of the beer bill, and it recommends the executive committee to take steps for sustaining the agitation for that object, pledging itself to accord the necessary, pecuniary, and petitioning support.

"That this conference views with pleasure the great success which has already attended the formation of Bands of hope, and earnestly recommends the friends of temperance everywhere, to establish similar organizations in connection with adult societies.

"It is the opinion of this conference, that much of the work of Sunday-school instruction is neutralized by the drinking customs of society. It would, therefore, request the various temperance societies, to call the attention of all teachers in their localities to the subject of total abstinence, and urge them to inculcate the practice upon the children under their care.

"That this conference, regarding the formation of Ladies' associations as important auxiliaries in the temperance cause, reiterates its former recommendation, that, wherever practicable, such be called into action, and have some particular department of the enterprise assigned to them.

"That this meeting feels deeply impressed with the importance of household visitation, and urgently recommends to the various societies the employment of town missionaries, and that care should be taken to select persons of unquestionable moral character, of sound temperance principles, and of active habits.

"That with a view to bring the subject of temperance before the ministers of religion, and to ascertain the number of that class who are at present abstainers from intoxicating liquors, the Conference directs the executive committee to take immediate steps for a re-issue of the ministerial certificate.

"That in view of the manifold and fearful evils resulting from the use of intoxicating drinks, and the light which has been shed upon the subject by scientific research, and by the experience of millions of persons of all classes, conditions, and employments, in this and other lands; this Conference is solemnly of opinion that the manufacture, sale, and use of such liquors as beverages is immoral, and ought to be universally abandoned; and further, that the makers, sellers, and drinkers, are largely responsible for the evils which these drinks produce."

A public tea party was held on Wednesday evening in the New Assembly Rooms, Harrison-road. The attendance was exceedingly numerous. Arrangements were made for a public meeting, which was presided over by JOHN CROSSLEY, Esq., Mayor of Halifax. The Rev. F. HOWARTH, of Bury, addressed the meeting at some length, contending that while the English were distinguished as a nation for the intelligence and integrity of their people, it was a lamentable fact that no nation was more degraded through its drinking customs.—Mr. HENRY CLAPP gave a brief sketch of the Temperance Movement in America.—Dr. Lees and Mr. John Andrew also addressed the meeting.

On Thursday morning, about 120 of the delegates and friends of the Temperance cause sat down to a public breakfast at the new Assembly Rooms, after which the delegates resumed their sittings. In the evening a second public meeting was held in the same rooms; Frank Crossley, Esq., presided on the occasion.

BOLTON.

Last month the seventeenth anniversary of the Ilton Society was celebrated by the members and friends. A tea party was held in the hall at five o'clock in the afternoon, at which about 300 were present; and after tea, the members at the Parents' and Youths' Temperance Societies, the various Sunday-school branches, and the brethren belonging to the orders of Adult and Juvenile Rechabites, walked in procession through the town, accompanied by three bands of music. The procession had an imposing appearance, from the numerous flags, carriages, vehicles, &c., which adorned it. The most amusing part, however, was a cottage placed upon a carriage, having a division across the centre. In the fore part, was the drunkard's cottage, with its inmates smoking, drinking, fighting, and exhibiting bruises, patches, and rags; and in the back part were a respectably-attired male and female, and their children, apparently in the greatest comfort, and affording a striking contrast to the picture in front. At the close of the procession, a public meeting was held in the hall, over which R. Knowles, Esq., president of the society, presided; and the claims of temperance were advocated by Messrs. Addleshaw, Bormond, and others.

GAINSBOROUGH.

The last week in June, the Temperance Society held a series of interesting meetings. Monday evening, the 24th, a tea festival was held, at which a goodly number were present. After tea, addresses were delivered by Rev. P. N. Atkinson, P. M. minister; Rev. J. Muncaster, Independent; F. Atkinson, the Society's Missionary; and Mr. J. Teare. On Tuesday evening Mr. Teare delivered a lecture in the Temperance-hall, and on Thursday and Friday evenings in the Primitive Methodist chapel. Our friend Teare nobly performed his duty, showing his audience that what the majority of the people have hitherto considered lawful and right, was unlawful and immoral. Great good was the result. The people are beginning to see the wickedness and absurdity of supporting the abominable system of drinking intoxicating liquors.

RYDER'S COURT.

On Sunday evening, July 14, a Temperance Sermon was preached in the hall of the St. Martin's Christian Total Abstinence Association, Ryder's-court, Leicester-square, by Mr. G. Blaby. He selected for his text 1 Thessalonians, v. 22, "Abstain from all appearance of evil." After a brief introduction, the speaker enforced upon all—and professing Christians especially—the necessity of abstaining from all that in any way retards the morality, virtue, social happiness, or religion. He then proceeded to show that intoxicating drinks are evil, in a physical, moral, or religious point of view; that we should abstain for the sake of setting a good example to others, because we are "our brothers' keepers," and our actions have an influence upon others, either for good or for evil. He then addressed a few words to those who had already signed the Temperance pledge, on the necessity for them to be "up and doing," and not shrink from the work which is before them; adding, in conclusion, that neither teetotalism, nor anything short of the gospel salvation, would save them from the "worm that dieth not, and the fire that is not quenched." After the sermon, an Experience meeting was held. Mr. Spriggs presided, and several speakers addressed the meeting.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE SCOTTISH TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.

The meetings connected with this celebration have been held in Glasgow during the past month. Sermons were preached on Sunday, the ministers who conducted the services belonging to different denominations. The Church of Scotland was represented by the Rev. T. C. Wilson, Dunkeld, who preached in St. Enoch's and St. John's churches. The Rev. Mr. Longmuir, of Mariners' Free Church, Aberdeen, occupied the pulpits of Messrs. Currie and Bonar. The Rev. W. Pringle, Auchterarder, preached in Cathedral-street and Wellington-street United Presbyterian churches; and Dr. Wardlaw's pulpit was occupied by the Rev. Thomas Henderson, Dundee, who also conducted a service in Laurieston Congregational Chapel. The Congregationalists not connected with the Union were represented by the Rev. F. Ferguson, sen., Aberdeen, who officiated in Ebenezer and Regent-place Chapels; and the Rev. Messrs. Paterson and Taylor, Baptist ministers, preached in their own places of worship. The thirteenth and concluding sermon for the day was given by the Rev. George Blyth, Jamaica, in Dr. King's Church, North Albion-street.

On Monday night a public meeting of members and friends of the League was held in the Trades'-hall, Glassford-street. There was a very full attendance. The Rev. T. C. Wilson, Dunkeld, occupied the chair, and the meeting was addressed by the Rev. Messrs. Brown, Blythe, of Jamaica, and Howarth, of Bury; and Messrs. Eaton, Stirling, &c.

On Tuesday morning a public breakfast, in connection with the anniversary meetings of the League, took place in the Trades'-hall, Glassford-street. The party was unprecedentedly numerous, nearly filling the spacious apartment.

The meeting of members for the transaction of business took place at twelve o'clock on Tuesday, in the saloon of the Trades-hall. Members and delegates were present from Edinburgh, Aberdeen, Paisley, Dalkeith, Kirkealdy, Alloa, Kilmarnock, Johnstone, Hamilton, Greenock, Campbelton, Dumbarton, Rothesay, Milngavie, Airdrie, Shott's Iron Works, Barrhead, Neilston, Largs, Kirkcconnell, Coldstream, Tranent, Penston, Burntisland, Abercorn, Doune, Dunblane, Colclace, Dunkeld, Elgin, and Bury.

ROBERT KETTLE, Esq., President of the League, took the chair; and, after the Rev. Mr. Wilson, Dunkeld, had, at his request, implored the Divine blessing, he opened the proceedings with a few introductory remarks.

THE SECRETARY then read the annual report of the Executive Committee, the statements of which were of a highly interesting and encouraging description. The success which had attended the efforts of the League was detailed, and several features of the times noticed, the tendency of which was to popularize and extend the principles of temperance.

After the election of officers, the appointment of committees, and the transaction of other business, the proceedings, which had throughout been of a satisfactory character, terminated with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

EDINBURGH.

The Ladies' Visiting Committee, in connection with the Edinburgh Total Abstinence Society, held their quarterly soiree in Mr. George Johnston's Temperance Hotel, Nicolson-street, on Wednesday evening, July 17, when the place was filled with a highly respectable audience. Mr. EASTON occupied the chair; and, after some appropriate observations, introduced Mr. Birrel, who read the report. It showed that since last quarter, through the efforts of the ladies' committee, 39 had become connected with abstinence.

GLASGOW.

A soiree, under the auspices of the Juvenile League, took place in the Mechanics'-hall, Hanover-street, on Saturday evening, July 13; Mr. JAMES MITCHELL presided. Interesting addresses were delivered by Messrs. M'Alister, Morton, Reid, Glendinning, and other gentlemen; and appropriate melodies were chanted by the juveniles in first-rate style. The most interesting feature in the proceedings was the distribution of several prizes, for the best sewed pieces, knitted and crochet work, offered some time ago by the League, with the view of promoting habits of industry. Altogether it was a most pleasant, instructive, and happy meeting.

GORBALS.

On Wednesday night, July 17, a numerous and interesting party of the adult members of the Gorbals Abstinence Society assembled in Bedford-street Hall. The object of the meeting was to present a testimonial to Mr. P. Ferguson, Temperance agent to the Gorbals Society, on occasion of his leaving them to assume the same important office in connection with the Free Church Total Abstinence Society. ARCHIBALD LIVINGSTONE, Esq., presided. He was supported by Mr. Ferguson, the guest of the evening, and several other staunch friends of the cause. After tea, the chairman rose, and in a neat address presented Mr. Ferguson with a watch, chain, and key, bearing the following inscription:—"Presented to Mr. Peter Ferguson, by a few friends, in token of their esteem for the valuable services rendered by him as agent of the Gorbals Total Abstinence Society. 17th July, 1850." The interest of the meeting was maintained till a late hour.

FALKIRK.

On Friday, the 12th July, the juvenile abstainers, to the number of about 300, under the guidance of the committee of the adult society, had a pleasure excursion to the policies of Major Chalmers, of Larbert-house, who, in the most kind and obliging manner, threw open his grounds, for the gratification of the young. After a short tour through the grounds, the procession assembled in front of the house, where they were kindly welcomed by Major Chalmers and family, with a number of friends, including Colonel Dundas and son. After partaking of refreshments, and singing some of their temperance melodies, a neat and appropriate address was delivered by the colonel, when they again formed in procession and visited the garden and hot-houses, and, highly gratified with the sight and the attention they had received, they returned to town in excellent spirits. Amongst the various devices got up for the occasion was one which attracted special attention; it was a very neat figure of Father Mathew, holding a hammer in one hand, and the remains of a shattered whisky-bottle in the other. A soiree was held in the evening in Mr. Scott's Temperance Hall, which was numerously attended, and went off with great spirit—all parties returning highly gratified with the day's proceedings.

BLACKQUARRY AND SPRINGBANK.

On Friday evening, July 19, a social meeting of the members and friends of the Juvenile Abstinence Society was held in the Mechanics'-hall, Fergusson-street; Mr. JAS. MORTON, president, in the chair. Addresses were delivered by Messrs. Alex. McCrae, Thomas Brown, James Mitchell, Thomas Reid, and other distinguished promoters of the temperance reformation among the young. The addresses were interspersed with temperance melodies, sung in good taste by the children.

RECENT PUBLICATION.

THE WORKING CLASSES OF GREAT BRITAIN; their present Condition, and the Means of their Improvement and Elevation. PRIZE ESSAY. By the Rev. SAMUEL GREEN, A.B. London: John Snow.

THE circumstances which originated this Essay are briefly stated in the Preface. A prize of fifty pounds having been offered by Mr. JOHN CASSELL for the best Essay on the above subject, forty-eight essays were submitted for competition, the adjudicators being the Rev. T. Spencer, A.M.; Edward Miall, Esq.; and Edward Swaine, Esq.; who, after completing their examination, adjudged the prize to the Rev. S. G. Green, of Taunton, the author of the volume.

The Essay has been looked for with much interest, the subject in itself being so important to the industrial classes. Their present condition, the means hitherto employed for their improvement, and the suggestion of practical remedial measures demanded attention; and in the volume before us the subject is discussed with manifest ability, abounding with counsel admirably adapted to promote the social elevation of the people.

It will be necessary to do little more than present a short analysis of the contents.

The opening pages dwell chiefly on the necessity of a working class, the real nature of their position, as one of subordination, not inferiority. The past and present condition of the labouring population exhibits the inconveniences of the transition state, and the mutual repulsion and strife consequent upon all great changes. These preliminary remarks are followed by a classification of industrial occupations—the agricultural labourer, the country-town artisan, and the factory labourer; and then are furnished some valuable particulars relating to the moral and physical condition of each class.

The chief portion of the work is devoted to an examination of the machinery now in operation for bettering the condition of the working man: the School, the Church, and the Press.

Hints to working people usefully conclude the Essay. The advantages of Friendly and Insurance Societies, and Provident Associations, are brought forward and ably enforced.

A principal subject, suggested by the generous donor of the prize, the Temperance Movement—its adaptation as a remedy for the evils of intemperance, the influence of the total abstinence principle to improve the condition of the masses, &c., has not been overlooked by the author. Under the catalogue of Church Agencies we find some well-expressed sentiments. With regard to the Temperance Movement, Mr. Green says:

“It is a crusade against a vice to which the labouring classes are especially exposed, and of which the extent and ravages among this portion of the community are confessedly most fearful. The means of reformation are, first, a simple appeal to the drunkard himself, founded on the fact, that, in the total relinquishment of the means of his undoing lies his great, if not his only security; and urged by the consideration that neither health, strength, nor real comfort, is to be attained by the use, in however small a degree, of intoxicating beverages. This latter fact again is felt most fully to sanction an appeal to moderate drinkers, also to renounce the use of these liquors; partly that they may be preserved from the temptation to excess, but principally for the sake of presenting that great MORAL EXAMPLE, without which we can scarcely have to succeed in inducing the inebriate to abstain. Such, in a few words, is ‘Teetotalism,’ a moral remedy for a moral evil.”

Mr. Green speaks of the general apathy with which the Christian Church in this country has regarded the Temperance Movement; how few advocates it has found in the pulpit, and how, sometimes, it has been received as in direct hostility to the truths of the Gospel. He alludes to the startling allegation brought in 1847 by the Southern Division of the Evangelical Alliance, concerning the connection between Infidelity and Teetotalism.

Speaking of this matter, he says:

“Morality will not disown religion, until the religious neglect to inculcate morality. If Christians will not accept Teetotalism as an ally, it will be exalted as a rival. True, the result will be disappointment to the advocates, and, eventually, overthrow to the cause; for there is but ONE power that can truly regenerate mankind. The church, however, will have too late most bitterly to reflect that a great means of usefulness placed within its reach had been neglected and thrown away.”

With most of this we cordially agree; perhaps if more of the volume had been devoted to a clear statement of the Total Abstinence question, its utility might have been increased; but for what there is, we thank the author, earnestly desiring the realization of his own words: “The alliance of Teetotalism with religion.”

A valuable Appendix has been added, containing the statistics of labour and remuneration in the various employments of town and country life. The consequences of insufficient wages are pointed out in the desecration of the Sabbath, theft, and immorality, the miseries of the low lodging-houses, and the temptations to juvenile depravity. In these pages the non-necessity of intoxicating drinks to support strength under severe toil is ably sustained by facts. Statements made by ballasters and coal-whippers, whose employment is perhaps the most trying and exhausting of all departments of labour, are adduced to show that food only can give real strength to the frame, and while such testimony against inebriating stimulants is at once conclusive, evidence concerning branches of industry in which men are compelled by the fear of losing their future chance of employment, to spend a large portion of their earnings in drink, is brought forward to exhibit the evils of the present system. The connection necessarily attendant upon such a state of things—the relation between intemperance, crime, and poverty, is shown by the testimony of the best authorities, men, who, from long experience, are competent to form a just opinion.

Altogether this is a valuable book, such as the necessity demanded. Mr. Green's Essay displays much intelligence and discrimination, fair and candid in its discussion of relative claims and duties, clear in its statement of principles; and the Appendix (for the compilation of which we are indebted to the munificent donor of the Prize), is replete with instructive information, calculated to awaken a spirit of high and earnest philanthropy.

We trust the volume will be extensively circulated. We recommend it to the serious perusal of our friends. It is issued at a cheap rate, and in an elegant form; and its subject appeals to all friends of the people, inculcating something better than the worn-out theory, that man was born to be wretched and die; suggesting remedies worthy of careful attention—remedies which, if carried out, would produce a change that would be felt by the majority of the people in happy homes, enlightened minds, and consistent and useful conduct.

Advertisements, and articles intended for insertion, should be addressed to the Editor, 335, Strand, London; also, all orders for the Stamped Edition, with remittance for the amount, in postage-stamps, or Post-office orders, to John Cassell, as above.

The TEETOTAL TIMES AND ESSAYIST may be had of B. L. Green, 62, Paternoster-row, London; Ward, 54, do.; Abel Heywood, Manchester; Kershaw, Leeds; Mezies, Edinburgh; Gallie, Glasgow; and all Booksellers.

THE IMPORTANCE OF JUVENILE TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES.

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

It is an old saying, that "you may bend even the oak while it is young." We have in our garden two of the above-mentioned trees, one of them fifty years old, and the other about half-a-dozen. The elder has a large erect trunk, and could not be bent by any apparatus we possess; and, indeed, if we could command sufficient mechanical power, there is no doubt but its body would sooner break than bend. But, the other day, we tried our skill with its younger brother, and actually bent it round into a perfect circle, and now its top is growing erect, as usual, only that it is curved so as to form a coil, like that of a serpent, in the middle. If allowed to remain and grow for a century, it will present a remarkable illustration of the saying with which we commenced this paper.

It is often said that human nature is the most untractable thing in the world; and so it is, if you do not begin soon enough; but that we can train it to almost anything, if we commence at the cradle, is proved by the history of all nations. Hindooism, Buddhism, Mohammedanism, Roman Catholicism, or Protestantism, are not innate ideas born in us, but are received from our parents and instructors. And the same may be said of most of our tastes. Not a few of them are the result of circumstances. A child accustomed to the bread-fruit tree of the South Sea Islands, would prefer a meal of that to the most sumptuous viands of Old England; while the solid food of Britain is preferred by its inhabitants to the lighter dishes of the Continent. Hence it was that the Israelites, who had been born and bred in Egypt, longed for the melons, the flesh-pots, the onions, and the garlic, which they had eaten in the house of bondage; while it is probable that their children, who had never tasted anything but manna, cared little about any other provision. The Scripture recognizes the effect of early education when it asks, "Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? Then may ye, who have been accustomed to do evil, learn to do well?" and when it also gives the command, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."

These remarks bear powerfully on the importance of a teetotal education, and the advantages of Juvenile Societies. The taste for strong drinks is not natural, but acquired; for you never saw a child which did not make a wry face when these poisons were first placed to its lips. It smiled, and smacked its mouth when it received the provision which nature intended, and thus its very palate and features gave the most valuable hints to its parents respecting its diet. It is in our power to have a sober or a drunken country. If we vitiate the tastes of our children, fire them with the stimulus of alcohol, and make them dependent upon wine, spirits, and beer for animal excitement, we do much towards making them fond of these liquors, and, in hundreds of cases, shall render them drunkards. Their palates, their depressed minds, their earliest and liveliest emotions and associations will attach them to the bottle. On the contrary, if they never touch these poisons, if from infancy they are taught to loathe them, to observe their baneful character and destructive influence on others, we may indulge the hope that the principle of true temperance will take deep root in their hearts, and become a ruling motive in their future lives.

It is well to persuade children to commit themselves to the profession, practice, and defence of noble sentiments early. Thousands are mere namby-pamby people all their days, because they never heard that they had any mental or moral power of their own. They are carried about by every wind of doctrine, and are almost as destitute of intellectual courage, at sixty years old, as they were when they were only six. On the other hand boys and girls who learn, at an early age, that they can understand a truth, can defend it, contend for it, and reduce it to practice, will not be "reeds shaken of the wind" when they come to years of maturity.

In the neighbourhood of the writer a Juvenile Teetotal Society was formed not long ago. It was determined to let everything be managed by the youths themselves. There was a juvenile committee, a juvenile secretary; and, at their quarterly tea-meetings, everything was arranged and managed by the boys and girls. They sold the tickets, prepared the tables (whether in-door or out), provided the tea, and, at the repast, the girls presided and the boys waited at table; and though, on one occasion, four hundred sat down to tea, yet all was conducted with the utmost order. At the public meeting which followed a boy presided in the chair, another opened the meeting with prayer, and half-a-dozen others delivered speeches which would have done no discredit to any adult assembly in the country. At the conclusion a gentleman addressed the audience, and the people went away highly delighted. On one occasion, in June last, the Saxhorn band of Mr. Shapcott, and his seven sons, was engaged by these youths; not less than a thousand people attended; and the inhabitants declared that the afternoon and evening was one of the happiest that had ever been enjoyed in the village. There was everything to please, and nothing to corrupt. The pleasure was innocent, and therefore real and exquisite; and was not a little heightened by the hope that it held out for the future respecting the rising generation.

Not the least advantage of this commencement was, that the thing spread. Several juvenile societies around sprang out of the one formed at Ebley; and all of them are now vying with each other in spreading the principles of Temperance. One of them is called "THE BAND OF HOPE;" and well it may receive that designation, because, in these youthful advocates and propagators of Total Abstinence, we have a glorious prospect for the future. Yes! a brighter scene dawns from these operations of the young people than has been dreamt of for centuries. It is true we have Sunday-schools and Day-schools; we have Missionary, Bible, and Tract Societies; we have Provident, Building, Freehold, and Funeral Clubs; we have cheap books; philanthropic Brothers and Sisters of Mercy, and faithful Preachers of the Gospel; but still our hearts, as parents, are sorrowful, as we look at our children, and think of the future. Not that we doubt the efficacy of the gospel, or the faithfulness of JEHOVAH'S promises; but, alas! there is an enemy among us. Strong drink is one of our most powerful antagonists, for it has, again and again, counteracted all our exertions, and blasted all our hopes. Ministers of the sanctuary have fallen as stars from heaven, and the dragon that cast them down was ALCOHOL; church members are dismissed in great numbers, annually, because of their indulgence in liquor; literary, scientific, and philanthropic individuals have been disgraced for ever by these beverages; commercial men have been rendered bankrupts; and princely fortunes have been worse than wasted on these poisons; and so long as they are used, what hope have we for posterity? Unless these destructive drinks are swept away, our children may be a pest to themselves, and a bane to the world. But let them be abandoned and abolished, and we may then close our eyes in peace respecting the next generation. It is, therefore, a most solemn duty incumbent upon parents, patriots, and, indeed, all who have at heart the permanent prosperity of our sons and daughters, to unite with the friends of Total Abstinence in staying so desolating a plague, and especially in encouraging Juvenile Temperance Societies, and avoiding everything, in word and deed, which might, in any way, seduce these young disciples from their steadfastness.

Our juvenile societies will do wonders in calling forth a host of agents who will be capable of conducting, with vigour, any benevolent, philanthropic, or patriotic society, which the age may require. Nothing so much at present keeps back our various institutions for the benefit of our country and the world, as the want of zealous and efficient labourers. In many even of our large towns, almost all that is effected is done by a few individuals. Numbers have an impression that they can do nothing, except subscribe a few pence or shillings; and this diffidence and inactivity arise mainly from never having been accustomed to do anything for the general good. Our Juvenile Teetotal Societies will raise up a new race of citizens, who will be ready for every good work, and in whom we may place the utmost confidence, because they will neither have their reason seduced, their passions inflamed, nor their morals corrupted by intoxicating beverages. Not long since it was dangerous to have an association either for pleasure or profit, because the flagon was deemed a necessary accompaniment, and almost every evil arose from its use; but hereafter, if we nourish our children in the principles of Total Abstinence, we may assemble, combine, and enjoy social intercourse, without fear of any evil consequences.

We have found our juvenile teetotalers our most active agents in the cause of mutual improvement and the diffusion of information on Temperance. They have hired lecturers on useful subjects, have formed a Reading Society of their own, and distribute tracts on Total Abstinence from house to house. And they have found much encouragement; for many persons, who would have rejected other missionaries, have admitted the lads, and admired their zeal. We have also been delighted to see parents come forward in consequence of the activity of their children. They have felt that it would be the worst of cruelty to tempt their offspring to drink, or induce them to break their pledge. We have known several cases in which the cup has been banished from the table, that it might not be a snare to the young people. "I abstain for the sake of my sons and daughters," said a wealthy father to me the other day. "I have seen," added he, "so many ruined, so many wealthy families brought to the parish, by these liquors, that my only hope for my children's prosperity is in Total Abstinence." "Visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generations," is one of the most solemn texts in the Word of God, and signifies, not that the children shall be punished for the sins of their parents, but that the evil conduct of the latter will lead their children astray, and thus cover them with guilt. Everywhere multitudes of examples illustrate the force of the passage, and many parents begin to feel their power, and especially so where the children have taken the lead in the Temperance cause. It would be inexpressibly cruel and hard-hearted for a stranger to tempt these youths to drink, more so still for the father and mother to be the seducers, and worst of all for professors of the gospel to be guilty of this crime.

Not only relatives, but adult neighbours, have been reclaimed by these youthful advocates, and we feel persuaded that one of the most important movements that could be made in our day would be the establishment everywhere of Juvenile Total Abstinence Societies. It would be training the young in the way they should go as to Temperance, and would also educate a noble band of agents to work hereafter in all our patriotic, liberal, philanthropic, and religious societies.

PREJUDICE.

On glancing at the heading of this article, my reader may ejaculate—psha! what have I to do with prejudice? Nothing, of course; but there can be no harm in looking whether you do not hold some in stock notwithstanding. At each returning period, the man of merchandize goes through the process of examining his possessions, both as to amount and quality, that he may calculate his position, and frame his future motions in concord with the knowledge thus acquired. What should hinder us from turning over, in like method, our several mental stores—namely, our opinions; retaining, with deserving care, such as prove worthy, and scattering to the winds such as are valueless.

Assuming that whatever obstructs progress in true knowledge, and impedes our rising in the scale of being, should be considered with a view to its removal, we may advisedly take up our hinted topic.

PREJUDICE denotes judgment, assumed and maintained, without a proper survey of the ground or groundlessness on which it rests; proceeding frequently from a jumble of opinions, culled in haste—and, consequently, often more erroneous than just. Whether favourable or adverse, prejudice is the copious source of incalculable mischief, for over our discerning faculties it throws a distorting veil, through whose medium objects of beauty and of moment are represented as hideous and insignificant, while things unseemly and unimportant appear in different guise. Rational powers are graciously bestowed that we may, in our earthly pilgrimage, move along according to their precepts and the dictates of our God; and aught that calls for judgment should be candidly regarded with a resolute intention of following out the decision formed, thereby not opposing the aggrandizement of the soul. It is an old observation, that "men readily believe what they wish to be true;" but to convince or undeceive an individual against his will, or interest, presents a formidable task.

In childhood we imbibe, almost passively, the sentiments of those around us, to whom, and to our undrilled senses, we must, for some time, be subservient. Strange dogmas, thus, at an unguarded age, find easy entrance into the mind, and, when unexpelled, exercise despotic rule with little intermission till life's close. Soon, however, reason, glow-worm like before, begins to glimmer more, and truth to be discovered from falsity; but whether this development goes on and prospers is greatly dependent on the line of conduct that may be pursued. The plastic faculties will not attain to vigour, or prove the glorious boons they were designed, without assiduous culture. The mind, like the body, must be fed and exercised, or nature languishes; yet the former, amid its greater and more common sufferings, clamours less. To illustrate man's earthly preference, let his limbs be straitly bound with cords, or pierced with cold, and he writhes to be relieved; but let his mind be girt with blighting prejudice, or stung with damning error, and he rarely feels sufficiently aggrieved to bethink him of a sanitary investigation. Howbeit, man was never intended, in senatorial dialect, to "pair off" with the lower animals; like them, administer to corporeal wants alone, during his few transient years, and dying, indicate no sign of future destiny. No; man is for other and more lofty end ushered into being, and with eternity before him, has eternal sympathies to cherish.

Impartiality of judgment all lay claim to, but the reign of self-delusion is extensive. Truth and error float on every side. Remembering the natural avidity with which the hungry mind indiscriminately seizes objects of repeated contact, it is of primary importance that man, when he perceives his rational principles shooting into practical vitality, should endeavour to remove noxious elements, and unceasingly consult its safety. Accordingly, we should, when undeceived in regard to the hollowness of one fondly-harboured notion, at once proceed to ransack our ideal magazine—and, with awakened reason's aid, attempt the classification of the whole. He who, in time, untiringly and prayerfully labours to establish reason's sway, and to emancipate himself from such prepossessions as are faulty, may, when the knell of time has rung, enter on the cloudless enjoyment of his reward. It is worthy of remembrance in this matter, that one acts with prejudice, or prejudices, when he limits his attention to one aspect or bearing of a question. It was prejudice of this kind which changed our once pure nature into pollution, and this once lovely world into a wilderness. Had our progenitors coupled in their minds the Creator's warning with the tempter's counsel, the covenant would not have been broken, nor would Christ have died. When the "Man of Sorrows" issued his gracious invitations to the weak and wandering, the proud rejoinder rang along the ranks of bigotry—"Can any good proceed from Nazareth?" Would disciples descant on the wonders of redeeming love, and reason with gainsayers, the contemptuous scribe would answer—"To your nets and avocations, ye dabblers in things abstruse, and world-disturbers!" Let the philosopher of Florence announce our earth as a locomotive, straightway the minions of the Inquisition escort him to a dungeon. Ponderous, indeed, would that volume require to be which could comprise a thousandth part of prejudice's doings down to the present hour. What sufferings and bloodsheddings—to say nothing of estrangements. Unless man enlarge his knowledge, and employ his discriminating powers, he cannot, with any propriety, expect even the partial eradication of those baneful theories, and modes of action, which credulous youth may have planted in his mind, and circumscribed society, or placid ignorance, tended to consolidate. Each individual should account it his salvation—interested duty to devise the annihilation of all biassed feeling; but little anxiety, on this point, seems to be entertained, and men, in general, resent, with warmth, all treading upon their corns, whether physical or mental.

He who is deeply imbued with prejudice, abides, in his own eyes, pre-eminently wise—largely exempted from the common fallibility of man, and imagines no opinions, save his own, worth recording in the archives of unsullied truth. The fabled frog thought that it equaled the stately ox in magnitude; and the serf of prejudice conceives himself the illustrious wielder of an intellectual giant's power. The daw, enrobed in borrowed plumes of splendour, viewed with disdain its kindred race; and the man arrayed in haughty prejudice, looks down with scorn upon his brother-man.

While decrying self-conceit, let me not be understood as touching that divinely-ordered principle of self-respect, which, not unfrequently, appears the chief upholder of external decency. In proof of this, how often do we see an individual, in whom self-esteem is, by any means, for a season blunted, unblushingly commit deeds from which, at other moments, he would indignantly recoil! No, it is that ignorant, mulish, self-complacency, whose possessor the voice of inspiration explicitly declares to be in a state more hopeless than a fool, which I assail. A recent sporting work, on Africa, details how the hunter, with questionable humanity, experimented on a disabled elephant to discover the most vulnerable or mortal part; but shot after shot entered before effecting a death-wound; so the prejudiced intellect may be plied with argument after argument, fact upon fact, without its warrings giving way. "Celestials" will not abandon opium-eating, nor Britons renounce drum-drinking, all at once; one or two self-poisoning generations must depart, ere the national mind can be delivered from hereditary bondage, and the state diverted from its nefarious system of sot-making by special licence.

Teeming with significance is the frequently repeated stricture—"he stands in his own light." I remember meeting, several years ago, an instructive adventure of a persevering Scot in modern Babylon. Entering the mart of a merchant prince, and depositing his bale of soft wares, he asked permission to exhibit the contents, but a pert "counter-jumper," charged with prejudice, grumbled a refusal, and, on his remonstrating, flung his head-gear to the street. Coolly wringing out the moisture, the homely manufacturer returned, and, with a forgiving smile, expressed his confidence that a look of his commodities would be taken now. The master, having silently observed what had occurred, at length came forward to declare his willingness, and finding, on inspection, several samples exactly suited to his needs, opened forthwith a correspondence which became extensive and remunerating. Perhaps, reader, your tendering advice from a belief in its excellence and adaptation, may bring you numerous rebuffs, but, supported by purity of aim, persevere; "in the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand." For a "word fitly spoken," men may yet apply to you the prophetic benediction on the sower beside all waters. The upspringing of emitted truth may be here concealed, but rest assured that, if even a cup of water is recorded in the heavenly register, no endeavour, however humble, to direct the erring, can be allowed to pass into oblivion; the counsellor and the counselled may rejoice together, while the pervertor and his victim must bewail.

Fallacious prejudice, we have seen, has, almost since creation's dawn, continued to approve itself the enemy of God and the scourge of man, and from its contorting whatever might conduce to the former's glory and the latter's happiness, may be aptly named—Satan's Mirror. Such being palpably the case, each should entreat the Spirit of Wisdom, from on high, to assist in the dispersion of that film of prejudice which depraves his bodily and mental eye, and in the displacement of that brutish ignorance which clogs the soul. And in this ennobling work, let no one fail to come within the influences of the Book of Life:—

"A glory gilds the sacred page,
Majestic as the Sun;
A light it gives to ev'ry age—
It gives and borrows none."

Thus sedulously unthinking, or discarding all opinions that will not stand the test—listening with judicial wakefulness to whatever may be adduced on either side, and fostering no inordinate veneration for what is simply ancient, we shall grow in healthful knowledge, diminish our liability to error, and, with becomingness, fulfil our destiny.

SELF-IMPOSED TAXATION.

Mr. G. R. Porter, who is known to the public by his valuable work on the Progress of the Nation, has submitted to the British Association for the Advancement of Science a valuable paper on "The Self-Imposed Taxation of the Working Classes." The writer refers, of course, to that self-imposed taxation which consists in the use of articles from which we could very well abstain, and which are of no use to us either bodily or intellectually. The particular instances were the consumption of ardent spirits, beer and tobacco; the yearly expenditure of which articles, in the United Kingdom, amounts to a sum which must appear perfectly fabulous until the reasonableness of the result be shown by means of calculations adopted and formed on good authority. The quantity of spirits of home production consumed in 1849 within the kingdom was, in England, 9,053,676 imperial gallons; Scotland, 6,935,003 imperial gallons; Ireland, 6,973,333 imperial gallons: together, 22,962,012 imperial gallons. The duty upon which quantity amounted to £5,793,381. The wholesale cost, including the duty, would probably amount to about £8,000,000, a sum which would, however, be very far short of that paid by the consumers. It has been given as the opinion of several distillers, that the consumer pays for every gallon of spirits used three times the amount of the duty. Assuming this estimate, it would appear that the cost of British and Irish distilled spirits to the people of England, Scotland, and Ireland, respectively, in 1849, was £17,381,643, thus divided:—England, £8,838,768; Scotland, £5,369,868; Ireland, £3,173,007; total, £17,381,643. The consumption of rum in 1849 amounted to 3,044,758 imperial gallons, the duty paid on which was £1,142,855. Making the same calculation, the expenditure for this kind of spirit will reach £3,428,565, making the whole outlay of the people for these two descriptions of ardent spirits £20,810,208, thus locally divided:—England, £8,205,242; Scotland, £6,285,114; Ireland, £6,319,852; making a total of £20,810,208. If we assume that the population of the three divisions of the United Kingdom was the same in 1849 as it was found to be at the enumeration of 1841, the consumption per head in the year was—In England, 0.569 gallons; Scotland, 2.647 gallons; Ireland, 0.853 gallons. These proportions are such as would fall to the share of each man, woman, and child throughout the land; but it must be evident that many, and especially the women and children, can count for very little in the calculation, if, indeed, they should not be wholly discarded from it. Dividing the quantity consumed by the adult males as they were ascertained in 1841, the following portions would fall to the share of each:—In England 2.330 gallons, or about 2½ gallons; in Scotland 11.168 gallons, or about 11 1/6 gallons; in Ireland 3.469 gallons, or about 3½ gallons. Brandy is for the most part drunk by persons not of the working class, as that term is generally, but somewhat arbitrarily, understood. The quantity consumed in 1849 was 2,187,500 imperial gallons, the first or wholesale cost of which was about £546,875; and the duty paid amounted to £1,640,282: together £2,187,157. If we assume that each gallon costs, on the average, to the consumers, 30s. or 50s. per cent. advance upon the import cost and duty, this would exhibit an expenditure for brandy of £3,281,250, which, added to the sum formerly stated, gives a total expenditure within the year for ardent spirits of the enormous sum of £24,091,458. The number of bushels of malt subjected to duty in 1849 was 37,999,032, or 4,749,879 quarters; but of this quantity only 3,719,145 quarters is set down as having been used by licensed brewers. Of the remaining 1,010,734 quarters, the greater part was, no doubt, used by private families, and the remainder was worked up by the distillers. In order to be on the side of moderation, let us assume that only the quantity (3,719,145 quarters) used in licensed breweries was employed in making beer, and we shall find, upon the usual calculation of 3½ barrels of beer, of average quality and strength, as the product of each quarter of malt, that the number of gallons brewed from the above-mentioned quantity was 435,139,965. Assuming the price to be 1s. 2d. per gallon, we arrive at the sum of £25,383,105 annually spent by the population of this kingdom, and chiefly by the labouring portion, for beer.

It is shown by a statement recently presented to the House of Commons, that the number of persons who are engaged as producers and distributors of beer in England and Wales is as follows:—Brewers, 2,507; Victuallers, 88,496; Persons licensed to keep beer-houses, 38,070. Total, 129,073. The quantity of manufactured tobacco upon which duty was paid in 1849 was 27,480,621 lb., and of manufactured tobacco and snuff, 205,066 lb.; yielding a revenue of £4,408,017 14s. 11d. The cost to the consumers generally will be as follows:—26,862,308 lb. of tobacco, at 4s. per lb., £5,372,451; 5,537,344 lb. snuff, at 6s. 8d., £1,845,781; 549,612 lb. English-made cigars, at 9s., £247,326. Total for British manufactured, £7,465,567; 205,066 foreign manufactured, at 12s., £123,040. Total value as paid by consumers, £7,588,607.

If it be conceded that the sums here brought forward are justified by the facts and calculations on which they are based, it would appear that the people, and chiefly the working classes of England, Scotland, and Ireland, voluntarily tax themselves for the enjoyment of only three articles, neither of which is of any absolute necessity, to the following amount:—British and Colonial spirits, £20,810,208; brandy, £3,281,250; total of spirits, £24,091,458. Beer of all kinds, exclusive of that brewed in private families, £25,383,165. Tobacco and snuff, £7,588,607; together, £57,063,230. At the beginning of this paper it was remarked that the amount of money expended upon articles which, like spirits, beer, and tobacco, are not of first necessity, forms a measure of the prosperity of the nation and of the ability of the community to bear those national burthens which cannot be avoided,—a remark the justice of which hardly admits of question; but it would by no means follow that the diminished use of the three articles named would afford proof in itself of lessened means of comfort on the part of the working people, and of diminished prosperity in the nation generally. On the contrary, if it were seen that, as respects gin and whisky, the two and one-third gallons consumed in the year in England, the eleven and one-sixth gallons so consumed in Scotland, and the three and a-half gallons consumed in Ireland, by each adult male, were diminished to one-half those proportions, while a larger sale should be effected of sugar, of tea, of articles of decent clothing, and of other matters whereof the females and children should be partakers, there can be no disputing about the advantageous nature of the change, and but little ground for asserting that the general sum of prosperity were lessened. The probability, on the contrary, is, that money thus expended would afford greater means for employment throughout the country in other branches of industry, and thus open additional sources of prosperity to all. There is one consideration arising out of this view of the subject which is of a painful character, and which, if it were hopeless of cure, would be most disheartening to all who desire that the moral progress of the people should advance at least an equal pace with their physical progress—it is, that among the working classes so very large a portion of the earnings of the male head of the family is devoted by him to his personal and sensual gratifications. It has been computed that, among those whose earnings are from 10s. to 15s. weekly, at least one-half is spent by the man upon objects in which the other members of the family have no share. Among artisans, earning from 20s. to 30s. weekly, it is said that at least one-third of the amount is in many cases thus selfishly devoted. That this state of things need not be, and that, if the people generally were better instructed as regards their social duties, it would not be, may safely be inferred from the fact that it is rarely, if ever, found to exist in the numerous cases where earnings not greater than those of the artisan class are all that are gained by the head of the family when employed upon matters where education is necessary. Take even the case of a clerk, with a salary of £80 a year, a small fraction beyond 30s. a week, and it would be considered quite exceptional, if it were found that anything approaching to a fourth part of the earnings were spent upon objects in which the wife and children should have no share. The peer, the mercant, the clerk, the artisan, and the labourer, are all of the same nature, born with the same propensities, and subject to the like influences. It is true they are placed in very different circumstances—the chief difference being that of their early training—one, happily, which it is quite possible, in some degree, to remedy, and that by means which would, in many ways, add to the sum of the nation's prosperity and respectability.

MALT MACHINERY versus THE CHRISTIAN SABBATH.

THE following letter, by an Inland Revenue Officer, has been forwarded to us by Mr. T. B. Smithies, at whose request it was drawn up. It contains statements which will be new to many of our readers, and shows plainly that every drinker of malt liquor is implicated in Sabbath desecration:—

"My dear Sir,—I have much pleasure in furnishing you, as requested, with a few particulars on a subject on which I know you feel deeply interested.

"It is a very gratifying fact to every lover of the holy Sabbath, that the Christian public is manifesting such a lively concern in reference to Sabbath labour in connexion with the Post-office. But is it not somewhat strange, that whilst so much sympathy is generously and justly evinced on behalf of Post-office clerks, another numerous and equally respectable and responsible class of government servants is altogether overlooked? I refer to Excise (or Inland Revenue) officers. This, especially with reference to the public advocates for the better observance of the Lord's-day, has been to me, for some years past, a matter of surprise. How is it to be accounted for? Is it because this class of persons have less reverence and love for, and less need of, the Christian Sabbath, than their fellow-servants of the Post-office? I have no hesitation in saying, decidedly not. On the contrary, they would greatly rejoice at being freed from obligation to Sabbath labour, which is felt, by very many of them, to be an oppressive and galling burden upon the conscience, and necessarily pernicious to the moral and religious feelings.

"This apparent inconsistency on the part of the Christian public is, perhaps, partly attributable to their want of information upon the subject. They are probably unacquainted with the fact, that there are about three thousand Excise (or Inland Revenue) officers scattered over the United Kingdom, every one of whom is obliged to visit and survey every malt-house in his residence and under his survey, once at least every Sabbath, when any malt is being manufactured therein; and frequently twice or more, according to the stage of operation then in process. Many officers are under the necessity of frequently travelling considerable distances on the Sabbath, to visit and survey malt-houses situated out of their residences, and in villages several miles apart from each other.

"You will, doubtless, remember, that a few years ago, a certain officer of Excise, then residing within a hundred miles of York Minster, became connected with a large and popular Sunday-school, well known to yourself. At the time of his doing so, the nature of his business did not necessarily involve Sabbath-labour. But, subsequently, certain alterations were made, by which there was placed under his survey, amongst other things, a malt-house, which, somewhat singularly, belonged to two of the superintendents of the Sunday-school in which he himself was the conductor of a class of senior youths. Sabbath-labour now became indispensable to this Sunday-school teacher. The malt-house of these two superintendents must be visited and surveyed by him, once or more, every Sabbath. Often, after accompanying the school to its usual place of worship, has he, with permission of the respective superintendent for the day, repaired to the Excise-office, in an adjacent street, to make the necessary entries concerning the malt-house, returning before or during the opening service. Or, otherwise, he has performed this necessary part of his duties at the close of the service. I refer to this merely as an instance which has fallen under your own observation.

"Sabbath-labour, in connexion with the manufacture of malt, is not only involved in its survey, but is indispensable to its accomplishment. It would be difficult to give an exact description of the process of manufacture, as it varies considerably, according to the mode adopted, and the state of the weather. The following sketch, however, may be regarded as an average specimen, and will give you some idea of the nature and amount of Sabbath-labour required in the manufacture of an article so extensively patronized by the religious public!

"The almost universal practice of malsters is to commence a fresh operation every fourth day; and as the grain used in each operation is legally required, in the first place, to be steeped in water at least forty hours, and can only be begun to be so steeped during certain hours of the day, and subsequently can be emptied from the cistern only during certain hours of the day, it is evident that, on two days of every four, there will be either a steeping or an emptying of the cistern, and, consequently, that either one or the other will frequently occur on the Sabbath. Part of the labour of steeping may be avoided on the Sabbath, by either running the corn, or pumping the water into the cistern on the previous day. The grain used in each steeping is required to be manufactured separately; and during such process, from the time of being emptied from the cistern to being placed on the kiln, is termed a floor. There are generally three or four floors in consecutive stages of manufacture, spread out from two or three, to five or six inches in depth, all of which require to be turned over, or ploughed (a partial turning), from time to time, varying in frequency, according to circumstances, especially in reference to the weather—say from one or two to four or five times each day. The last part of the process of manufacture, is drying on the kiln. A floor is placed on the kiln, and dried off, either whole or in two or more parts. During the time it is on the kiln, it will require occasional turnings, or ploughings—say two or more each day. The loading and unloading of the kiln on the Sabbath, might generally be avoided, but is seldom done. Steeping and emptying the cistern on the Sabbath might be avoided, but either of them would interfere very materially with the business, and would entail the entire loss of a day. Cases of this kind are of very rare occurrence. Generally speaking, the amount of labour performed on the Sabbath, in manufacturing malt, is but very little less, if any, than on any other day; and, under no circumstances whatever, is malt made without a very considerable amount of Sabbath labour.

It is, therefore, undeniably, a question of deep and individual importance, whether a religious professor can consistently and conscientiously countenance either the manufacture or the use of an article, the making of which necessarily involves so large an amount of Sabbath-labour, and which is declared by the most eminent medical authorities to be not necessary to health, and the customary use of which is continually producing such a fearful mass of wretchedness, crime, and sin.

I am, my dear Sir, yours very truly.

GEORGE BUDD.

INTEMPERATE PARENTS AND IDIOTIC CHILDREN.

The following is extracted from the Journal of Psychological Medicine and Mental Pathology, edited by Dr. Winslow. It is the result of an inquiry into the percentage of 350 idiots in certain asylums:—

The habits of the parents of 300 of the idiots were learned, and 145 (nearly one half) are reported as "known to be habitual drunkards." Such parents transmit a weak and a lax constitution to their children, who are consequently, "deficient in bodily and vital energy, and predisposed, by their very organization, to have cravings for alcoholic stimulants." Many of these children are feeble, and live irregularly. Having a lower vitality, they feel the want of some stimulation. If they pursue the course of their fathers, which they have more temptation to follow and less power to avoid than the children of the temperate, they add to their hereditary weakness, and increase the tendency to idiosyncrasy in their constitution; and this they leave to their children after them. The parents of one case No. 62 were drunkards, and had seven idiotic children.

BE FIRM!—The wind and the waves may beat against a rock planted in a troubled sea, but it remains unmoved. Be you like that rock, young man. Vice may entice, and the song and the cup may invite. Beware—stand firmly at your post. There is glory in the thought that you have resisted temptation and conquered. Your bright example will be to the world what the lighthouse is to the mariner upon the sea-shore: it may guide hundreds to the port of virtue and safety.

THE TEMPERANCE REFORMATION. GREAT MOVEMENT FOR 1850-1851.

It must, it is presumed, be acknowledged, that among the means employed for the dissemination of important principles and the advancement of great objects, none have proved more effectual than a succession of demonstration meetings in the most conspicuous and commodious places that can be secured, such, for instance, in the metropolis, as Exeter-hall or Drury-lane Theatre. Not only has London been powerfully operated upon by such meetings, but by the reports of them, circulated through the medium of the press, the public mind throughout the kingdom has been instructed and influenced, and provincial bodies have been roused to corresponding exertions.

Amongst the great movements of the present day which are designed to promote the elevation of the industrial classes, and the general prosperity of the nation, the Temperance Movement is entitled to considerable prominence. Hence, the Committee who conducted the series of Temperance Meetings held in Exeter-hall during the months of October, November, and December, in 1849, and January, February, and March of the present year, encouraged by the great success of that effort, the deep interest created in the public mind, and the zeal excited and enlarged among Teetotalers, not only in the metropolis, but throughout the kingdom, have determined upon a great and comprehensive scheme for advancing the Temperance cause during the ensuing winter.

It is proposed to commence with a large social gathering in the most commodious place that can be obtained for the purpose; to follow this up by a succession of meetings in Exeter-hall; and to conclude, if possible, with a conference of such of the friends and promoters of Temperance as may visit London in May next, during the season of the Exhibition of Arts and Industry; and a grand meeting in Drury-lane Theatre, or some other commodious place. In order that the good resulting from these meetings may be perpetuated and extended, it is proposed to secure, to the fullest possible extent, the aid of the public Press.

It will, however, be seen that, to accomplish these objects, adequate funds must be obtained. Of this the Committee are fully aware. They have, therefore, determined to exert themselves to obtain five hundred pounds for the purpose. The cordial and liberal spirit which prevailed at their preliminary meeting encourages them; and they believe that they have only to appeal to those who have the welfare of the population of this country at heart, to secure the full accomplishment of their wishes.

SELF-IMPOSED TAXATION.

IN this number we give an abstract of a very valuable paper, read by Mr. PORTER, author of the Progress of the Nation, before the last meeting of the British Association for the Promotion of Science. To the large bulk of our Teetotalers there is no novelty in the facts themselves, nor in the mode of putting them. For many years they have been reiterated from press and platform by our advocates. It is gratifying, however, to find that they should have been taken up by so high an authority, and one that cannot, from anything we know, be accused of entertaining an unfair bias in favour of Total Abstinence. On many occasions lately, and from many sources, we have derived encouragement in observing, that many of those who have hitherto kept aloof from the Temperance Movement have borne testimony—unsolicited and voluntary testimony—to its importance. To Mr. Porter we feel greatly indebted for having brought, in so striking a manner and with such practical illustrations, the great vice of our country before so influential a body. He merely glances at the moral evils, but the economical ones are equally painful. A nation that can go on spending upon one class of articles, and those administering only to a vicious appetite, a sum equal to the whole of its taxation, cannot reasonably complain nor feel rational surprise at any amount of misery or vice that may ensue.

✓ OPIUM! OPIUM! OPIUM!

To the Editor of The Teetotal Times.

DEAR SIR,—Efforts are being made to give currency to a statement, that THE CONSUMPTION OF OPIUM INCREASES WITH THE SPREAD OF TEETOTALISM. AS OUR cause can only be served by truth, I shall be obliged if you or your readers can furnish me with any information on the subject.

Can it be proved—

1. That any Teetotalers use opium?
2. That they have taken to use it by abandoning alcohol?
3. That in any particular district the use of opium has increased? or that there is any reason to suppose so?
4. Has such increase been contemporary with the advancement of Teetotalism in the same district?

Any facts, authenticated by the author's name and address, tending to throw light on this inquiry (whether appearing to favour or oppose the Temperance Reformation), will be thankfully received by, yours most truly,

ISAAC DIXON, Secretary.

JUVENILE TOTAL ABSTAINERS.

WE have heard with great satisfaction that there is some intimation during the season of the Exhibition in 1851 of engaging a SPECIAL TRAIN for the purpose of conveying a number of the juvenile abstainers of Edinburgh to London. One of our active friends has been in Scotland lately, and such an attempt was spoken of to him not only as desirable, but as one seriously under consideration; and inquiry was made whether a committee could not be formed in London to make arrangements for holding a large meeting of juvenile abstainers in EXETER-HALL. We should rejoice in giving our aid to such a movement. We have felt for some time that sufficient attention has not been paid in this country to the young. We sometimes are disposed to sit down in despair when we see how difficult it is to move those who have grown up and are confirmed in drinking habits, but our hopes are raised again when we turn to the young minds of England. It is to their exertions we must more especially look for future progress. The Exhibition of 1851 will be a favourable time for some effort in connection with the Temperance cause, that may be fairly termed national. Our Scottish friends, who have nobly taken the lead in the juvenile movement, will teach us by their presence a salutary lesson. Could not special trains be arranged from various places in this country? If such are decided upon, then it may be advisable to form committees in the several towns for the purpose of making all necessary arrangements, and, what is a very important matter, for instituting small savings' banks to receive the contributions of those who wish to visit the metropolis next year. A committee might be formed in London, which would have facilities for acquiring and communicating all necessary information.

A large meeting in Exeter-hall of young abstainers would be one of the most glorious sights that we could offer to the admiration of our country. We know that many other movements are spoken of amongst the Teetotalers; but this one is most important. Thousands of young persons throughout the country have imbibed the principles of Teetotalism, and are preparing to become teachers to their fellows. Such an occasion, when the world will have poured into the metropolis of Great Britain the highest works of art and the ripest fruits of science, is an appropriate one to gather those together who will have, when our labours are over, to take up the weapons we are no longer able to wield, and to use them against the slavery of strong drink.

We have many cheering signs of progress around us, but none is so full of hope and encouragement as the efforts which are making on all hands to engage the affections of the young in so great and good a work. God raises up his own agencies, and calls into their proper field of exertion the fitting servants to perform his work. The young boys and girls, who are eagerly embracing the truths of Temperance, will in a few years be teachers in Sabbath-schools—fathers and mothers of families. What a power and influence this will be! This is a reflection calculated to arouse the most supine to exertion. Much of their power, for evil or for good, depends upon us. Let us fully appreciate the truth, and be prepared to discharge our duty to them. The ideas we stamp upon their young minds will go down, enlarged and improved, to their posterity. What a responsibility is reposed upon us! Let us fully estimate it.

THE WESLEYAN CONFERENCE OF 1850.

WE are gratified to learn that a number of excellent MEMORIALS, from Wesleyan Teetotalers, were forwarded to the Annual Conference of Wesleyan Preachers, whose sittings have just closed. We have been favoured with copies of several, numerous signed by Local Preachers, Class-leaders, and Stewards; and as we have reason to believe that the originals were seen only by "the Memorial Committee," we wish that copies of them could be brought under the immediate notice of the Preachers throughout the Connexion. We subjoin that from Waltham; the honest simplicity and heartfelt thankfulness to God which characterise it being calculated to make an impression favourable to our cause upon the mind of every Christian Minister who will give it a candid perusal. We are informed, by one of the Preachers who was present, that the Memorials were referred to, by the President (Dr. Beecham), "with more kindly feelings than heretofore." We may therefore hope that, if our friends will use their best exertions, and respectfully but perseveringly press the subject upon the notice of their Preachers during the year, the Conference may, ere long, be induced to follow the example of their American brethren, by adopting thorough-going Temperance resolutions. Such a step would do much, we believe, towards staying the divisions now in the Body, and greatly tend, as in America, to promote an extensive revival of religion.

While adverting to revivals, we may state that a respected correspondent suggests the propriety of sending, to every Wesleyan Preacher, a copy of the admirable sermon by Professor FINNEY, to which we have directed attention in another part of this number.

"TO THE HON. THE PRESIDENT OF THE BRITISH WESLEYAN CONFERENCE, NOW ASSEMBLED. 1850.

"REV. AND HONOURED SIR,—Being deeply impressed with the important bearing which the adoption of Total Abstinence principles by the Conference would have in promoting the increase and spirituality of Methodism, we, the undersigned, being office-bearers, &c., of the Wesleyan Society in Waltham, well knowing your good will to, and strong desire for, the extension and prosperity of our united societies, have ventured to recommend to your kind notice, and deep and serious consideration, the principles of Total Abstinence.

"We cannot but lament the fall and also the expulsion of so many of our members, and also of some of our beloved and useful ministers, which so frequently take place, in consequence of their being overcome by this great enemy, both of God and man viz.,—STRONG DRINK. That this evil may be removed, and this enemy put down, and that our beloved Methodism may shine out to all the nations of the world by doing its part, and that the Redeemer may be glorified, and "see of the travail of his soul" in the reclamation of those who have fallen, and also in the prevention of others from following their bad example, is the sincere and hearty prayer of, Rev. Sir, your humble petitioners. We are of opinion, Sir, that you will rejoice with us at what has already been done by the adoption of those principles in your NATIVE TOWN. God hath blessed our labours, and crowned our efforts with great success.

"We have now a most beautiful little hall erected here, nearly opposite to our chapel, in which we have a good and flourishing Sabbath-school, and some of our preachers are reclaimed drunkards. You will, perhaps, remember some of the following:—Thomas Bee, once a confirmed drunkard, and, to all appearance, past recovering, after having embraced our principles for a short time, was led a humble penitent to the foot of the Cross, where he obtained the forgiveness of his sins, and has ever since been an ornament to his profession. Richard Beatmiffe, eldest son of J. S. Beatmiffe, Esq., once a real sot, now a member of the society, and a happy man. George Wraif, once a regular drinker, now a leader. J. Salmon, once a real soaker, now a local preacher and class-leader. Thus could I go on, till I filled your Christian heart with thanksgiving to God for what he hath done for us in this respect in this village.

" Hoping that you will present the cause of Temperance to the present Conference for its calm and prayerful consideration and adoption, is the prayer of, Rev. Sir, your obedient servant,

" JABEZ SALMON, Local Preacher and Leader.
" On behalf of several other Local Preachers, Leaders, and Stewards.

PROTEST OF THE LATE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.

In the number of the British Banner, dated August 21, there is an article, under this head, professing to give the opinions of the Duke, now that the veil of eternity is opened before him, on many of the public acts of his life, and on many of the systems to which, while living, he gave his countenance and support. On the subject of intemperance, the writer, the Rev. Thomas Spencer, makes him speak as follows. We would that many would take it seriously, and accept it as a voice from the grave—a warning from the dead to the living:—

" In looking upon mankind with eyes that are, alas! open too late, I see the foul havoc made amongst men by intemperance, and especially in Christian Britain, the most drunken of all nations. War, slavery, pestilence, and famine have slain their thousands; but brandy, rum, gin, wine, beer, tobacco, opium, and all other intoxicating drinks and narcotic poisons, have slain tenfold more than all. Yet I was a most distinguished patron of the drinking customs of society. Whenever the anniversary of a charitable institution was to be celebrated—wherever a grand banquet was prepared—wherever all the delicacies of the table, which cookery can invent, were provided, and all the champagne, claret, and the choicest wines were produced—wherever were found the richest viands to delight the appetite of the sensualist, and to gratify the palate even of those who fare sumptuously every day; there, if invited, was I as the presiding genius of the place—the patron of the convivial bowl—the toastmaster-general of all self-indulgent drinkers of toasts—the commander-in-chief of all beer-barrels and wine-bottles, at whose word corks were fired off by thousands, and terrible execution done upon men's brains; there was I the king of good fellows, and the chief of odd fellows, and the lord of the jolly full bottle. Ah! the jolly full bottle! When I think of the devices with which the Prince of Darkness has taken captive millions of the human race by that deceitful fascination, I utter groans, I give vent to deep sighs, that cause the dark and silent space around me to resound with the echo."

BEGELLY, PEMBROKESHIRE.—The inhabitants of this part are chiefly colliers; and, up to a recent period, the drinking habits of that portion of the community were so great that it appeared as if nothing short of a miracle could effectually destroy them. A short time since, however, some staunch friends of the Total Abstinence cause came to reside here, among whom were Mr. Spenser, late of Barnet, Herts., and Mr. Anstie. These have opened a crusade against the foe of our country; societies have been formed, and about 150 members have signed the Total Abstinence pledge. A meeting was recently held on King's-moor, and a tea-meeting afterwards at Zion Chapel, closed by another open-air meeting on the moor. On the day called St. Margaret's Fair-day, a large number of persons assembled, and addresses were delivered by Rev. Mr. Milard, Mr. H. Phelps, Rev. Mr. Llewellyn, &c. The company, afterwards, as stated above, repaired to the chapel, where about 200 took tea, and engaged in rational conversation. They then repaired to the moor, when Mr. Spencer opened the meeting in an effective speech, after which Messrs. Hughes, Berkis, Milard, James, and Hay, addressed the meeting, consisting of about 600 persons. It is proposed to hold a similar course of meetings at Jefferston on the fair-day, Sept. 29, hitherto much disturbed by drunkards.

INTOXICATING DRINKS, A PRINCIPAL CAUSE OF CRIME IN THE METROPOLIS.

TRULY, it may be said, the evil effects of ALCOHOLIC liquors are a legion. We cannot take up a pipe, or peruse a book, or take a walk, without being struck with the dominant presence of this hydra-headed monster. How many, who are wearing the habiliments of mourning, and bewailing the loss of some relative dear to them, although possessing certain hateful weaknesses, might be dressed in gay attire, be singing gadsome songs, and partaking with the absent one, in some innocent amusement, if (that little monosyllable if what power does it not wield!) he had only resisted the subtle tempter in time. That life, which none can buy back, was recklessly sacrificed to the fiery demon. Possessing God-like faculties, he was seduced from Nature's simple ways; was unable to refrain from the acceptance of the proffered cordial, as many would term it, and the meeting of the "cup and the lip" sealed his doom! The temptation, all-powerful and enticing, he cannot resist, for the world says too often to the irrelative and weak, "It is so unsocial not to take a glass of wine, or a draught of porter, with a friend." "Do, that's a decent fellow, only one glass." Or again, what is ten times worse, in our estimation, the taking a drop because "one does not feel well." This latter is almost a "household word," and cannot be too severely reprehended. All know, or ought to know, that there is nothing whatever nutritious in intoxicating drinks; nay, more, that each and all contain, in a greater or less degree, actual poison; yet, in the face of this indisputable fact, a vast number are continually concealing their weakness, and their baneful habits, under a medicinal cloak!

But, my gentle reader must think we are about to write a dissertation on these infernal liquors, and that the heading of this article is misplaced. Not so. We will therewith dismiss our own individual sentiments, and will place for our readers' thoughtful consideration the following extract from the report of the Rev. Mr. Hine, chaplain of the Westminster House of Correction, worthy a place, we think, in THE TEETOTAL TIMES:—

"When the father or mother is an inveterate drunkard, the sin falls heavily upon the children; they are generally but too apt to follow the parents' example, and in most cases go on from bad to worse till the whole family sinks in misery and ruin. Take as an illustration, the following case:—G. S., a youth committed to the Westminster House of Correction for stealing a small remnant of cloth, confessed to the chaplain that his ruin was entirely owing to the intemperate habits of his father, who was a carpenter, able to maintain his wife and family in comfort, had he been a steady man. But, unhappily, he took to drinking, and then everything went wrong. At length his mother fell a victim to his father's brutality; she died from ill-usage, received from him in a fit of intoxication, and he then turned the boy out of doors, and refused him any assistance. From that time the unfortunate lad was compelled to seek a precarious living in the streets, where he soon got acquainted with bad characters, who enticed him into thieving, as his only resource against starvation, and in the end he was committed to prison, as above stated; his reputation gone, and his future prospects entirely blighted by the misconduct of the very being who ought to have been, and, but for his sinful propensity for drink, probably would have been his guide and protector. This is only one of the many similar accounts which might be adduced to show the mass of crime engendered by that detestable vice, drunkenness, so fatal to the person himself, and all who come within the sphere of his influence."

TEMPERANCE STATISTICS.

To the Editor of the Teetotal Times.

SIR,—I have long felt much surprise that, in works on Hygiene, as well as in Reports on the Public Health and in Bills of Mortality, so little sickness and death should be attributed to one of the most powerful agents in producing both—INTEMPERANCE. I am fully aware of the difficulties that stand in the way—difficulties which belong, in fact, to all questions of vital statistics. The importance of the subject, however, would seem to demand more attention than has hitherto been paid to it. It is a matter of extreme delicacy, and those who make the returns are no doubt often perplexed; but surely when the regions of filth and poverty are explored, for the purpose of ascertaining the number of deaths arising from fever and cholera, and other epidemic diseases, it is of consequence to investigate what primary or proximate influence the use of intoxicating drinks may have upon health, or the duration of life. We have long arrays of statistics, prepared with the greatest skill, and descending into the most minute particulars, tracing the origin, and showing the progress, of well-known and virulent diseases. The use of alcoholic drinks, as a first or secondary cause in producing them, excites no remark, or, at the best, some casual or incidental notice. Among the conditions of health, I apprehend that food and drink are equally influential with air and light.

The Reports of the Registrar-General are prepared with great care, and are the result of most laborious research. In the Report for 1841, I find that two frightful causes of death are set down as follows:—

	NUMBER OF DEATHS.
	1838.	1839.
Delirium Trem.	167 Males 15 Fem.	184 Males 22 Fem.
Intemperance	125 „ 36 „	178 „ 48 „

Now common observation will at once correct these returns. These figures cannot represent the total number of deaths from the causes named. They may be ill that are so returned. If coroners' juries were better instructed, and the reports of public institutions were more faithfully kept, I apprehend a very different result would be obtained. Many cases of death from "unknown causes," many appearing under the general heads of "violent deaths," "suicide," "consumption," "casualties," "fever," &c., would be, if fairly recorded, set down—killed by alcohol. We sometimes see a man drinking, day by day, the most immoderate quantities of intoxicating drink, and thereby, according to all the acknowledged laws of health, exposing himself, nay, actually inviting the attack of any prevailing disease: he is suddenly stricken down, and typhus gets the credit of his death. The man is really slain by strong drink. A man when drunk is run over, and in the bills of mortality his death is "accidental," or "violent death."

It is of importance to ascertain, as nearly as the case will admit, what proportion of sickness and mortality is fairly attributable to the use of intoxicating drinks. An approximate estimate is all that may be attainable, but is the difficulty any greater than in calculating the number that may be poisoned by bad air? The subject of Temperance is a purely scientific one, and will have to be tested by its effects on human health and happiness. The moral considerations which induce good men to abstain are founded, after all, upon the physical evils of intemperance. What, then, is the actual extent of the evils? The man of candid mind, and tolerably acute powers of observation, will arrive at correct conclusions without the aid of figures. The effects of drinking are visible enough in the condition of the people. It is fashionable, however, to employ an artillery of statistics on all subjects, social, economical, and educational. When carefully collected, and judiciously applied, they are powerful in the hands of the Temperance advocate; but they become very awkward and faithless weapons when they are so grossly exaggerated as to exceed the bounds of probability. Now the statistics in the reports of the Registrar-General are manifestly below the truth, and enormously so. Are not those used in Temperance works as much above it?

I remember some months ago you quoted some calculations made by Mr. BEGGS, in which he stated the probable number of drunkards dying annually as not exceeding some seven or eight thousand. Some letters appeared also, quarrelling with the calculation, and some remarks were made upon them in the "American Temperance Journal." In the latter there seemed a disposition to cavil with Mr. Beggs rather than to treat his statements. I felt the point in discussion to be very important, and trouble you with this communication, hoping that some one will take up the subject, and from the best data procurable, give us a fair estimate of the amount of mortality due to our drinking system. I am, I must say, a little wearied of the statement, which appears stereotyped ready for use by our Temperance writers, and actually imprinted on the brains of our Temperance advocates, that there are 600,000 drunkards in the United Kingdom, 60,000 of whom die every year." If such was the proportion in New York, how is it that it has been applied to this country? No one would think of examining the vital statistics of a transatlantic city to find the infant mortality of London: then why apply a random calculation, made from the facts gathered in some of the cellars of New York, to the whole of England? If the number was 600,000 fifteen years ago, what is it now? Has it increased or diminished? Do, Sir, be good enough to give us a little light on this subject.—I am, Sir, yours truly,

STATISTICUS.

THE PROCESS OF REFORMATIONS.

The following extract from a discourse recently preached by Dr. Clapp, of New Orleans, beautifully sets forth the process of reformation in the case of the inebriate, and what are the causes which induce it, and carry it forward to completion. Thinking, acting, resolving, and praying—here lies the secret, and these are the agencies through which the drunkard may be redeemed. If this should meet the eye of a poor, fallen brother, let him read, ponder, and be saved:—

"I recently saw an anecdote in a northern paper:—A little boy came home from school one day, weeping and sobbing bitterly. 'What ails you?' eagerly inquired his father. The son answered him that his school-mates had called him the son of a drunken father. The parent was at first angry; but, on further reflection he said to himself, the boys have only uttered what is notoriously true. What ground, then, is there for cherishing resentment towards them? Thus he was led into a train of thought which completely absorbed his mind. During that day he abstained from his favourite beverage. The succeeding night he found himself unable to sleep. His imagination set before him the terrific evils of a drunkard's downward career. He thought of ruined health and constitution—the fevered blood, the enervated and palsied frame, where once bloom and vigour reigned. He thought of a wasted fortune, an impoverished wife and children, a character universally despised by a community that once delighted to do him honour. He could bear the thought of entailing infamy and ruin upon those children of whom he was the natural guardian and preceptor. He felt, too, the desolation that was gaining on his soul; that those delicate chords whence spring the most pure and refined enjoyments of our spiritual nature had lost their harmonies; that he was an absolute wretch—a beacon set up among the rocks and shoals of time to warn others against rushing upon similar ruin and degradation. The prospect, also, of a drunkard's miserable end—a death in a ditch or the cheerless hospital, leaving behind him nought but an execrated name and memory, stood like an accursed spirit in the presence of his foreboding and condemning conscience. From the contemplation of these combined horrors he shrank back as from a yawning and bottomless abyss. In the strength of high Heaven he firmly resolves to begin from that moment a new life. Next he acts in harmony with his resolve. He not only abstains tasting intoxicating drink, but scrupulously avoids those resorts, haunts, amusements, and associates, which might tempt to a violation of his pledge. He fills up his hours with useful and sympathetic engagements. His leisure time is devoted to good company and the perusal of interesting books. He resumes sweet intercourse with wife and children, goes with them to the house of God on the Sabbath, and by sincere prayer draws down from Heaven those merciful aids requisite to enable him to tread the upward path of reformation and glory.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

HARP-ALLEY, FARRINGDON-STREET.

On Tuesday evening, August 13, a large audience listened with deep attention to a lecture by Mr. W. Tweedie, on the following subject:—"The manufacture and use of intoxicating drinks the cause of low wages, scarcity of employment, and general commercial depression."—Mr. J. W. Green, who occupied the chair, observed that the individual who preferred such sweeping charges against so large and respectable a body as the manufacturers and consumers of strong drinks, ought carefully to examine the grounds on which he proceeded—to be furnished with abundant proof—to be sure that he had truth and justice on his side—and to take care that he was not actuated in the course he pursued by any unworthy motives. He had every reason to believe that the lecturer was duly qualified in all these respects.—Mr. Tweedie said that he was quite prepared to substantiate the charges he had preferred against strong drinks. He assigned several reasons why the question was so little studied, and, of course, so little understood. It was, nevertheless, of great importance to all classes. He stated the amount annually spent upon intoxicating drinks, and produced some tables showing the amount of labour employed in the production of various articles of ordinary consumption, and the very small proportion of labour required in the production of strong drinks. He explained the laws which regulate wages, and brought forward some important statistical calculations, based on parliamentary documents. In conclusion, he urged the necessity, practicability, and safety of total abstinence.—The Chairman enforced what had been said by some familiar illustrations and an earnest exhortation.

BRIGHTON.

The first public meeting of the "Band of Hope" was held in the Puget Schools, August 14. Mr. Austin occupied the chair. After a few preliminary remarks from the chairman, Mr. Wakeford addressed the audience, requesting them to give him the right hand of fellowship, that the seed which had been sown might fall into good ground, and yield a hundred-fold. Mr. Gates set forth the evils of intemperance and the advantages of sobriety. Mr. J. Ripley sang a temperance melody. Mr. H. Funnell brought forth some convincing arguments, both from the Old and New Testament, in support of Temperance. Mr. G. Campbell, of London, interested the meeting by a speech of considerable length, interspersed with anecdotes, chiefly addressed to young persons. About 400 persons were present.

LEYBURN, YORKSHIRE.

A Band of Hope was formed at Leyburn last year, and as the plan adopted, which was somewhat novel, seems to have succeeded, we recommend similar proceedings in other places. An address to parents and teachers was circulated, and the parents were called upon soon after, for the purpose of taking down children's names with their consent. Infants' names were signed by their parents, who thereby made themselves their children's protectors, instead of being their tempters, as some might otherwise have incautiously become. Some parents, who are not Teetotalers themselves, have signed for their children, and thus they have become honourable coadjutors with the society, which they now view in a more favourable light than they formerly did. As this Band of Hope is not limited by age, some young people and a few adults have joined it, that it may be conducted with stability and energy; and the agreement restricts the members from taking tobacco as well as alcoholic liquors. Most of the children in the town are members, and nearly all of them have stood firm, and when they have done so for six months a medal is given them. The children attend their monthly meetings with eagerness and interest, and it is delightful to see their intelligent countenances and hear their sweet voices. We hope they will never sing the drunkard's song.

JAMES ANTON, Secretary.

NEWARK.

Mr. Jabez Inwards delivered three lectures in the Corn Exchange, August 6th, 7th, and 8th. Subject, first evening: Food, Famine, Drink, and Death. Second evening: Teetotalism the Temperance of the Old and New Testament; and the last evening: Plausible Objections to Teetotalism Answered. The meetings were well attended, and a goodly number of signatures were obtained. On Friday evening Mr. Inwards gave a lecture to the juveniles in the Independent School-room. Mr. S. W. Chettle, of Ashoeton Abbey, presided on Wednesday evening, and gave some account of his deliverance from the bondage of strong drink, when he began to pray to God to deliver him from the power and dominion of sin. Thus Total Abstinence was the means used to pluck him as a brand from a drunkard's grave. Since then teetotal meetings have been held in his old malt-kiln. J. L.

AQUATIC EXCURSION TO ERITH.

On Monday, August 19, a number of friends from London and Greenwich, amounting together to about 400, proceeded in the "Meteor" steam packet, to the village of Erith, according to arrangements made by the committee of the borough of Greenwich Temperance Association, for the benefit of which it was undertaken. The company left London-bridge soon after nine o'clock, and arrived at Erith soon after eleven. From thence they proceeded in regular order to the beautiful park and grounds at Belvedere, permission to visit which had been kindly granted by Sir Culling Eardley, Bart. After promenading here for some time, they returned to the pleasure gardens at Erith, where a cold collation, tea, &c., had been provided. Between four and five o'clock, a meeting was held in a large rustic building, at the end of the gardens, along the sides of which tables were laid for tea. The chair was occupied by Benjamin Rotch, Esq., one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for Middlesex, who interested the company by several short addresses. Addresses were delivered also by the Rev. I. Doxsey; R. L. Pinching Esq., surgeon; Rev. Mr. Timpson; Mr. D. G. Paine; Mr. Thos. Beggs; Mr. Tweedie; Mr. G. C. Smith; W. Janson, Esq., &c. Shortly before seven o'clock the company re-embarked, and arrived safely in London about nine. About 170 of the company were from Greenwich and vicinity. The weather was very fine, and the company appeared well pleased with their trip.

HORTON.

The third public meeting of our band was held on Tuesday, the 30th of July, at the Wenlock-hall. Mr. T. B. Smithies presided, and the meeting was addressed by John Biddle, master of the Hollow Ragged Schools, E. Griffiths, Esq., and Henry Dymond, jun., secretary of the association, all of whom, in short but touching speeches, pointed out the evils of intemperance and the blessings of Temperance. During the evening several Temperance melodies were sung, and the whole, concluded by giving hearty cheers to some gentlemen who had presented the committee with some tracts for the members to distribute amongst their friends and schoolfellows.

LEIGHTON BUZZARD.

A Temperance gala was held here on Monday, August 5, in a field in the Lindslade-road, kindly lent for the purpose by Mr. S. Hopkins. At eleven the Thames brass band arrived in their van, and rode round the town, playing different airs, with the flag of the society flying at their head. The field was opened at two o'clock, soon after which various amusements commenced. At four the booth was open for tea. About four hundred enjoyed themselves, the band playing nearly the whole time. At six the booth was filled for a public meeting. The chair was taken by J. D. Bassett, Esq., who opened the meeting in an appropriate speech, and then called on S. Bowley, Esq., of Gloucester, who gave an interesting address, which secured the attention of the company for upwards of an hour. Addresses were also delivered by the Rev. J. Wilson, Rev. E. Adey, and Messrs. Hamilton and J. Inwards, &c. At nine o'clock two fire balloons were sent up, amidst the cheers of about two thousand spectators. A Peace meeting was held in the Temperance-hall, on Tuesday evening, the 6th. The chair was taken by J. D. Bassett, Esq. S. Bowley, Esq., spoke for nearly an hour and a half, in a pleasing but earnest manner; and the Rev. Messrs. Wilson and Adey briefly addressed the company. A vote of thanks was then given to Mr. Bowley for his kind and efficient services, when the meeting closed.

THETFORD, NORFOLK.

Never at any period has the cause been so prosperous as at the present time. Within the last twelve months several who have been addicted to gross habits of intemperance have been reclaimed, and now delight to testify to the benefits resulting from total abstinence. We have found periodical addresses from working men to be productive of great good, and many are weekly joining us. We have also established a juvenile society, called the "Thetford Temperance Band of Hope," which promises well. A meeting was recently held, when several of the juveniles recited various temperance pieces, which, apparently, produced a great effect upon the audience. The cause here has been in existence long enough to live down that open hostility which was formerly manifested; but, being in the very heart of a population interested in making malis, we have much secret feeling opposed to our movement; but we do not despair of reclaiming drunkards, and preventing many from becoming such.

STEPH. OLDMAN, Secretary.

BEERALSTON.

On Monday, July 29, we held our first Teetotal festival, in a field adjoining the town. Many hundreds of people were collected together to see the grand procession, which marched through the town, with several instruments of music, and a company of singers. A great number of flags, and several banners, with appropriate inscriptions, and a great number of others with a portion of Scripture on them. After perambulating the town, upwards of 150 persons sat down to tea. A public meeting was then held in the open air. Mr. Williams, of Beer Barton, presided; and Mr. Curtis, Mr. Pryor, Mr. Trewin, Association Minister, and Captain Paul, addressed the meeting. The mixed multitude listened with attention, and seemed delighted with the speeches. As the shades of the evening were fast approaching, and several speakers had not spoken, they retired to the Bible Christian Chapel, when Mr. Hoswell, Mr. Blake, Mr. Carter, Mr. Baker, and Mr. Common, delighted us with their powerful speeches. We never had such a meeting on Teetotalism, since Teetotalism was introduced into this place. It could not fail to make a deep impression on the minds of the people. After the meeting, eighteen names were added to the pledge-book.—I remain, dear Sir, yours truly,

GEORGE SLEEP, Secretary.

ROYTON WAKES.—GOOD EXAMPLE.—The annual wakes, or rush-bearing, at Royton, in Manchester (the population of which is upwards of 6,000), commenced on Sunday last, when camp meetings were held by the Temperance Seminary and Educational Society. The first was at two o'clock in the afternoon, in Cooper's-square, and the second at six o'clock in the evening, in the Temperance Sunday-school room, which was crowded; Mr. A. F. Taylor in the chair. Addresses were delivered by Mr. Joseph Fielding, of Middleton; Mr. W. Murphy and Mr. Briscoe, schoolmaster, of Harpurhey; Mr. Riley and others, of Royton, &c.—On Monday, upwards of 400 persons took tea together, after which the Rev. F. Howarth, of Bury, delivered an appropriate address on self-temperance and education. It appeared from the addresses delivered on Sunday and Monday, that at the noted plug-drawing of 1842, a number of young men, factory operatives and members of the Temperance Society, instead of having a plug dub, established a book-club, and at once commenced a temperance seminary, and took a room to hold their meetings. They began to pay twopence each per week towards raising a fund to purchase books. They now occupy an extensive building in a very conspicuous part of the town; here they have a large library, an organ, a pair of globes, maps, &c. &c. They have also six class or reading-rooms; the London daily, Manchester and other newspapers, also literary periodicals, are taken and read every day in the week. There is also a Sunday-school, where about 400 scholars, male and female, are taught reading, writing, and accounts, in a large room well fitted up, belonging to Mr. Cooper, cotton spinner, who lends it to the Temperance and Educational Society free of charge. Since the formation of the Temperance Seminary, in 1842, several other literary and scientific associations have been established in the neighbourhood. It was stated by the chairman that crime was nearly extinct, there having been only one individual during the last eight years, in the township of Royton, punished for felony. The promoters of the above society are greatly indebted to Mr. Whittaker, a cotton manufacturer, who has rendered his services gratuitously, and also to Mr. Cooper, cotton spinner, for the use of the room for the Sunday-school and temperance meetings. The promoters of the above institution contend that self-reform and self-education, united with good example, are preferable to all Government grants of education, or other educational reformation. There has been very little intemperance at the annual wakes this year.

INTEMPERANCE AND ITS EFFECTS.

To what a deplorable state of depravity will not intemperance lead its victims. The following cases are extracted from the Scarborough Gazette of Thursday, August 15, when out of five cases tried at the Town-hall, four of them were for drunkenness. Truly there is much that remains to be done by the advocates of temperance towards checking this degrading evil:—

TOWN-HALL, SCARBOROUGH.—Before the Mayor, G. Knowles, Esq., and Dr. Keik. Thomas White, a stonemason, was brought up, having been remanded from Wednesday, charged with having violently assaulted his father, William White, who keeps a common bakehouse in Duple-street. It appeared from the evidence, that the defendant went into his father's house intoxicated, and insulted complainant. He then took the fire poker, and aimed a deadly blow at his father, which grazed his head and descended upon the window, breaking the window bar into shivers, and bending the poker to a right angle. Some of the neighbours rescued the poker from him, and he then drew his knife and attempted to stab his father, but was prevented. The police then arrived and took him into custody. He has been much addicted to drinking and poaching. His father has always provided a comfortable home for him and his family. About three months since he was convicted of poaching. The magistrates considered the case a very grievous one, and committed the prisoner for trial at the next quarter sessions. Peter Cochran, a Scotchman, who described himself as a compositor, was charged with having attempted to commit suicide. On Thursday last, after having been drunk two days, he went down to the beach and laid himself under a coble near the life-boat-house. About eight o'clock in the evening he suddenly jumped up, took off some of his clothes, and ran and plunged himself into the sea. There was a coble afloat at a short distance, which immediately came up, and the cobleman seized the unfortunate man by his hair and brought him to shore. In a few minutes he would have inevitably been drowned. A policeman was near the place on the sands, and took him into custody. When brought up before the bench, he said he was very thankful his life had been spared. The effects of intoxication had driven him to attempt to take his life. The magistrates ordered him to be taken care of at the workhouse until fit to leave the town.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

TOTAL ABSTINENCE A CHRISTIAN DUTY. A Sermon preached at Surrey Chapel, Blackfriars, by the Rev. C. G. FINNEY, of Oberlin College, U. S. London: Paul, Chapterhouse-court.

As this sermon, though it occupied rather more than two hours in the delivery, may be obtained for two pence, we content ourselves with urging our readers to become purchasers of it, and to circulate it extensively among their acquaintance, especially that portion of their acquaintance who, though professedly Christians, still entertain doubts as to the propriety, utility, or necessity, of their becoming total abstinents, or of advancing the Temperance movement. The learned Professor fully establishes this proposition,—that Total Abstinence from the manufacture, sale, and use of intoxicating drinks, as a beverage, or as an article of luxury or of diet, and from offering or providing them, as such, for others, under the present circumstances of the church, is expedient, and therefore a DUTY.

WAKEST THOU CHARITABLY? An Exposition of Romans xiv. 13—21. By BENJAMIN FARRINGTON, B.A. London: C. Gilpin, Bishopsgate-Without.

UPON a copious exposition and paraphrase of the above passage, the author of this tract finds the following analogy:—"There are certain drinks which your weaker friends find it dangerous to touch. By using these drinks you encourage them to use them, and so lead them into a temptation, from which you cannot exhort them to escape, without condemning your own conduct." For kindness' and religion's sake, do not tempt them, but ABSTAIN." This case is pressed on the attention of the reader in terms of glowing eloquence, leaving the non-abstainer without excuse; and charging upon him the destruction of all who, by copying his example, become drunkards; reminding them, at the same time, that "the higher their character stands, the more powerful their example, the stronger their influence." It is a valuable tract, and should be extensively circulated amongst professing Christians.

TEMPERANCE AND TOTAL ABSTINENCE; or, the Use and Abuse of Alcoholic Liquors in Health and Disease. By SPENCER THOMSON, M.D., &c., pp. 184. 1850.

THOSE of our teetotal friends who read what they ought, are by this time acquainted with the prize essay of Dr. Carpenter; and it may be well now to bestow our attention on the work second on the adjudicators' list, the title of which we have transcribed above. We are sorry we cannot join in the praise bestowed, when they (the adjudicators) "think it due to record their opinion of its great merits, and to express their belief that the cause of Temperance would be benefited by its publication." On the contrary, we think the demerits of it are great, and that its not receiving Mr. Eaton's prize is a merciful deliverance for the cause of Temperance. Had it "come before the public with the prestige of the successful competitor," it would have been a hindrance and a stumbling-block to thousands.

Dr. Carpenter, in his essay, brings us fairly up to the point, that alcohol is inimical to health, and unnecessary (or next to it) under any circumstances in which healthy persons may be situated; Dr. Thomson, on the contrary, speaks so cautiously, and keeps himself so much in the mist, that we cannot, oftentimes, discern what he would be at. Again, Dr. Carpenter leaves the onward movement open for further trials without alcohol; Dr. Thomson would discourage attempts in that direction, and severely censure the most cautious trials, did they fail.

We proceed to notice a few passages which are to us inexplicable (as designed for the promotion of Temperance) on any other supposition than that the author of them has not fairly tried Teetotalism in his own person. The book abounds with expressions that lead one to conclude that the writer would abstain, but that some circumstance or other prevents this desired good. Page 95 and seq., we have him taking off the point of St. Martin's case; page 112, we find him quoting Mr. Morris as an authority on malaria, without the slightest intimation that Mr. Morris has been shown to be greatly mistaken in his conclusions. On page 117 there are recorded six "heads," under which to discuss the merits of alcoholic stimulants. Now, we are bold to say, that under one of those heads, and justified by Dr. Thomson's vicious reasoning, any man, woman, or child—ay, from old age to infancy—might find an excuse for indulging in intoxicating drinks! If anywhere he does pen a clear, strong line or two against alcohol, he is sure to be presently alarmed at himself, and to follow it up by some neutralizing qualification. In fact, his "ifs" and "buts" are ludicrous. And then we have him indulging himself in the very questionable habit of attaching laudatory epithets to several kinds of intoxicating liquors; and the reader, to his surprise and chagrin, if he is a teetotaler, is treated to "sound wine," "good porter," &c. On page 173 the Doctor says: "On what physiological grounds the occasional use of unadulterated wine, or other similar fermented stimulant, is to be forbidden to man, in his often rare glimpses of social enjoyment, or of relaxation from the cares of life—why those liquors are to be made exceptions, under such circumstances, to the class of occasional stimuli generally, we cannot imagine." Then, until you can, Dr. Thomson, it will, perhaps, be more for the interest of Teetotalism that you do not publish your views; for, in your present attempt, so far from finding any aid to Temperance, we find our opponents furnished with plausible, not to say subtle, excuses for continuing their old pernicious habits; and your book might be appropriately styled "A Guide to the Lovers of ALCOHOL."

HAMILTON'S TEMPERANCE MUSIC-BOOK. A collection of Temperance Songs and Hymns, with the Music adapted to each. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

A work like this has long been a desideratum, and we hope soon to find it in general use in teetotal societies throughout the kingdom. The cheapness of the publication will render this possible. For sixpence we have here fifty secular pieces, words and music, and the same number of hymns, words and music also! Thanks to Mr. Hullah and others, a taste for music bids fair to be cultivated to a considerable extent; and we are quite sure that the introduction of good music into our Temperance meetings would render them interesting and attractive. We give the editor credit for having "bestowed much pains in the selection of both words and music." There are several "well-known and favourite melodies, and some German airs of first-rate excellence." The work is to be completed by the issue of a second number, the same size as the present.

Advertisements, and articles intended for insertion, should be addressed to the Editor, 335, Strand, London; also, all orders for the Stamped Edition, with remittance for the amount, in postage-stamps, or Post-office orders, to John Cassell, as above.

INTOXICATING DRINKS NOT NECESSARY TO PRODUCE MUSCULAR AND NERVOUS POWER.

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

AFTER all that has been advanced on this subject by various writers, and the abundant evidence furnished by well-authenticated facts, one might suppose that another [word to be written or spoken would be unnecessary. But there is an old line of Hudibras, which every day illustrates and confirms:—

“He that’s convinced against his will,
Is of the same opinion still.”

The love of strong drinks is become almost inveterate, and many of our people are determined to have them, at whatever cost or hazard. Not a few of the professors of religion see their dearest relations and friends ruined by these poisons, for both worlds, and yet they seem to drink them with as great a zest as they would if no one had been destroyed. In this matter we have unfortunately to argue against appetite, and hence the difficulty of our task. Not that the desire which we condemn is natural, for no individual was ever born with a taste for beer, wine, gin, tobacco, or snuff. The passion, therefore, which we have to oppose is acquired, and from use is as strong, if not stronger, than some of our original animal propensities. There is no reason in a physical appetite. You may curb it and control it by reason, but you cannot make it rational. You might as well hope to teach a wild ass the three first books of Euclid, or make a horse understand the metaphysics of Aristotle, as to instruct the physical passions and desires of sensualists; and hence those people who consult nothing but their animal ease and gratification never can become practically rational and moral.

This is exactly the case respecting strong drinks. Every argument that can be advanced against Total Abstinence has been again and again fairly answered; but after hours of discussion on this point, we are at last met with the declaration, “I love them, and therefore I shall drink them.” When a child uses such phraseology concerning sweetmeats or toys, which have made it ill, we attribute its folly to its tender age and mental imbecility; but for men and women, who have the full use of their powers, to yield themselves up to the dictates of an appetite which they would horsewhip a dog for indulging, is an awful proof of the slavery, both physical, mental, and moral, to which multitudes of our brethren and sisters have cheerfully sold themselves. We show them that these drinks beggar families, produce disease, shorten life, injure the intellect, harden the heart, degrade the morals, and rob the school and the church of some of their most hopeful members; and the only answer is, “We assent to your reasoning, and can verify your facts from our family circles and friends, but still we like these poisons, and shall continue to drink them.”

With such prejudiced opponents we should sit down in despair as to the success of our cause, but for the persuasion that truth must eventually triumph. An age of reason is predicted for our world, and is as certain as if we beheld it with our eyes; and as the end is sure, so the means shall be effectual: and one of the potent agencies that shall bring about a brighter day is TOTAL ABSTINENCE; and having faith both in the result and the course we pursue, we will continue to plead, to argue, and cry aloud, until our principles obtain a complete victory; and therefore again repeat, that intoxicating liquors are not necessary to produce either muscular or nervous power and energy.

I.—THESE LIQUORS ARE NOT REQUISITE TO PRODUCE MUSCULAR POWER.

We need not say that muscles are those parts of the body which enable us to move our limbs, to walk, to labour, or carry any weight. On their contraction or expansion every physical movement depends. One of the best examples we can have of the working of muscular power is the crawling of a worm; and hence this poor despised reptile gives a better practical lecture on this interesting subject than all the physiologists in the world. A man, or an animal, without muscular strength is perfectly powerless, and can neither work nor walk. There may be an athletic frame and symmetry of form in other respects; but if the muscles will not act, you can have, not only no motion, but no symptoms of life. For it is allowed by all that the beating of the heart and heaving of the lungs, though perfectly involuntary, are nothing more than muscular operations. Our tongues move and eyes twinkle by means of the muscles; and were these to be perfectly still, we should not only become lifeless, but very soon sink into a mass of putrescence. Muscular power is therefore an essential agent in the preservation of life.

But muscular energy may vary; some are much stronger than others; many of the animals are marvellously active and powerful. What muscle there must be in the boa-constrictor to give it vigour to encircle and crush the bones of an animal so much larger than itself! Who has not been struck with the fleetness of the dog or the stag? What an immense burden the mule or the camel will carry, and what a weight the horse or the ox will draw! We have seen a calculation as to the number of times that a nail-maker must raise and lower his hammer, to enable him to earn his daily bread. Only think also of the volubility of the tongue, and the rapidity with which the talking muscles of a Cicero or Demosthenes must have moved to pronounce all the letters and words in their long orations. Muscular strength is so multifarious and universal, that we are overwhelmed with wonder as we contemplate its almost infinite operations.

A question has arisen whether or not this mighty agent of life and activity is aided or impeded by the use of intoxicating drinks. If we allow facts to speak, Teetotalers would bear away the palm. It is well known that all the animals drink nothing stronger than water. The lion, the elephant, the eagle, the hound, the rein-deer, have neither wine nor strong drinks to sustain their strength or their courage. It is evident that the Creator never intended them to drink anything stronger than the limpid stream. But it may be said that man is not an animal, and that an animal is not a man; and, therefore, an argument drawn from the muscular vigour of teetotal horses and dogs cannot be valid. We are not willing to yield this point, because the liquid part in the blood of every animated substance is water. Blood with alcohol in it is not pure, but adulterated blood. We have not a single analysis of this fluid which gives spirit as one of its component parts. The man who would assert that beer, wine, or gin is an essential element of animal or human blood would be the laughing-stock of the whole scientific world; and consequently an analogical reasoning would not at all be out of place.

Still, we will not press the matter, especially as we have abundance of facts drawn from our own species. It is allowed that the majority of the human family are Teetotalers; that the tallest, the strongest, the most personable and symmetrical of our race drink nothing stronger than water. Ancient and modern history most fully confirm this statement. And since Teetotalism has been practised among us, we had the most ample proofs that muscular power, instead of being impaired, is marvellously strengthened by the abandonment of stimulants. We conversed last week with an aged gentleman, who stated that it had been supposed that a shaking hand was hereditary in his family. "My father," said he, "was obliged to hold his right hand with his left to enable him to sign his name; and the hand of my grandfather shook also, so that the doctors told us that the evil was constitutional, especially as my hand trembled worse than any of them, and did so when I was a young man; but," added he, "when I joined the Teetotalers, my hand became steady." In fact, we have in all our workshops, and in all occupations, trades, and professions, individuals who have vastly increased their muscular power by the abandonment of intoxicating drinks; and therefore we conclude that this poison is altogether unnecessary in any of the business or callings of life. We grant that, under the influence of these liquors, when taken in what they call moderation, a man may, for a short period, feel the stronger; but the excitement is soon expended, and then he feels the more heavy and languid from the unnatural inspiration which the drink produced; while the real strength derived from solid food and water, as a beverage, is permanent, and preserves those who take nothing stronger from the sinking, depression, and lassitude, to which all consumers of stimulants are more or less liable.

II.—NERVOUS POWER DOES NOT DEPEND UPON STIMULANTS.

Perhaps we ought to say, that, as bones and joints without muscles would be useless, so muscles also would never move but for the nerves. Paralysis is nothing more than the destruction of nervous power. The nerves are the messengers between the will and the muscles—the link between life and activity. The paralytic lives, and, if you dissect his muscles, they are in material the same as ever, and he is not conscious of any defect of will; but the agents that carried on the correspondence between the two have lost their energy, and he in vain tries to move the parts which have been struck with disease. Hence not merely a firm muscle and a determined will are requisite, but healthy nerves also are essential to muscular power, and these, we maintain, cannot be preserved or sustained by alcoholic drinks.

It is well known that alcoholic liquors, in the case of the drunkard, produce temporary paralysis. He who is inebriated cannot hold with a firm grasp, cannot walk with a steady step, cannot talk with an articulate tongue; he has his senses of sight, hearing, and smelling rendered obtuse, and even his reason destroyed. He is said to be dead drunk; and so he is, for both body and soul are unfitted for the duties of life. It may be said that this is the result of excess, but that moderate portions of these liquors, instead of paralyzing, serve to elate the mind and invigorate the body; but it should be observed that it is a fixed law of nature that, whatever excites subjects us to depression. The mother who sees her child fall into the fire has strength enough to rush from a sick bed to rescue it from death. For awhile she has the nerves of a giant; but mark the result an hour after, for she trembles like an aspen leaf. In her case fear operated as a stimulant, and had all the effect of an intoxicating draught. And the case is not different with the drinkers of alcohol generally. All of them tell us how low and sinking they become unless they have their accustomed glass at appointed periods. The tremulous nerve, the flagging muscle, and the low spirits of which they complain, are a proof that these liquors have committed sad havoc upon their frames, and therefore ought to be abandoned.

Here, then, we have a host of people, on the one hand, who use these drinks, but are all, without any exceptions, injured thereby. Some who take them in large quantities have every nerve, muscle, and mental energy unstrung; and others who are said to use them in moderation are rendered so dependant on their baneful influence that they are now compelled to use them as a medicine; and thus both the moderates and the immoderates are injured to an incalculable degree; and, in cases where the drunkard abstains for days together after his debauch, the supposed sober man who takes this poison regularly and constantly is in the end the greater sufferer of the two.

It is therefore evident that alcoholic liquors, instead of doing good, inflict immense injury upon the nerves; and this is more abundantly clear from the fact that thousands have abstained, not only without any mischief to their muscular and nervous power, but with immense advantage to both. They have lost all that sinking which the moderate drinker feels; they have no longer the tremulous hand or sense of lassitude which once made exercise and labour such a perfect toil. They have more vigour for walking, working, talking, or thinking, and in fact find all these exercises pleasurable and healthful. The only thing that makes them nervous is idleness. Man was created to labour both with his hands and his brain, and Total Abstinence strengthens him for his various callings, while intoxicating liquors, in spite of any momentary excitement, cause him to flag and grow weary, because he has to endure the double exhaustion arising from stimulants on the one hand and toil on the other. Why, then, should we waste our money on what produces so much injury to our frame?

PARALYSIS is one sad result of the constant use of these poisons. We often see people with nerves perfectly shattered, and the history of their lives would show that strong drink has wasted all their energy. What a crime to convert the bounties of Providence, which were sent to cheer and invigorate us, into poisons that produce disease, premature old age, and death. Many of our brethren and sisters are eighty or ninety before they are forty. We have seen the wrinkled forehead, trembling step, and grey hairs of the old man in the youth of less than thirty, who had thus destroyed his vigour and hurried on his days by strong drink. While, on the other side, we have beheld not a few examples, in which age, through the adoption of Total Abstinence, has been restored to the agility and buoyancy of youth.

More firmly than ever are we convinced, by the experience and observation of every day, that we shall never have our nerves, muscles, and mental powers what they ought to be until teetotalism shall generally prevail.

A WORD TO THE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES OF ENGLAND.

Do the churches in England expect a general revival of religion, whilst they resist this (the Temperance) reform, and refuse to come up and lay themselves upon the altar? If they do, I am sure they are mistaken. It is perfectly plain that the ministers of this kingdom have not given themselves in earnest to rebuke this sin, and carry forward the temperance reform. I have occasion to know that some ministers and others, who are themselves abstainers, nevertheless provide it for their guests; who do not hesitate to put it upon their tables for the use of others. Some of them seldom preach against it; and when they do they are in the habit of giving notice that they are going to do so, that those who do not like to be rebuked may absent themselves. Thus they try to satisfy their consciences, either with bearing the silent testimony of their example against it, or at most by preaching perhaps once a year a sermon on the subject. Now, is it not plain that this is rather an apology for a temperance effort, than anything like laying themselves upon the altar with a determination to push this reformation? What does it mean? Why do they not, on all occasions, rebuke this as one of the reigning sins and evils of the day and of the land? Why do they not speak against it, pray against it, write against it, rebuke it everywhere and on all occasions, like men who have resolutely undertook to put away one of the greatest abominations of the world?

The fact is, the great mass of ministers, by their use of wine and other intoxicating drinks, directly countenance this evil as it exists in society. Comparatively few are abstainers; and those, either because they fear they shall offend their brethren in the ministry, or their churches or congregations, or all these together, do very little, I fear, to promote this great reform, and put away this wide-spread and overwhelming evil. And is this the way for ministers of God to treat one of the greatest, most wide-spread, and most desolating of evils, that ever cursed any country? Why, really, it is lamentable to see to what an extent the leaders of the sacramental host of God's elect compromise with evil! If they hold their peace much longer the stones will cry out against them, and society will universally rebuke them. For if this is not so, then those laws of mind that have so strongly developed themselves in every other country will fail to do so in this. But there is no mistake. The public conscience is beginning to arouse itself, and there is a murmuring, deep and increasing, that will, by-and-by, speak forth in accents that must be understood. The time is come for the church of God and her ministers to speak out, and rebuke this evil everywhere and on all occasions. Will not the brethren come up to the work?—From Professor Finney's Sermon—"Total Abstinence a Christian Duty."

HOW THE WORKING CLASSES SPEND THEIR EARNINGS.

The Working Men have to work hard for their money. Scanty as their wages are, in a great many instances they waste much of them in intoxicating drinks and tobacco. Experience has shown that labour can be performed as well without as with strong drink. If this be so, then all money spent upon drink must be wasted. Now we will suppose that a man takes two pints of beer per day, at 2d. per pint, that will be 2s. 4d. per week. (Very few men take less on the average than this who take it at all.) 2s. 4d. a week comes to £6 1s. 4d. in the year. This would furnish a good suit of clothes at £4, a good hat at 7s. 6d., two pairs of shoes at 9s. per pair (18s.); three pairs of stockings, 6s.; a shirt, 6s.; and 3s. 10d. for publications and books. But suppose the man should be able to place it in the savings' banks, it would lay the basis of independence in old age. The following calculation has been made to show the value of accumulation. We take 3 per cent. as convenient for calculation. It would be easy to show that in a well-conducted Building Society, or a Freehold Land Society, a man might easily make from 6 to 10 per cent. We take 3 per cent. at present, which is a little more than savings' bank interest. Savings' bank interest is £2 18s. 4d. per cent. Suppose, at 2l, a man saves the price of two pints of beer per day; by the time he has attained his 22nd year he will have £6 1s. 4d. He puts this in the savings' bank, and by the next year his account will stand as follows:—

By this it will be seen that a man beginning at the age of 20 to save two pints of beer per day, will, by the age of 51, have saved above £300. Now let us see how this might be laid out to provide comfort in approaching old age:—

BEER-SHOPS.

ANOTHER VOICE FROM THE BENCH.

Mr. JUSTICE WIGHTMAN, in his charge to the Grand Jury, at a recent Assizes, did himself honour, and performed an important service to society, by adding to the testimony already given on many occasions from the British Bench, to the mischievous influence of low public-houses. His lordship stated:—"That the printed calendar of persons whose cases would come before them at these assizes contained 109 names; but he had received depositions in the cases of several others whose names were not in the calendar, making altogether upwards of 115 persons for trial at these assizes, a number somewhat greater than usual at the summer assizes. He regretted to say that a great portion of these offences were of the most serious character. There were amongst them three charges of wilful murder, and fourteen of manslaughter, making seventeen distinct cases of homicide; and there were twelve cases of malicious wounding, four of discharging fire-arms with intent to injure, thirteen cases of burglary, six of highway robbery, and four of forgery. In nine-tenths of the cases that would come before the Court, the primary date was from some public-house or BEER-SHOP; and he could not but express his deep regret at the encouragement given to the evil communication of the idle and the dissolute, and the contamination of the honest and the industrious, by the institution of beer-shops. The practice of resorting to a beer-shop, and there sitting to drink, was essentially selfish and demoralizing, always at the expense, and usually to the distress and misery, of the wife and children of the married man; encouraging drinking to excess by association with others, without the restraint which the presence of a wife and children must always create in the mind of any one not absolutely lost and hardened to all the feelings of humanity and kindness. The depositions exhibited some most striking instances of the frightful consequences of the evil to which he had alluded—of domestic duties set at nought—of quarrels exasperated by drink ending in personal violence, frequently fatal—unhappy children utterly neglected and abandoned—wives cruelly ill-treated, kicked and beaten unto death, and for no other fault than endeavouring to recall their husbands from their selfish, ruinous extravagance and drunkenness; leading inevitably to that extreme distress and poverty which, added to the recklessness produced by intemperance, ended in the lowest state of crime and degradation. That which he had now stated was no exaggeration; he was aware that it was much easier to denounce than to correct, and habits of long continuance could not be changed at once; but it was essential that no facilities should be given for the continuance of habits so dissolute and degrading. On the other hand it was of the utmost importance to encourage domestic habits, and to give means of refreshment and recreation in which the family of the labourer might take part; not as at present, where all holidays or opportunities of recreation were worse than useless, and were worse than wasted, by the selfish brutalizing practice of spending the whole time at command at a public-house or beer-shop, and there drinking to excess."

[It is strange—marvellously strange—that sensible men, such as Mr. Justice Wightman evidently is, do not seem to understand that the evils which they trace to public-houses or beer-shops, in the proportion of nine-tenths of the whole number, are attributable more to the quality and properties of the drink than to the places in which it is drunk. We admit that the encouragements to excess are greater in the public-house and beer-shop than in the bosom of a family. But while even the Judges of our land encourage a man from the Bench to instruct his wife and children in the art of drinking, what wonder if the race of drunkards is perpetuated, and if public-houses and beer-shops become favourite places of resort?—Ed.]

ANOTHER IMPORTANT TESTIMONY.

FROM THE REV. W. J. SHREWSBURY, WESLEYAN MINISTER, TO MR. T. B. SMITHIES.

DEAR SIR,—I have had intercourse with multitudes, in my varied life, who have used strong drink, but I never met with a solitary individual, black or white, European or African, whom I had any reason to believe was benefited by it. I have known many, of all colours, in different countries, who have been in various degrees injured by it, and not a few utterly ruined. I have known many deceived by it; but have never seen or heard of one made wise by it. It is no element of civilization, for it makes the savage more brutish; it is no element of Christianity, for it is the source of all the drunkenness in the world, and the Christian's Book teaches that "no drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God." Savages soon acquire a relish for it, and would then barter all they have to get it; wherefore I conclude that a true philanthropist, who professes anxiety to civilize aboriginal barbarians, should neither make it, sell it, nor use it; thieves, whores, and murderers, are greedily indulging in it; wherefore I conclude that Christians, who wish to make those depraved beings Christians, should neither taste it, nor offer it. I have seen with my own eyes its ill effects; I never yet once saw any good effects produced by it. I have observed that it helps no man to pray, but makes many men sin; it helps no man to preach the gospel of Christ, but it has unfitted men for the Christian ministry; it has no association with even common honesty, but enters largely into all matters of roguery and villainy: in short, that there is nothing of God in it, but much of the Devil. If, then, observation has taught me anything, it has taught me this, that strong drink is alike a bad thing for individuals and for communities; and that its banishment from the church would, to an incalculable extent, promote its purity; and that its final annihilation from the world will constitute one of the glories of the millennium; for then "violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders:"—an event never to be consummated while traffic in strong drink has existence in the earth. If there be in Scripture no verbal command to abandon this curse of curses, the whole genius and spirit of Christianity wars against it; and the sage maxim of an ancient divine, "no fountain can yield both salt water and fresh," so commends itself to the understanding, that it is equivalent to a command to let strong drink alone, after seeing its undeniable qualities. That maxim will settle the matter with every Christian who really has that honest heart and teachable spirit which our beautiful simple Christianity requires.

PRESTON, THE SHOEMAKER.

[BY R. W. VANDERKISTE, LONDON CITY MISSIONARY.]

DEATH is at all times a solemn subject, whether men feel it to be such or not. It is very affecting to the rightly-influenced mind to behold the whole world bound, irrevocably bound, to die, until that judgment comes, which shall be ushered in by resurrection, when death itself shall die:—

"Earth to earth—dust to dust:
Here the evil and the just—
Here the fearful and the bold—
Here the youthful and the old—
Here the matron and the maid—
In one silent grave are laid.
Here the peasant and the king,
Side by side lay withering;
Here the sword and sceptre rust—
Earth to earth, and dust to dust!"

A few days since a man passed the boundaries of time into eternity who will be remembered by many. Thomas Preston, the shoemaker, died last Saturday, aged 80.

It has been said that spiritual teachers should have no voice in politics. But what are politics? If politics mean policy, that which concerns the welfare of the land of one's birth or of one's adoption, then perish the thought that there is anything good to which the minister may be indifferent! nay, "as we have opportunity, let us do good unto all men." But it is also very true that the specific mission of the religious teacher respects another world, HEAVEN, and this mission will engross most of his time and energies, if pursued in the love of it, leaving small space for the prosecution of other objects, subordinately good though they be.

Thomas Preston, the shoemaker, will be remembered in connection with past Radicalism. Narrowly did he escape the fate of his companions, Thistlewood and others, through the strange friendship of a Government spy. But for that friendly warning, he would have been found at Cato-street. Thistlewood and others went to the scaffold at Newgate, Preston to the Tower of London; but he lived to die in his bed; he lived to study diligently the scriptures of God, to see the folly of the views he once held; he lived, we hopefully believe, to rest his soul for salvation on the merits of Christ; he lived, so far as man can judge, "to die the death of the righteous." How affectionately did he press my hand, poor old man, when I detailed by his bedside the divinity and atoning work of his Saviour.

Well, Thomas Preston is gone! No doubt he longed for the elevation of the working classes. As to what extremes that longing, unrestrained by divine truth, might at a former period of his life have betrayed him, belongs to the history of the past; it may be read there; but that he longed for the elevation of the working classes, none who knew him would doubt.

Thomas Preston was a schemer up to the period of his dying illness; he schemed for the good of his fellow-men at eighty years of age; and his last scheme was one which did honour to his head and heart, it was a scheme to give employment to all, to provide for all without poors'-rates, and to raise the working-classes gloriously in society. Men, when employed, were to be compelled by Government to pay threepence per week to a common fund, to provide for the aged; special provision and supervision, at the same time, was to be made for the unemployed by means of the waste lands of England; and all that is wanted to render his scheme feasible and practicable is GODLINESS and TEETOTALISM.

We are not of those who deem it possible permanently to raise even man's social condition, apart from Christianity; we do not believe it; but we do believe that the Christianity that will alone permanently alter for the better man's social condition, is a Christianity which includes within its morals the abolition of the present drinking usages of society. The religion of our Divine Redeemer would, if received with power into every heart, effect this at once. Yes; from the vestries of churches and chapels, to workshops and factories, would vital Christianity effect this; and, the drinking usages of society once banished, then many, many schemes would be practicable, any one of which would be sufficient entirely to alter the complexion of society, and to obviate all the miseries of non-employment and of poverty. But whilst the drinking usages of society continue as they are, we have no hopes respecting the elevation of the working classes, moral, fiscal, or physical; we have no belief that political convulsions, or any movements whatever, would effect this desideratum. Nothing can ever effect it save the hearty, individual and national reception of vital Christianity; not guzzling, half-drunken Christianity, but the Christianity of the New Testament, which tells of "temperance, righteousness, and a judgment to come." Oh, may

"This influence spread to east and west,
To north and south its power extend;
Till every weary soul finds rest,
And all embrace the sinners' friend!"

EPIDEMIC CHOLERA.

THE following testimonies as to the intimate connection between the use of strong drink and exposure to the attacks of cholera, as well as to the fatal results of such attacks in the majority of cases, is of great importance in itself; but it derives additional importance from the fact, that it is not the ipse dixit of a Teetotaler anxious to establish the truth of his principles, but the united opinions of competent medical professors, whose attention has been specially directed to the subject, and who, as honest and unbiassed men, report according to the evidence furnished by indisputable FACTS. It will be seen that their opinions refer to the practice of using intoxicating drinks, and also to the system of licensing the sale of those drinks:—

"Not only were habitual drunkards the most easy and certain victims of cholera, but even single acts of intemperance were followed by almost immediate diarrhœa. A vessel in the roadstead of Sunderland, early in October, 1848, having arrived from Hamburg, and having had one death on board shortly after leaving the port, was put in quarantine.

"I went alongside of her," says Dr. Sunderland, "in a small steam-boat, for the purpose of making the needful inquiries. I saw all the crew, who appeared to be in perfect health, and one middle-aged man was especially communicative, and afforded a great deal of information in regard to the vessel. I gave the people instructions how to act in case the disease should again appear, and especially cautioned them to avoid intoxication, which I assured them would lead to certain death. This was about seven o'clock, p.m., and immediately after I left, the man referred to went down to the fore-castle, where he had secreted a bottle of brandy at Hamburg, and drank a large quantity. In an hour afterwards he was collapsed, and died the next morning at seven o'clock."

"Abundant evidence," says Mr. Grainger, "was afforded during the late epidemic, that habitual drunkards were highly predisposed to cholera; and of them a large number perished. Occasional excesses also led to a vast number of attacks; thus at Hamburg it was observed that there was among the numerous sailors in that great port a regular accession of cholera every Monday and Tuesday, owing to the men going ashore and getting drunk on the preceding Sunday. In London, also, several medical men informed me that they had noticed the same thing; excess, either in eating or drinking, being followed by attacks which thus became more frequent on Sunday night and Monday."

In Edinburgh, in Glasgow, and in the neighbouring manufacturing towns in general, it was observed that periodic augmentations of the disease were coincident with the earlier days of the week, which could only be attributed to the intoxication which followed the weekly receipt of wages.

"I cannot but express regret," says Dr. Sunderland, "at the small amount of restraint which has hitherto been put on this abominable vice. The whole licensing system, and the way in which it is too frequently administered, are a public disgrace, and call urgently for reform. In every fresh outburst of cholera, persons of dissipated, intemperate habits have been the first to fall victims to the disease; and I feel assured that many lives were sacrificed which might have been saved, had the vice of drunkenness met with that discouragement on the part of authorities and the legislature which its detestable and brutalising tendency, as well as its injurious effects on the public health, have so long demanded."—From the Report of the General Board of Health on the Epidemic Cholera of 1848 and 1849, just published.

THE TEMPERANCE REFORMATION.

GREAT MOVEMENT FOR 1850-1851.

IT must, it is presumed, be acknowledged that among the means employed for the dissemination of important principles and the advancement of great objects, none have proved more effectual than a succession of demonstration meetings in the most conspicuous and commodious places that can be secured, such, for instance, in the metropolis, as Exeter-hall, or Drury-lane Theatre. Not only has London been powerfully operated upon by such meetings, but by the reports of them, circulated through the medium of the press, the public mind throughout the kingdom has been instructed and influenced, and provincial bodies have been roused to corresponding exertions.

Amongst the great movements of the present day which are designed to promote the elevation of the industrial classes, and the general prosperity of the nation, the Temperance Movement is entitled to considerable prominence. Hence, the Committee who conducted the series of Temperance Meetings held in EXETER-HALL during the months of October, November, and December, in 1849, and January, February, and March of the present year, encouraged by the great success of that effort, the deep interest created in the public mind, and the zeal excited and enlarged among Teetotalers, not only in the metropolis, but throughout the kingdom, have determined upon a great and comprehensive scheme for advancing the Temperance cause during the ensuing winter.

It is proposed, as will be seen from an advertisement on the first page of this Number, to commence with a large social gathering in the LONDON TAVERN, BISHOPSGATE-STREET, on MONDAY, OCTOBER 14. Several of the gentlemen whose names are there announced have already signified their intention to be present, and answers from others are daily expected. At that meeting it is most likely the arrangements for the season will be announced. In consequence of the unfinished state of Exeter-hall, which is undergoing important repairs, it is doubtful whether the series of meetings in that place can commence sooner than December; but the Committee are in treaty for DRURY-LANE THEATRE, in which, should they succeed, they hope to have a splendid demonstration early in November. As was stated in our last, it is the wish of the Committee to conclude the series, perhaps in May, 1851, with a CONFERENCE of such of the friends and promoters of Temperance as may be in the metropolis in that month, in consequence of the Great Industrial Exhibition of 1851. In order that the good resulting from these meetings may be perpetuated and extended, it is proposed to secure, to the fullest possible extent, the aid of the PUBLIC PRESS.

It will, however, be seen that, to accomplish these objects, ADEQUATE FUNDS must be obtained. Of this the Committee are fully aware. They have, therefore, determined to exert themselves to obtain FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS for the purpose. The cordial and liberal spirit which prevailed at their preliminary meeting encourages them; and they believe that they have only to appeal to those who have the welfare of the population of this country at heart, to secure the full accomplishment of their wishes.

RECENT DEATHS.

We have to record the death, since our last, of two zealous friends and advocates of the temperance cause. The first was Mr. SAMUEL HOLMES, Registrar of the Farringdon Temperance Society, Harp-alley. Happily reclaimed from habits of intemperance himself, he became ardently devoted to the temperance cause, and during the last eighteen months of his life was the means of reclaiming several unhappy drunkards. He departed this life on Saturday, September 7, aged forty-six years. In his last moments he expressed to a friend that his trust was alone in Christ.

THOMAS COMPTON, Esq., formerly of Srompting Abbots, Sussex, and more recently of Islington, has been suddenly removed by death. He devoted much of his time and property to the introduction and spread of teetotalism, and was lately elected a member of the Committee of the National Temperance Society.

A FIRST-RATE TEMPERANCE TALK.—A captain of a packet-vessel sailing from New York to Liverpool, says he never heard but one temperance talk that was worth anything; but that was "first rate." He once went to a temperance meeting in Liverpool, to oblige a friend; and a good-looking well-dressed man was called upon to address the meeting. He now stood up before the meeting, and he said he had never made a speech in his life, and he did not believe he ever should, for it was not in him. However, he would tell what temperance had done for him. When he used to drink, somehow, he never was well; could never pay his quarter's rent, nor his weekly bills, nor clothe himself nor his family decently; but now that he had left off drinking, his rent was punctually paid to the day—he had no weekly accounts, for he had ready money. They all saw how he appeared and was dressed. And, taking a nice-looking woman by the arm, and four children by the hand, he said, "You see how my wife and children look in health and appearance. Well, their food and dress is all paid for; and if you want to see how my house is furnished, come and see me at home any evening except church night, which is Tuesday, and this meeting, which is Thursday, and you will find me in as well-furnished a room as any one needs. Besides this, I have a hundred pounds in the savings' bank. This is all I can say to-night." And he sat down. He had said enough.

HYDROPATHY.

To the Editor of the Teetotal Times.

SIR,—For seven years this village has had the benefit of a medical gentleman who has practised hydropathy with considerable success. By his removal to Edinburgh I am sorry the invalids who have frequented this part will be deprived of his services. I make this public, so that if there should be any hydropathist looking out for an opening, his attention may probably be directed here.—I am, your obedient servant, J. LIVESEY.
Bourness, Windermere Lake, Westmoreland,
Sept. 24, 1850.

“GROSS VIOLATION OF THE RIGHTS OF HUMANITY.”

In an article with the above heading, in the number of the TEETOTAL TIMES for August, we stated the decision come to by the National Division of the “Sons of Temperance,” excluding the coloured people throughout the country from all the Divisions of that Order. From all parts of the United Kingdom we have heard expressions of indignation at this atrocious outrage on the common rights of humanity, and it has again been suggested that meetings should be called, without delay, for the purpose of passing some clear and distinct resolution on the subject. It is high time that the Americans, who profess to be such zealous advocates for Teetotalism, should be shamed out of this foolish and wicked prejudice against any human beings differing only from them in the complexion of their skins, but whom their GREAT CREATOR has “made of ONE BLOOD.” The pro-slavery papers vindicate the proceeding of the National Division, and in one of them we find a resolution recorded as follows:—

“Resolved,—That we regard the admission of coloured persons into the procession of the Sons of Temperance as the grossest insult that has ever been perpetrated upon the feelings of our Southern representatives, and consider it an imperative duty of every true Son of Temperance to protest against such proceedings.”

It is, however, pleasing to find a most spirited repudiation of this atrocious act by some of the other Divisions of the Order, and strong resolutions passed accordingly. The following are specimens:—

“A few days since the Southport Division of the Sons of Temperance, by a unanimous vote, dissolved, and sent back their charter to the Grand Division of the State of Wisconsin, because the National Division, at its recent session in Boston, prohibited the admission of coloured men to any subordinate division of the order. They say in their published proceedings that this act of the National Division ‘is so perfectly at war with our every feeling, with all our ideas of consistency of character, and, as we believe, such an outrage upon humanity, that we can no longer continue our connection with the order.’”

“THE SONS OF TEMPERANCE, OF MIDDLETOWN COUNTY.—The organ of the Order in that State,—expresses the following editorial views:—

“The cause of liberty and equality, and the great truth that God is no respecter of persons, but has made of one blood all nations to dwell upon the face of the earth, are sentiments too deeply woven into the whole texture of our being to permit that we should apologize for an attempt in any body of men to deprive a portion of the human family of privileges and blessings enjoyed by other portions of our common brotherhood. These are our views, and in the spirit of them we sincerely regret the vote of the National Division.”

“GRANITE DIVISION, No. 14, of Whitinsville Mass, takes this unanimous action:—Resolved, that as our constitution designates any man, of good moral character, as a suitable candidate for membership to the division, therefore the only true meaning of the vote passed by the National Division is, that an African is not a man—an assertion which we believe to be an outrage upon humanity and an insult to God.”

“THE STOW DIVISION, No. 4, passed the following without a dissentient voice:—Resolved, That the exclusion of a large and respectable class of our fellow-citizens from participating in the benefits of the order is a virtual denial of the principles of love, purity, and fidelity upon which the Order is founded.”

“FRATERNUS DIVISION, No. 1, of Pawtucket, speaks thus explicitly:—Resolved, that we repudiate, and shall for ever continue to repudiate, any such attack, as a violation of our constitution, an infringement of our rights, a disgrace to the Order, and an insult to God. Resolved, that we earnestly call upon the divisions of the hand of Roger Williams to send forth their indignant protest against such a cowardly blow at humanity, struck on the very spot where Bunker’s Hill Monument rears its shaft to heaven, and where the infant freedom was rocked in the ‘cradle of liberty.’”

We expect shortly to be able to report similar movements in our own country.

SCOTTISH DRUNKENNESS.

The last number of “Tait” contains an article under this head, founded upon Mr. Porter’s paper, of which we gave an abstract the week before last. The writer complains of the attempts which are made on all hands to brand Scotland as the most drunken country in the world, and is successful in showing that the reasons for placing it on that bad eminence are not so strong nor so numerous as is commonly supposed. He then proceeds to correct Mr. Porter on one or two unimportant particulars, and afterwards to discuss the causes and the cure of drunkenness. It is doubtless important to the honor of Scotland, and the interests of truth, that the real facts should be stated, and that any injustice done should be repaired. At this moment, however, we must proceed to discuss very briefly more interesting topics. There can be no doubt that the inhabitants of the British Isles have deservedly an evil reputation as it relates to drinking. The most painful and astounding statement is the naked one of figures. Here is a nation expending nearly seven millions per annum upon paupers, and an incalculable amount upon public and private charities, to say nothing of the cost of crime, and at the same time wasting upon drink, which is the fountain of seven-tenths of the mischief, a sum of not less certainly than £57,000,000 per annum. It is at this time a subordinate question whether England or Scotland expend the most in this way. The paramount inquiry is—How are we to lessen the evil?—how are the sums now wasted to be directed into their proper channels? The writer in “Tait” feels this to be a necessary and an urgent question. He does very little towards its solution, because he happens to stumble at the threshold of the inquiry. The following paragraph will show the mistake into which he has fallen. Those who have really studied the subject will not be surprised that he has run over ten pages without giving us any striking or important suggestion:—

“Now, in the case of a habit so deeply and anciently rooted, and which the bulk of men feel or believe to be not wholly evil, is it good policy to seek to reach the real evil, which is the abuse, by assailing the whole system, stigmatizing moderation as a vice, and insisting on abstinence as a duty? It is with some reluctance that we come to the conclusion that such a policy is unsound and hopeless; for it would be better that there were no drink than that there should be so many drunkards. But we are led to the conclusion that to attack all use of stimulents as an evil is, besides being untrue in point of fact, unsound, or at least useless, in point of policy; mainly by two reasons: first, the classes or individuals who at present use in moderation will not be persuaded to abstain from what they feel to be a pleasure, if not a benefit, because others tell them that it is an evil; and it is at all times a dangerous thing, although much in vogue in these days, to place in the category of vice things which natural feeling, the immemorial usage of mankind, and the ordinances of Scripture have placed elsewhere, or left free to every man's taste and conscience. Secondly, suppose that the moderate users, or any considerable portion of them, were, for the sake of example, or any other motive, to become total abstainers to-morrow, the influence on the immediate users would be trifling or nothing. The desperadoes of the Cowgate do not get drunk because the respectabilities of the New Town sip sherry and claret; they drink not from imitation, but appetite; and, if all the world beside grew total abstainers to-morrow, would go on drinking as before. The root of the evil, therefore, is in the appetite; the disorder of body or of mind, or both, which delivers up such multitudes of our poorer and more ignorant to the demon of intemperance; and if we strike at anything but that, or persist in striking even at that, with instruments which reason shows, or experience proves, to be unfitted, we shall be but losing time and wasting strength."

Now this paragraph is a sample of the reasoning which has been applied to the monster evil of our time for many years past. We give the writer credit for the best intentions; but the paragraph contains as many plausible fallacies as we ever remember to have seen crowded into so small a space. We fear that such errors may have been left to linger in the minds of many, from the advocates of total abstinence having dwelt too much upon a mere expediency view of the subject. We must endeavour to set the Temperance cause right; and in doing so, we unhesitatingly assert that total abstinence is the only philosophical, practical, and natural cure for drunkenness. We do not deny that wise sanitary regulations, education, and increased facilities for harmless and healthy recreations may lessen the evil; but we ought not to aim merely at mitigations, except as steps in our progress. The prime cause of intemperance is the prevailing opinion, which the writer shares, that strong drink is a good creature, fitted for men as an article of diet, and for its exceeding excellence as a cordial, a tonic, and a restorative. It is possible to remove the cause of the evil, and at that we must aim.

Our writer is entangled in the old cobweb of use and abuse. He does not wish to place in the "category of vice, things which natural feeling, the immemorial usage of mankind, and the ordinances of Scripture have placed elsewhere." He cannot have read the works of our Temperance writers, or he would have found that they condemn all liquors containing alcohol as injurious to the healthy human system. We believe there is no physiologist who will dispute the position they assume. What, then, becomes of the use? And where does the abuse begin? What do we mean when we talk of a natural appetite? And why appeal to immemorial usage as a warrant for the consumption of that which is in itself improper? Or why seek to surround it by more sacred sanctions? Here we take our ground. It is not a question of degree, time, or quantity. Of any strength, at any time, or in any portions, intoxicating liquors are injurious to the healthy human system. It is purely a question of science. Show that it cheers or nourishes—that it serves any useful office, and we surrender. It is placed in every pharmacopœia amongst the poisons. What, then, becomes of the natural appetite? Appetite for a poison? Men acquire an appetite for tobacco until smoking has become a public nuisance; but no one contends that it is anything but a depraved taste. On the grounds of ancient practice it cannot be defended; because each generation throws off some of the follies of the one which preceded it, and the drinking of strong liquors is one of the errors of our fathers. We have too much respect for the Sacred Scriptures to thwart them from their high purposes, and make them a standard of diet. We take the question simply to the bar of experience. We know nothing of use as applied to strong drink as a leverage. Alcohol, the product of fermentation, has its uses. What are they? Will they be found in the arts, in medicine, or in a diluted state, constituting an ordinary beverage?

We have so often gone over this ground, that we do not choose to pursue it at this time. We go to fallacy the second, which naturally enough arises out of the first, and which is thus set forth:—Suppose that the moderate users, or any considerable portion of them, were, for the sake of example, or any other motive, to become total abstainers to-morrow, &c.! Well, suppose they were, the example might not have any immediate influence upon the desperadoes, who are the victims of settled and determined evil passions and habits. But would it have no effect upon the thousands of young persons whose habits are not formed, and who, if not unchecked, may and will become desperadoes? Would it produce no good in checking the drinking usages which are found everywhere as remarkable for their absurdity as for their tyranny and danger? The example might have little effect upon the drunkard, but would it have none upon those who, now drinking moderately, will become drunkards? All the desperadoes of the Cowgate were not born or educated there—did not acquire their love of drink there! Where did they spring from? Were any of them Sabbath-school children?—members of a pious, happy household? Were none of them ever moderate drinkers? The example of moderate drinkers is training up new recruits for the army of desperadoes. How idle it is thus to talk of example! It is everything. The master, the pastor, the magistrate, all have their influence and their imitators. The child mimics his father, the foreman apes the master, and the workmen the foreman. The congregation follow the pastor, and many look upon the dignity of the magisterial office and assume its manners as their own. The greater the excellence of the man filling any one of these capacities, and the more dangerous his example, if it be evil in any one particular. It is thus that moderate drinking among the good and pious becomes a snare to thousands.

Besides, if the moderate drinkers were to give up their small cup would they not be prepared to attack intemperance with greater practical effect? We protest against a declaration which seems to release them from any share in the consequences or responsibilities of our national intemperance. If the moderate drinkers were to give up the use of drink, how many years would drunkenness be our national reproach? How would the ranks of the drunkards be filled up? The truth may be unpalatable, but it must be spoken. The pious, good, and exemplary moderate drinkers of this country are the props of intemperance. They give respectability to the drinking system; they give the weight of their character and their influence to customs, under the load of which the prosperity of the nation totters.

In many minor points our writer is correct. We agree with him that drunkenness will not be banished by mere preaching and teaching, that healthy and agreeable recreations will be among the means of lessening the attractions of the public-house, and that much may not be expected from legislative interference. We cannot, however, give our entire assent to the following position:—"It is the demand for drink that makes public-houses, not the public-houses that make the demand for drink." He forgets the reactionary influence. He makes it a question of supply and demand, without allowing for the demand that may be, and unquestionably is, stimulated by the supply. Look at the population of the Cowgate, or the low neighbourhoods of any other of our large towns. Are we to be told that, with creatures like these, whose enjoyments are all of a sensual nature, who have no care for the morrow, who lose, in the gratification of the moment, all prudential considerations;—are we to be told that it is a matter of indifference how many facilities are given them for indulgence in the most selfish of all vices. We fully concur that the appetite must be corrected to effect a radical cure; but, while educating the people, and applying other moral means to that end, is there nothing that law or Government can do? We fully believe that much may be done by judicious police regulations, by the refusal of magistrates to licence, and by instituting a surveillance over public-houses,—to check the excesses of the drunken, and to protect the comparatively sober. We must not be told that it makes no difference to our working men, who pass the streets from their workshops to their small and uncomfortable homes, whether half-a-dozen flaunting gin-shops, with sounds of music and merriment, tempt them on the way. Is it all the same on the Sabbath morning, in the midst of a dense population, whether the public-houses are closed or stand invitingly open? They know nothing of our poorer classes who believe that the number of houses for the sale of drink has no influence on intemperance. We say, remove temptation as far as possible. Of course there are limits beyond which we could not pass. To say that there shall be no houses for the sale of drink, while the appetite remains, would be impossible, and any attempt to destroy them would be abortive; or, if not so, would result in mischief as great as the one it seeks to remedy. These are only secondary remedies. We have an evil to contend with, produced by compound causes, and it would be trifling with it to depend upon any such small measures. The great error, from which all the small ones spring, is the strong-drink delusion—the belief that it is useful and necessary. We have faith in recreations and other remedies; but the grand panacea is the remedy adopted by the Temperance Society. Drink is not only evil in its consequences, it is essentially evil in itself. The disease is a vital one that cannot be effected by mere palliatives. Let the church and all the respectable drinkers cease to drink, and we shall then hope for the establishment of sound Temperance among us.—(From the Standard of Freedom.)

THE SUNDAY GLASS.—"I have no need," said a worthy clergyman, "to take part in the temperance society; we use no spirits in our family, except a glass of toddy to each of the children on a Sunday.—Parliament. Report on Drunkenness.

A BEGGAR'S CAROUSAL.—Having been called to see a dying man after midnight, on passing to his house the cries and blasphemies that assailed our ears were hideous. At last the door of the den was opened. Some of the revellers rushed out. From within we heard the following toast over their cups, "Health to the Moray-place gentry, and may they long have pence and sixpences to afford us free and easy nights!" "No," cried a voice, "nothing lower than silver can be accepted!" I wished that the premium prayers for street begging had stood beside me and listened.—Tasker's Visitor's Manual.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

QUAKER-STREET, SPITALFIELDS.

We have rarely had the pleasure of recording the proceedings of a meeting with more satisfaction than the following. On Tuesday, September 17, the Friends' School in the above street was opened, for the first time, for the advocacy of teetotalism. The room, capable of holding nearly 600 adults, was filled to overflowing. The front seats were occupied with upwards of 150 children, taught in the Sunday and Ragged Schools.

A. H. DYMOND, Esq., ably sustained the office of chairman, and explained the purpose of the meeting as preliminary to a more active and efficient support of the temperance reformation. He alluded to the abounding evils of our drinking usages, and the great good which would result from their abandonment.

Mr. W. SPRIGGS directed some remarks to the youthful portion of his audience, earnestly urging the practice of abstinence in the morning and spring of life as the only effectual safeguard against the degradation and danger to which they were exposed by the use of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. MYALL, a shoemaker, declared his ability to work much better without than with strong drink of any kind. He had been eight years a teetotaler.

Mr. SMYTHIES made an affectionate appeal to the young in favour of total abstinence, and greatly instructed the company by a telling illustration of the dark, dirty, and expensive habit of drinking, in contrast to the bright, clear, and prudent habits connected with teetotalism.

Mr. JEFFRATE, the master of a ragged school in the locality, warmly eulogized the practice of abstinence, the benefits of which he had experimentally enjoyed for seventeen years. In the course of his address he related the following revolting case of a drunken parent:—"He missed an interesting boy from his school; after some delay, and the lad not returning, he repaired to his abode, where he found his scholar a lifeless corpse, lying upon some filthy straw and rag in a corner of the room. His death, he really believed, was the result of wanting the common necessaries of life. At the same time, to his utter astonishment and disgust, the father was lying in another part of the miserable room in a state of loathsome drunkenness. This wretched man was capable of earning from 28s. to 32s. per week by his labour.

Mr. HENWOOD stated that he had been a teetotaler fifteen years, and, as a working man, found it to suit him under all circumstances.

Mr. JOSIAH PEMPHRY, a member of the Society of Friends, commended the practice of abstinence as conducive to home comfort. Parents, by abiding at home, instead of spending their time and money at the public-house, might greatly aid the instruction given to their children on the first day of the week; but, unhappily, the teaching thus imparted was, to a sorrowful extent, neutralized by negligence and intemperance at home. Mr. Pemphry concluded an earnest speech by referring to the successful efforts already made by the friends of true sobriety.

A vote of thanks to the chairman, followed by a suitable response, concluded a very interesting meeting. W. S.

FOX'S-LANE, SHADWELL.

In consequence of the success attendant upon the labours of the Shadwell teetotalers, it has become necessary to enlarge their place of meeting. In aid of this purpose a festival was held last month, when the attendance far exceeded the room for their accommodation.

At the public meeting the Rev. Mr. GRIBBLE presided, and expressed himself pleased at the necessity that caused their meeting. It was a refreshing evidence that the cause of teetotalism was on the advance. He had witnessed numerous dreadful instances of the evil effects of intoxicating liquors in cold climates, where the victims of drunkenness had been found dead, and their bodies half devoured by wolves. He enforced the practice of total abstinence upon moral and religious grounds.

Mr. HAWKEY stated that he had become a teetotaler from principle, never having been intoxicated in his life. The good effects he had seen made him very desirous to be helpful in propagating teetotalism as a stirring virtue opposed to a glaring vice.

Mr. BURT, of Poplar, delivered an energetic speech, which was listened to with great attention, and warmly applauded.

Mr. CUTCHEM alluded to the satisfactory and encouraging fact that there were teetotalers in all parts of the globe who had signed the pledge at the Shadwell-hall.

Mr. W. SPRIGGS expressed the pleasure he had frequently experienced in his repeated visits to their meetings, and heartily rejoiced in the occasion of their present gathering.

Mr. LONSDALE, home missionary, said that past success warranted their best efforts to enlarge their hall and increase their means of operation.

Mr. NICHOLL bore experimental testimony to benefits derived through the abandonment of strong drink.

Mrs. DALGARNO, after twelve months' absence on a voyage to Port Philip, was glad to have the opportunity of bearing her decided testimony in favour of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors. She had crossed the line sixteen times with her husband, frequently exposed to terrible gales and storms, accompanied with much fatigue and change of climate, and, she firmly believed, all the better for never touching wine or strong drinks.

To this very brief report of a most interesting meeting we may add that the noble ship, Loch Nagar, and her staunch teetotal commander, Captain Dalgarno, accompanied by Mrs. Dalgarno, left the St. Katherine's Dock on Friday the 6th ult., destined for Port Philip in Australia. Eleven years Captain Dalgarno has commanded the above-named fast-sailing vessel upon teetotal principles, and it would be difficult to find an instance where the practice has been more thoroughly tested, its utility more clearly exemplified, and its advantages more decidedly established, than the following fact testifies:—"The captain himself, with his worthy helpmate (who has all along shared his toils and dangers), have been found to enjoy excellent, uninterrupted health, notwithstanding perpetual change of climate, and the fatigue necessarily attendant upon a seafaring life. The crew may be truly characterized as harmonious, active, and obedient; and little sickness, and not a death on board, has occurred during the above period. The owners repose the utmost confidence in their able officer; and well they may, inasmuch as not a casualty of moment has occurred, nor a sixpence cost to the underwriters, since Captain Dalgarno had the command of the Loch Nagar."

The preceding authorised statement may, we opine, be taken as a tolerably complete refutation of some unmeaning trash that appeared in print not long ago, purporting that grog was necessary for sailors as a prevention from scurvy, it having been pretended that a teetotal crew had been afflicted therewith, and that the practice of total abstinence was the cause. From information satisfactorily authenticated, we believe it quite safe to affirm that bad water, and not abstinence from bad spirits, was the true cause of the disorder if it really prevailed.

ISLINGTON-GREEN.

On Monday, September 16th, a meeting of the members and friends of the Islington United Temperance Society, was held at the Hall, facing the Green. A large proportion of the audience consisted of the youthful members of a Band of Hope recently formed in connection with that society. After tea a public meeting was held, over which Mr. J. H. Esterbrooke presided.

Mr. J. W. GREEN addressed the adult portion of the audience on the value and importance of the total abstinence principle, both as applicable to the recovery and reclamation of the intemperate, and to the prevention of intemperance on the part of the sober; reminding them, at the same time, that prevention was better than cure.

Several of the children then recited, and others sang, various temperance hymns and poems, greatly to the pleasure and delight of the crowded audience.

The CHAIRMAN briefly related the progress that had been made as to the formation of Bands of Hope in some of the most crowded and proverbially degraded parts of the city of Westminster. After this he addressed the children and parents in a very impressive style, reminding both of the innumerable evils wrought by intemperance, and furnishing many pleasing instances of the good which had resulted from the adoption of Teetotalism. His graphic description of the drunkard's home, and the miseries of the drunkard's wife, drew tears from several females present.

Mr. HODIERNE, as an old teetotaler, rejoiced in the hold the total abstinence principle was taking of the minds of many who did not choose to join the teetotal body. Especially he rejoiced that it was comprehended and embraced by so many children and young persons.

Mr. BERRY, by profession a sweep, delivered an eloquent address of some length. He stated that he could perform his labours better as an abstainer than as a drinker of strong drinks. He was also much happier, and his family were happier, and he, as he trusted, was much more useful. He strongly urged the practice upon parents.

Mr. DREW, of Hackney, said, that though but young, he had been accustomed to visit theatres, concerts, saloons, &c. Some teetotalers, however, had taken him by the hand, and he had reason to bless God that he was now a teetotaler. He was anxious to do some good, and therefore, young as he was, he had ventured to put himself forward. He concluded by reciting some verses which he had written on the subject of "Bands of Hope," which were much applauded.

Mr. HENWOOD, from Uxbridge, related the fact of an elderly female objecting to teetotalism because "it made people so werry ridiculous;" and proceeded to relate a number of cases in which he had known the use of strong drinks to cause persons to look "werry ridiculous."

The meeting appeared to give great satisfaction and encouragement to all present. Several signatures to the pledge were obtained.

HIGHGATE.

A meeting for presenting the claims of the Temperance Reformation, was held in the large room adjoining the Literary Institution, Highgate, on Monday the 23d inst. The Rev. G. R. Birch, (Independent Minister at Finchley) presided on the occasion. The meeting opened with prayer by the Rev. H. Townley (Independent Minister at Highbury). After a powerful appeal from the chairman, the meeting was severally addressed by the Rev. H. Townley, John H. Paget, Esq. M.A. of Totteridge, T. B. Smithies, and Mr. Henwood, a working man. The meeting was crowded, upwards of 200 persons having assembled; several were compelled to remain outside for want of room. At the close of the meeting, a vote of thanks was passed to the chairman, for presiding on the occasion, and kindly granting us the use of the room. Also to the deacons of the Congregational and Baptist Chapels, and to Mr. W. Sibley for the loan of the forms. The pledge paper was then brought into requisition, and about 12 persons became pledged abstainers. The class of the people present were mostly working men, though several highly respectable ladies and gentlemen graced the assembly with their presence.

HAMMERSMITH.

Last month, the meeting in this place was addressed by rather an unusual class of advocates, namely, master chimney sweeps.—Mr. Burke, of Westminster, acknowledged that the business of a sweep was dirty and disagreeable, but not necessarily degrading, except when rendered so by drunkenness, which he was sorry to say was too often the case. Six years' teetotal practice had been very conducive to his health and happiness.—Mr. Reeves, of Kensall New Town, had been accustomed to climbing for nine years prior to the altered method of chimney sweeping. A drunken master and mistress had caused him much suffering. He had derived great good from ten months' abstinence from strong drink, and he hoped never to relinquish the practice.—Mr. Oaks, of Kensington, said that strong drink had robbed him of a good education; for, unhappily, he was taught to drink at nine years of age, and bitterly he had to deplore that teaching. Not the least of the evils connected with drinking customs was that which led men to depend too much upon others. He had done this to a very detrimental extent in his own occupation; but teetotalism had led him to depend more upon his own exertions, and he would advise all working men to adopt the same line of conduct.—Mr. Barry, of Islington, declared his ability to perform his labour a great deal better without intoxicating liquors than with them. His bodily health had improved, and his peace of mind increased since he discontinued the use of strong drink. Mr. B. urged the importance of abstinence upon the working classes; then made an affectionate appeal to parents to preserve their youth from the early seductive pipe, and their daughters from the early sugary sip of wine or strong drink.—Mr. Wilson, of Islington, owned to the physical benefit and social comfort conferred by twelve months' practical teetotalism.—A lively feeling pervaded the meeting, and a goodly number signed the total abstinence pledge at the conclusion.

PLAISTOW, ESSEX.

On Tuesday, the 20th ult., the anniversary of the Teetotal Society in this place was celebrated, when SAMUEL CATTON, the indefatigable promoter of the temperance cause, through evil and good report, was gratified by the presence of an overflowing audience, composed of friends from various parts of the metropolis and suburbs. After tea a meeting was convened in the open air, and a large company were addressed by Messrs. Townley, Provis, Moss, and Cusack. At the conclusion the meeting commenced in the hall, where T. ROBERTS, Esq., presided, and addressed the friends on the importance of inculcating the practice of total abstinence on the minds of the young.

Mr. W. SPRIGGS addressed, chiefly, the females, urging upon them the practice and recommendation of teetotalism, as a salutary preservative of female health and excellence, and as a valuable instrumentality in rearing and instructing the rising generation.

E. CLARK, Esq., of Walthamstow, urged upon the audience the importance of remembering their relationship to the common human family, and the great responsibility resting upon those who have the talents and the means of doing good. He furnished some pleasing instances of good which he had known to result from the practice of teetotalism.

Mr. GILES interested the company by explaining the properties of intoxicating liquors, and exposed the fallacious notion, but too prevalent, as to their utility.

Mr. D. WALTERS delivered an experimental address, which was most cordially cheered.

Mr. CLOWES, an abstainer for fourteen years, testified that strong drinks were in no way conducive to health, comfort, or moral excellence, but fearfully productive of crime, want, and misery.

Mr. BONNIFACE, recently returned from a voyage in the John Williams, missionary ship, to the Polynesian Islands and other parts, communicated some pleasing information as to the total abstinence cause in Hobart Town, Sydney, &c., where he found that the question of teetotalism was well understood and consistently practised by large numbers.

Short addresses were delivered by some other speakers.

The friends of temperance at Plaistow formed a "Band of Hope" at the commencement of the present year, which now numbers upwards of 400 members. A short time since these were visited by between 300 and 400 of the Woolwich youths, and together they spent a delightful day. They were allowed to visit the pleasure grounds of — Martin, Esq., who addressed them in appropriate terms. They then proceeded to the park of Samuel Gurney, Esq., to whom an address was presented; and, in the course of a suitable reply to which, Mr. G. encouraged them to repeat their visit at some future time. The whole affair was highly satisfactory.

HALSTED, ESSEX.

On the 13th ult. we had the pleasure of celebrating our third anniversary of the "Band of Hope" of this place. Arrangements for this had been in operation for some time previous by the members subscribing their halfpence weekly to enable all to mingle in the pleasures of the occasion; these being much enhanced by the urbanity of our esteemed patron, EDWARD HORNOR, of the House, kindly allowing the use of his beautiful grounds. At two o'clock groups of the juveniles assembled at Vine Cottage to await the arrival of their friends from Braintree, whose approach in vans, with banners flying, made a stir at this end of the town, and, adding considerably to our numbers, enabled us when marshalled to present a string of pedestrians equipped with unmistakable means for spending the afternoon in social enjoyment. Arriving in the park, different parties entered instantly on their various modes of adding joy to relaxation. About five o'clock upwards of 300 sat down to tables arranged under lofty elm trees, and regaled themselves with substantial viands, accompanied with innocent drinks. Tea being ended, our friend W. CLEMENTS, Baptist minister, officiated in conducting the meeting. Several of our Braintree friends delivered addresses, which were listened to with deep interest.—B. SMITH.

BANBURY.

From the fifteenth report of the Society for the Prevention of Intemperance in this town, just published, we learn that much good has resulted from its labours. A succession of lectures have been delivered in Banbury and Brockley, with the best results. In order to test the truth of their principles before a public inquiry, the following propositions have been issued:—1st. That teetotalism is in accordance with the works of God, and an expression of natural law binding upon all men. 2ndly. That the making, selling, and using of intoxicating beverages is a violation of natural and divine law. 3rdly. That Teetotalism, as a practice, a doctrine, and a system, is sanctioned by God's word in the Old Testament, and commanded in the New."

READING, BERKS.

The Primitive Methodists here are taking up the temperance cause in good earnest. On Tuesday the 17th ult. one of the best meetings ever held in this town took place in their large school-room. Addresses were delivered by the three ministers, Messrs. Bishop, Mulco, and Dobinson; also by G. P. Rickman, Palmer, and Matcham. The assembly was large, and sixteen names were added to the pledge-book. The circuit steward presided.—J. W.

LEWES.

The Report of the Lewes Juvenile Temperance Society states that during the past year thirty-two meetings have been held, at which addresses have been delivered by competent advocates. Among these we find the names of B. ROEB, Esq.; Dr. Jabez Burns; Mr. J. Cassell; and Mrs. Hardwick. Nearly 4,000 books, periodicals, and tracts have been distributed. Those most numerous issued are the "Band of Hope Journal," and the "Teetotal Times." From August 1849 to August 1850, 260 persons signed the pledge of abstinence from strong drinks, tobacco, and snuff.

HASTINGS.

A public tea-meeting, in connection with the Hastings Total Abstinence Association, was held last week in the Lecture-room, Wellington-square. A large party sat down to tea, and a public meeting was afterwards held, the chief feature of which was the detailing the personal experience of several members who had reaped advantage from the adoption of the principle of the society.

The chair was taken by the President, Mr. W. RANSOM, jun., who briefly adduced some facts in illustration of the value of teetotalism, which had come under his notice during upwards of twelve years' trial of the system.

Mr. PITTER gave a brief analysis of the report presented a few months ago by the committee appointed to inquire into the propriety of reducing the spirit rations in the Royal Navy. The speaker showed how the facts elicited by this committee, and the principles laid down by them, if not nominally of a teetotal character, were virtually so.

P. H., a sawyer, had been long a great bodily sufferer from a combination of internal diseases, and from rheumatism. His case had been given up as hopeless by the doctors; and, almost in desperation, he tried the cold-water system, and was cured. He began this three years ago, and was now well able to work, and had enjoyed better health and spirits since the adoption of teetotalism than ever before.—[This speaker is also now an active and useful member of the committee.]

J. C., bricklayer, was once a complete drunkard. Signed six months ago, and had already benefited both physically and spiritually.

F. C. had been very intemperate, but had lately become a teetotaler. He particularly cautioned parents about fostering in the young certain injurious drinking habits at home. From excessive drinking, he had twice nearly committed suicide. Had once signed the pledge for a month, and then became a "moderate" drinker, till he gradually slid back into intemperance again. He then suffered much, both in body and mind; but by becoming a teetotaler he had improved his health, and made for himself a more comfortable home.

Mr. GATES, secretary of the Juvenile Association, addressed the meeting energetically on the application of the principle to the young; and made some instructive remarks on the adulterations of malt liquors.

W. H., a railway timekeeper, had early imbibed a love of drink, because taught from infancy that it was needful. After many years of moderation, he "fell down the hill" and became a drunkard. He had been several months a teetotaler, and was now a better man for work than ever,—better in every respect, and in every relation of life—as a father, a husband, and a servant.

Mr. F. BECK, secretary, ably addressed the meeting in advocacy of the society's moral claims. He could trace many evils—social, national, and physical—to the use of strong drinks; and believed in the adaptation of teetotalism as a remedy for many of the worst ills afflicting humanity.

Mr. HARRISON, carpenter, recommended the temperance system, having been a practical teetotaler for many years.

Mr. S. DUNK, milkman, spoke in favour of the principle, as an abstainer for eight years.

H. T., an old soldier, had been for many years a drunkard; but for some time past had been benefited physically, financially, and morally, by teetotalism.

Mr. F. STREETER, baker, had been for nearly ten years a member; and energetically urged upon Christians the importance of the adoption of total abstinence by them for the good of their perishing fellow-men.

Mr. HARDING, coachmaker, believed no combination of men had such a strong moral, scientific, and practical basis, as the teetotal society. He had tried the principle personally for twelve years; and the conviction of its national, moral, and spiritual value induced him to continue attached to it. This speaker made some sensible remarks on the necessity of individual reformation as the foundation of all collective or rational improvement.

CHORLTON-ON-MEDLOCK.

Last week the fifteenth annual tea-party of the Chorlton-upon-Medlock Total Abstinence Society was held in the Temperance-hall, Grosvenor-street. About 250 persons sat down to tea.

After tea the proceedings were commenced with a hymn being sung.

The CHAIRMAN then briefly addressed the meeting, expressing his pleasure at being present at the annual gathering. He quoted his own experience as a teetotaler of thirty-seven years' standing, in proof that intoxicating drinks were not necessary to health. He wished every person to take the question into consideration, and give it a trial; and he thought they would be benefited in their health of body and serenity of mind.

The Rev. P. R. CARPENTER addressed the meeting at considerable length, contending that, though teetotalism would not necessarily make a person healthy, prosperous, or honest, it would do all that it professed to do—namely, save people from the direct evils of drinking; of course all suffered indirectly from the evils of drinking. And if it only did this, it was worthy of all the efforts that were given to it. Teetotalers found that life was sufficiently difficult even making the best of it. How, then, must it be with drinkers, who had to contend with an additional class of evils? If they adopted teetotalism from good motives, they would go on from one good thing to another. He would mention a few good results which naturally flowed from the adoption of teetotalism. It taught men to live plainly, and made them value fresh air, cleanliness, and water. He considered that Manchester, in bringing a good supply of water to the homes of each person, was doing more benefit to the other towns in England, and the world in general, than by almost any other single thing it could adopt. Teetotalism helped men to improve their minds, and led them to form mutual-improvement societies, schools, &c. Teetotalers were far more prepared to grapple with the temptations of life than drinkers. All who were lovers of holiness found living a holy life sufficient to do. Everything which strengthened the lower part of our nature was an evil; and anything which strengthened the higher part, a good. Teetotalism, though it would not necessarily make a people religious, had a natural tendency to lead people to live a religious life.

Mr. BOULTON said that they would fail, whatever means they employed, in endeavouring to elevate society, particularly the working classes, if they did not employ teetotalism, and if they employed that, and rendered it subservient to their philanthropic and religious institutions, they would promote their object.

Mr. R. NEEDHAM and Mr. JOHN ADDLESHAW addressed the meeting.

The proceedings, which were enlivened by the performance of vocal and instrumental music, terminated about ten o'clock.

OLDHAM WAKES.

On Monday, September 2, 1850, the members of the Temperance Society, and the adult and juvenile Rechabites, walked in procession through the principal streets of the town, accompanied by bands of music, and banners and flags bearing appropriate mottoes. At the silence of the bands, hundreds of voices were heard, singing temperance hymns. The most amusing part was a cottage placed upon a carriage of two compartments. In one was seen the drunkard's family, in filth and rags; in the other, a truly happy-looking pair, in a clean and neat cot, with their children. The majority of those who made up the procession were young men and women. The rear of the procession was brought up by a cart containing a printing-press, at work, striking off addresses, which were distributed amongst the crowd in the route. After the procession a tea-party was held in the large room of the Town-hall, at which 700 sat down to tea. This being over, a public meeting was held, at which PETER SEVILLE, Esq., of Wellfield-house, presided. Addresses were delivered by Rev. G. Hoade, Mr. Joseph Taylor, and Mr. G. E. Lomas. A company of glee-singers diversified the proceedings by well-selected glees, songs, and duets. The meeting broke up about 11 o'clock, highly gratified with the evening's proceedings.—J. F. SMITH.

JERSEY.

We have been favoured with a visit from the Rev. Thomas Spencer, M.A., of London, who delivered three addresses on temperance in our hall. He being the first Teetotal Minister of the Church of England who has visited this island, many who never attend our temperance meetings were induced to hear him. Mr. Spencer was favoured with numerous audiences, and we believe a good impression has been made, by the able manner in which he pleaded this cause of humanity. On the Sabbath he officiated at St. Paul's Episcopal Chapel to large congregations. Mr. Spencer, on leaving us, proceeded to Guernsey, where he delivered two addresses. His stay in either island could not thus be prolonged, but we hope he will soon revisit this island; and may he be spared long, to prosecute his views in favour of this and other philanthropic movements.

The Shapcott family, of Exeter, also performed four concerts in our hall. This interesting family consists of Mr. Shapcott and his seven sons, six of whom play on the saxhorn—the youngest, not five years old, playing the drum. They have drawn large and influential audiences, among whom were many opposed to the Temperance Movement, but who have thus had a proof that teetotalers are not without rational enjoyment. The youngest Shapcott excited admiration and surprise, as he performed his part in the "Drum Polka," without previous tuition; and the strength with which he strikes the drum is astonishing. The father took occasion, between the intervals of the pieces, to address the audience, giving them the history of his family, and introducing the teetotal topic in an interesting and impressive manner. During their stay the Shapcott family gave a concert to children, at one penny each, at which between four and five hundred were present, including those from the hospital, who were admitted free. They also gave a private concert at one of the largest boarding-schools in this island. They have received flattering notices from the French and English local press of this island. Several of the pieces played by them were asked for again, and regret was expressed at the stay of the family not being prolonged. We recommend this family to the notice of teetotal societies, as they are likely to be a source of benefit, and thus bring about a new era, when music for the people may be heard at a small cost, without having recourse to the pot-house, and be the means, also, of hastening the teetotal reformation.—JAMES METIORS, Secretary.

INTOXICATING DRINKS NOT NECESSARY TO MENTAL OR MORAL VIGOUR.

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

STRONG DRINKS are supposed to increase the energy of the body, and also to nerve and quicken the powers of the mind; and hence not only the labourer, who knows nothing of chemistry or physiology, is deceived, but the man of letters and science is led astray, and, perhaps, none more so than public speakers and ministers of religion. We often hear students, tradesmen, lecturers, and preachers assert that they could not perform their mental duties if they gave up the use of intoxicating poisons. They tell us that their spirits flag, and their strength fails, unless they drink a certain portion of these liquors daily. They also assure us that they speak from experience, because, until they have taken stimulants, they are always poorly and depressed; and further, that, after any exertion, they are quite worn out, and are not restored but by their favourite beverage.

We are not going, in this paper, to deny the feelings of debility of which our friends complain, although we are by no means prepared to admit their conclusions. It is very clear that the evidence furnished is only on one side of the question. Very few, if any, of them have given Total Abstinence a fair trial. Some have never tried it at all, while others have abstained for a week, a month, two months, or, it may be, for a year! During these short periods, also, it is not improbable that they have lived in the most injudicious manner. Some eat more than usual to make up for the loss of the filthy poison which they have abandoned. How strange that any one should suppose that large quantities of beef, eggs, "sampson," milk, &c. &c., should be necessary to supply the place of such a vile, fiery venom as alcohol! When, instead of wanting more food of any kind, those who abstain can actually do with less. Not a few, also, when they sign the pledge, drink enormously of other beverages, as milk, lemonade, ginger-beer, soda-water, &c. &c.; thus showing that, though they have abandoned a certain kind of drinks, they are still the slaves of drinking; and, as every kind of liquid taken in excess, not excepting the purest water, is of a lowering character, and injurious to health, it is no wonder if this drenching of the body should be attended with bad consequences.

In addition to all this, we have numbers who poison themselves with tobacco and snuff, and thus induce depression of spirits, indigestion, heart diseases, and various other ailments. And there are many, who adopt Total Abstinence for a while, but who are not really satisfied that alcohol is a bad thing. Their judgment is not convinced, their minds are not converted, and there is an inward hankering after the liquor. Now, we know the power of the mind over the body, and that, if any person believes that what he is eating or drinking is destructive to his health, his meals will be sure to disagree with him. Many have heard of the barber who ran home and undressed himself, and went to bed to die, because a gentleman persuaded him that he had swallowed arsenic in some jellies which he had been tasting.

We once saw an individual quite ill because he thought he had taken oxalic acid for Epsom salts. A great many who sign the pledge are in this very position. They have felt disposed to join our ranks, but still they have a host of misgivings on the score of health, and they tremble lest their lives should be sacrificed by this sacrifice of a poisonous bottle. Two or three times a day they feel their pulse; they cannot pass a looking-glass without having a peep to see if their faces are a shade paler, and, perhaps, they weigh themselves very frequently to ascertain how much flesh they have lost; and, if their pulsations should not be up to their standard of healthiness; if the unfortunate paper of the room, whiteness of the wall, or colour of the clouds should have thrown a pallid hue on their countenance; if the weighing-machine tells that a few ounces of their unhealthy corpulency is gone, so that the buttons no longer burst off their waistcoats, nor the hooks and eyes out of their gowns—alas! alas! their life is ebbing fast for want of these villainous liquors. Now, people who are thus ill-informed respecting our principles, and who have not learnt the mere alphabet of Teetotalism, are almost sure to become poorly, and break their pledge.

Very little is done to make real, staunch TEETOTALERS, until they are convinced that alcoholic drinks are poisonous, and therefore cannot be good; that, even when taken as medicines, they must, like mercury and opium, injure our constitutions, and might be exchanged for other substitutes, which would effect the cure without any of the mischief; that, if we are ill after signing the pledge, we should have been much worse if we had not abstained; and, indeed, that, under no circumstances whatever, can Total Abstinence injure us. Until these thoughts are thoroughly engraved on the minds of our members, we cannot reckon on their continuing in our ranks. Every now and then a glass will be taken medicinally; every qualm in the stomach, or supposed symptom of disease, will be received as an anti-Teetotal lecture from very high authority, and, in many instances, there will be a fidgetty searching after proofs of physical decay, arising from the loss of beer, ale, wine, or spirits.

Thinking-men generally "intermeddle" not only with "all wisdom," but with every kind of folly, and are often quite as much influenced by the latter as the former. The vagaries of intellectual geniuses would afford matter sufficient to fill a thousand novels, and fun enough to set the whole world laughing; and in nothing is this more evident than in matters of eating and drinking. The whims of many a learned man respecting diet are full of drollery. Poor fellow! he is always ill, and yet he has a panacea for everything, and can cure everybody but himself. It is no wonder, then, that many of our most unstable members are to be found among ministers of religion, and other persons engaged in intellectual pursuits. Some of them screw their nerves up to the last degree of tension; their digestive organs are always out of temper when any food is committed to their care; and it is well they are, for, if they concocted half of what is given them, the poor owner would die of plethora in consequence of taking so little exercise. Feelings of sinking, also, often occur; the spirits droop; large doses of medicine are taken; and, under all these symptoms, what so reviving as a glass of cordial? Hence, it is no wonder that numbers of these men fall away from our ranks, and do us a deal of harm; and there will be no prevention of this apostacy until it is received as a well-accredited fact, that real mental vigour cannot be drawn from a beer-barrel, a decanter, or a spirit bottle, and that the temporary aid derived from these sources has to be paid back again with tremendous interest.

Many a prodigal, to obtain money for present use, has had to pay in return not only the principal, but fifty or sixty per cent. of interest. The poor wretch, who makes a weekly use of the pawn-shop, buys his few rags of clothes over and over again. So those who obtain present and unnatural vigour from stimulants, have their old age pledged to somewhat worse than the common usurer or pawnbroker, and, before they arrive at full mental maturity, may be trembling paralytics, drivelling idiots, or miserable hypochondriacs. There is a certain distance which a coach-horse may run every day with advantage to his own health and profit to his master; but if you tax his power beyond that point, he is sure to break down long before nature intended he should. We have known men who were penny-wise and pound-foolish with respect to their cattle. They made the animal work beyond his strength, and thus killed him by hard labour, and had to pay back, in the purchase of another, more than double the profit that their cruelty had extorted from the oppressed beast which their avarice had slain. So your men who gain mental power by exciting liquors, have to pay a tremendous tax for their folly. Like the over-worked and cruelly-whipped coach-horse, they are worn out long before their time, and a happy period of years of matured intellectual power is thus sacrificed for the daily gain of a few hours of additional excitement during the earlier and less-ripened age of their minds.

No one can tell the loss which the world has thus sustained from stimulants. Thousands of men of deep thought, who have studied all their days; who have surveyed nature, Providence, and revelation; whose minds are deeply imbued with truth; who have arrived at maturity of judgment and experience; are cut off just at the very moment when they were about to bless the world with the result of their labours and observation. It is not uncommon, when these valuable individuals fall, to charge the Almighty with their deaths, and to impute their removal to the stern and inscrutable interpositions of His providence. But the event is not so mysterious as many imagine. These good and profound men would drink stimulants; no one could break them of the habit; argument and fact could not reach them. You adduced chemistry, physiology, or history, but it was no use, they loved the drink, and would have it. Appeals to their self-interest, patriotism, or religion, were of no avail; they heard the reasoning, admitted many of the statements, but went home and drank as calmly as ever; and, as the result, they poisoned their bodies, paralyzed their nerves, brought on disease or premature old age, and thus, by a natural process, destroyed themselves. There was no wonder about their death, unless we call it a wonder that the Creator does interfere by a miracle, and take out of our bodies the deadly draughts which we have wantonly swallowed. Why should the laws of nature be changed to suit our folly? Poisons are inexorable and merciless. They pay no deference to rank, wealth, learning, or piety. Arsenic is as destructive to a prince as a peasant; hemlock would as soon kill a Socrates as a barbarian; and prussic-acid would have proved as fatal to John the Baptist as to Herod or Herodias, his persecutors. "As dieth the one, so dieth the other." These venoms know nothing of respect of persons, but rigidly obey the laws of their being; and, therefore, we see the best men around us slain by the bottle. And whatever partial or momentary power may be obtained from this source, is miserably repaid by a shortened life and an enfeebled old age.

It would be easy, also, to show that Teetotalers possess as much mental vigour as others. Moses was not a weak man, and we are told that, at the age of "one hundred and twenty years, his eyes were not dim, nor his natural force abated." We have reason to believe that he was a Teetotaler all his days; but, should that be disputed, all will admit that he had nothing more stimulating than water to drink during the last forty years of his life; and yet these were his most laborious days, a period in which there was a greater demand on his intellectual powers than during any former era of his existence.

Were we to pass through history, we could adduce plenty of examples of Teetotalers, who, far from being reduced to imbecility for the want of strong drink, have exhibited just as much mental vigour as any of their brethren who have strengthened and inspired their faculties with alcohol. But the full discussion and illustration of this point would fill a volume, and, therefore, we shall not enlarge upon it here, especially as recent facts are more deserving of attention. We have some thousands of students who have not only signed the pledge, but have kept it; and we know of no instance in which their intellectual faculties have been injured. The madhouses and lunatic asylums of Europe and America may be searched, and not a single patient would be found who has lost his mind or his senses for the want of beer, wine, or spirits. The use of these poisons has peopled our Bedlams and St. Lukes; but water-drinking has never driven any man or woman to madness. Far from this, we have a host of individuals who either had nearly lost all their mental power through drink, or else never had their faculties cultivated until they abandoned these stimulants, but who are now, through Total Abstinence, men of vigorous intellects and powerful address. They bear more mental toil than ever, and do so with little fatigue, since they have given up the pot and the glass. Medical men have allowed that some of them would have been dead long ago if they had thus exercised their brains, and continued the use of strong drinks.

We could dwell for a long time on this subject, but our readers have plenty of facts at hand to substantiate the sentiment with which we commenced, that intoxicating liquors are not essential to vigour of mind. Volumes might be filled with the history of those whose minds have been injured and ruined by these beverages; and, therefore, we trust that none will allow themselves any longer to be deceived by the false delusion that their physical or mental powers would sustain the least injury from steady perseverance in Total Abstinence.

TEMPERANCE WINE.—There is a wine advertised called "Exhibition Wine." This is an unhappy title, we think; for what man in his senses would drink much of a wine that, with every sip he took, held up before his eyes the reproving word, "Exhibition?" He would naturally count his glasses, lest, from drinking too much, he should ultimately make an "Exhibition" of himself.—Punch. Query.—Has not all wine this tendency? Would it not, therefore, be better to abstain from it altogether, than to be at the pains of counting glasses? Solomon says, "Look not on the wine."

CONUNDRUM.—Why is a drunkard hesitating to sign the pledge like a sceptical Hindoo?—Because he is in doubt whether to give up the worship of the JVO-OR-NOT.

YOUNG MEN, BEWARE!

A deep and dark gulph of misery is certainly nigh the feet of those whose minds are unhinged, who have abandoned self-denial, are lost to higher aims, and set loose to sensual appetites. At first they proceed in a more moderate, and, as they think, an excusable way. Under the pretence of social intercourse, and the unbending of their minds from the fatigues of business, they have recourse to intoxicating liquors. This is the most fatal of all the snares that await the footsteps of young men—the most rapid of all the downward paths to wretchedness and crime. No man determines on a life of intemperance; but so it is, that the sight of a thousand wrecks is not sufficient to deter the new adventurer. There is a smoothness about the outer ring of the vortex that creates no alarm; and the notion of everyone that enters is, that he will change his course in due time. He fancies that he is possessed of a strong mind, and has plenty of resolution when it becomes necessary to put it in force. But he finds the hindrances more numerous than he reckoned, and more untractable than he was aware of. It is by association that the vice is at first begun and fostered; it is by the entanglements of that association that it continues to be strengthened and maintained.

Those who have been reluctantly led into the field aspire to be leaders in their turn, and brand the cowardly flight of such as would run away. But whilst mutual influences co-operate, the habit is strengthened in each; an irresistible craving is produced, and the individual, self-bound, is impelled to a deadly perseverance before he has caught a glimpse of his ruin. But when this ruin once appears, a new principle of destruction begins to manifest itself. Remorse seizes the soul, and relief from its gripe is found only in deeper indulgence. If ever the Wicked One exhibited the union of subtlety and power, it may be seen in this slow and sure process of inflicting misery and death. The process is that of a see-saw: the cut in one direction is from drunkenness to remorse, the cut in the other direction is from remorse to drunkenness. The misery resulting from broken vows, repeated relapses, ruined means, and darkened prospects, seeks with maddening fury a transient shelter in a repetition of the sin; then the sin, in its turn, gives a fresh poignancy to all the previous miseries; and these miseries again make a louder demand for the only rest they can find—viz., a repetition of the sin. What a fool a man is under a predicament so wretched! He is the subject of an operation which he hates, and yet performs with his own hands. In the working of this engine, it is remarkable that the same thing becomes alternately the cause and the effect, and these mutually augment and accelerate each other. It is a perpetual motion, a self-moving power, which needs no hand to wind it up; and on it goes till the machinery of life is suddenly broken, or worn to a shred. Let it be remembered that all this vexation of soul began with social glee; but misery when it becomes extreme has few associates, and the last stage of the drunkard is a solitude. He is left alone with his murderer. He sees himself the prey of Satan, and an heir of hell. "No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God."

See the consequences of a first departure from the path of duty, from the fear of God, and self-denial, from a firm resolve to hold fast your integrity. The incipient error, as being small, is little feared; but it is the beginning of danger. It is like the point of a wedge; and whilst the admission of the point is a bad sign of your foresight or firmness, it has put into the hands of the enemy the means of invincible power. Let it be seen, then, that a small deviation leads to a greater, that a defeat of little moment will be succeeded by more serious disasters. Look to the consequences, that you may determine to resist in due time. If, instead of zeal, there be an indifference at the outset of your career, an indifference to the first inroads of the enemy, and to the maintaining of those principles on which you all for time and for eternity depend; look to the immense, the inevitable consequence; call to mind what you have never failed to see of the first easy inlet to intemperance; how it is helped on for a time by the persuasion of others, how the propensity is gradually increased, till it gains an absolute supremacy over the whole man; how at length the ensnaring vice becomes a brutal monster, laying all waste, breaking the staff of bread and the bonds of love, stupifying the head and hardening the heart, leading to filthy and grovelling lusts, or exciting fierce passions, that terminate in flagrant crimes and a woeful death! Set this dismal train before you, and resist the first beginning of vice, as you would the sting of an adder and the coil of a serpent. Be sure the Wicked One, and his agents, the enemies of your peace, have no generosity; no heart to spare you because you are vanquished and weak. They will thicken their ranks, and multiply their wiles, so long as they have an end to serve; but, meanwhile, there is a worse state of matters within. Your evil propensities are gaining ground by every indulgence, whilst your powers of resistance are diminished from day to day. Hence it is that, however deep the gulph may be into which you have fallen, there is a deeper still; and as the tendency is all downward, though the depth be viewed as the very pit of perdition, the dread of falling produces no re-acton, but the mere consciousness of a doom; and the fall differs from that of a stone only in being that of a living thing, accompanied with a sense of dereliction and the agony of despair.—From a Lecture on "The Peculiar Dangers to which Young Men are Exposed," by Nathaniel Paterson, D.D., Glasgow.

METHODIST TEMPERANCE CONVENTION IN AMERICA.

A Convention of Ministers and Members of the M. E. Church in East Jersey, was held in Newark, on Tuesday, September 10. The object of the convention, as stated in the call, was to direct attention to the languishing state of the Temperance Cause in the community, and to devise means for producing a great temperance revival. Delegates were present from twenty-four different churches. Accounts were given of the present condition of the cause in the various sections of the country represented, and interesting discussions held concerning the best means of reviving an interest in the subject. The convention held two sessions, morning and afternoon, and in the evening a large public meeting was held, at which addresses were delivered by the Rev. Messrs. Owen, Greaves, and Briggs.

Among the resolutions are these:—

"That the interests of the cause demand a reproduction of the great temperance facts presented by the fathers of the work years ago, together with such accumulated testimony as the progress of events has developed."

"That the various Temperance Societies which have become inactive should be urged to renewed effort; and where they have ceased to exist, new societies should at once be organized."

"That legislative action to prohibit the traffic in intoxicating liquors, except for medicinal or mechanical purposes, be earnestly and perseveringly sought."

RECREATION versus DRINK.—It is a curious fact, that the members of the wine and spirit trades have found a very sensible difference in the consumption of wines and spirits since the excursion trips have become so numerous. They say that much of the money usually spent in these commodities goes in excursion trips. It is more especially felt in London and other large towns, particularly the manufacturing.—Exeter paper.

CONCLUSIVE.—An American paper says—"When you see a gentleman at midnight sitting on the step in front of his house, combing his hair with the door-scraper."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE SONS OF TEMPERANCE—UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

(To the Editor of the Teetotal Times.)

SIR,—The gross violation of the rights of humanity by the "Sons of Temperance," of the United States of America, I think, will be a sufficient apology for my troubling you with a few remarks on the subject.

In the Volume of Inspiration we are informed that God made of one blood all the nations that dwell upon the earth; but while we find none daring enough to deny the language of Him, who by the word of his power brought all things from nothing, yet we are pained to find that even in this enlightened age, men who claim to belong to the Church of the Living God on earth, by practice, deny the plain truth. Thus, while the Temperance Reformers of Great Britain have much to contend with in the intemperance of the masses, their hearts are filled with grief when they behold such a breach of the common rights of humanity as has been exemplified by our transatlantic brethren, who, though they have proved themselves such zealous temperance advocates, have been so far behind in their duty towards those who differ from them in the colour of their skin. The time is surely come for the Americans, at least those who so boldly and fearlessly declare themselves the friends of Total Abstinence, to cast to the winds their notions of unrighteous prejudices against the coloured population of the States.

Viewing matters in this light, the Committee of the Poole Temperance Society, at their general quarterly meeting, thought fit, on the proposition of Mr. George Curtis, to express their indignation by the following resolution;—

"Resolved,—That this meeting views with alarm and disapprobation the late movement of the Sons of Temperance in America, by which all men of colour are excluded from their fellowship, and earnestly hope that every society in the world will signify a like disapproval; and the friends in America will, by their remonstrances, be led to retrace their steps, and to acknowledge the great principle that GOD HAS MADE OF ONE BLOOD ALL NATIONS OF MEN."—J. BARKER, Chairman.

This proposition was carried unanimously, and heartily do they wish that it should be the unanimous language and breathing of every society, that we may let America see that Britons view with feelings of disgust the immoral, unchristian character of the representatives of the late "Grand Divisions of the Sons of Temperance." Let all the societies throughout the land declare their mind on this one point, and let THE TEETOTAL TIMES be the channel through which they may convey their feelings on this important subject. Not only will it tend to show the oppressors our disgust at their actions, but convey to our poor, despised, neglected brethren whose rights are thus trampled on, that their temperance friends in the old world have hearts that sympathize with them, and gladly extend to them the right-hand of brotherhood as being part of the great family of Adam.—Yours truly, Poole, Oct. 15, 1850. WM. MATE, Secretary.

THE BIBLE SOCIETY AND THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE.

(To the Editor of the Teetotal Times.)

DEAR SIR,—As many of the Bible Society meetings are now being held in various parts of the country, allow me to name to my temperance friends an easy mode of drawing the attention of the Christian public to the important bearing of our principles upon the funds of benevolent societies.

At the recent Holloway Bible Meeting, a note was forwarded to the Rev. C. W. Edmonstone, vicar, who occupied the chair, respectfully suggesting that he would bring the following "solemn truth" before the notice of the meeting, viz. :—

"That the Bible Society, even on its present gigantic scale of operations, cannot in the next hundred years supply a copy of the Bible to every poor heathen; whilst the sum spent by British Christians in intoxicating liquors in one year would at once supply every one of the 700,000,000 of poor benighted heathens with a two-shilling copy of the sacred Scriptures."

This was impressively read to the meeting, and apparently found a lodgment in many hearts.

Let a somewhat similar course be judiciously adopted in other places, and good will be done.—I am, dear Sir, yours very truly,

T. B. SMITHIES.
London, Oct. 24, 1850.

GREAT EXHIBITION OF 1851.

If the following suggestion be feasible, I hope means will be devised for carrying it out, viz. :—Let there be a roll at the Exhibition, containing fac-similes of the signatures of as many reformed drunkards as can be got to send their names to be attached to the following simple

DECLARATION :

The undersigned were once drunkards, but have been reclaimed by signing and keeping the Teetotal Pledge :—

Name.	Occupation.	Residence.
John Smith.	Painter.	Exeter.

I would not encumber it with anything about age, length of standing, &c. &c., because if the Roll be once obtained, it can be afterwards arranged, digested, &c. for a pamphlet. I think the opportunity eminently favourable for getting such a return; as thousands would be stimulated to send their names for so memorable an occasion, who would be listless in more ordinary times.

The names might be sent by post to some place in London, where the fac-simile might be transferred to the Roll with its gold-lettered heading.

Who will follow up the suggestion?

H. MUDGE.

Bodmin, Cornwall, Oct. 22, 1850.

GREAT INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION, 1851.

It is our intention to publish, in THE TEETOTAL TIMES, such information as may serve to guide our Teetotal friends, especially those from the country, on their visit to the Great Metropolis. This information will include the following particulars :—

1. A list of persons, with correct addresses, who keep economical Temperance boarding-houses, or who can let beds; with the number of beds each person can render available, and the terms.

2. Suggestions to working men, as to the most economical mode of proceeding; the transit from place to place; manner of living; the regulations of the different railways throughout the kingdom, for the conveyance of passengers at a cheap rate; the exhibitions of London, and the mode of obtaining admission to them; the omnibuses to be inquired for, and their charges;—in fact, every hint or suggestion which may prove of service to the artisan, or be a guide to him in his visit to the Metropolis.

Teetotalers residing in the Metropolis, who intend to open such boarding-houses, or to let beds, are requested to forward their names, addresses, number of beds, terms, and other particulars, to JOHN CASSELL, 335, Strand, London.

WHICH IS HEAVIEST?—A man said to another, "Which is heaviest—a quart of rum, or a quart of water?" "Rum, most assuredly," said the other; "for I saw a man who weighed 220 pounds staggering under a quart of rum, when he could have carried a gallon of water with ease."

RATHER OMINOUS.—A pedlar overtook one of his class on the road, and thus accosted him:—"Halloo, fiend, what do you carry?" "Rum and whisky," was the prompt reply. "Good," said the other; "you may go ahead; I carry grave-stones."

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

DEVIZES.

A meeting was held, October 2, at the Town-hall, for the purpose of hearing an address from Benjamin Rotch, Esq., Chairman of the Middlesex Bench of Magistrates. G. W. Anstie, Esq., took the chair.

Mr. Rotch delivered an argumentative and highly effective address, in the course of which he showed that it was both practicable and desirable to carry out the principles of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks, which principles he had himself acted upon for a period of 35 years. He first spoke of the prejudices which exist in the minds of most persons in favour of our drinking customs, prejudices received in earliest infancy, and strengthened by the common conventionalities of society. It was, therefore, but natural that the people should have a strong and powerful feeling that strong drink was a blessing sent to us from heaven. But it was no such thing: and this they would see if they looked at the matter in its proper light. They would find it to be the most active source of crime in the country; denounced, in its excess, by holy writ, and, in fact, the right-hand weapon of Satan to ruin and disgrace our nation. Those who were best able to judge of this matter—the Judges of the land—had long ago found this out. Their testimony—in the time of Lord Bacon, and of Sir Matthew Hale, as well as at the present moment—was, that full nine-tenths of the crime of this country originated directly or indirectly from the use of strong drinks. As yet nobody seemed to listen to it, or to care one straw about the matter. The unfortunate habit of excessive drinking had crept into all ranks and shades of society. The bar, of which he himself was a member, was not free from it; the army and the navy were daily being exposed before the public on account of it, in the dismissal of their officers; and the practice had even made its way into that body which above all they would desire to see free from it—the Church! Yet, after all, the impression which undoubted and painful instances in proof of this, produced upon the public mind, was but slight. They saw a poor drunkard staggering from side to side, as he passed along the streets, and—they laughed at him! What! a creature of whom it was denounced that "he should not enter into the kingdom of God"—to be laughed at! Rather let them pity him, and seek his restoration. They were willing enough to give their aid to other schemes of benevolence. If a proposal for the building of an hospital in this town were made, no gentleman in the neighbourhood would refuse to give in his subscription to such an object—and that not to benefit himself, but his poorer neighbour. Why not do the same for Teetotalism? They would be scared out of their wits if they heard that twenty people in their district had died of cholera. And yet thousands were dying of drunkenness, and they thought nothing about it. There was not a scourge sent us in the shape of any disease whatever that destroyed 1-8th part of the number which intemperance carried off every year. Why, upwards of 60,000 persons die yearly from the effects of strong drink, in this kingdom alone! He would ask if there could be any other disease carrying off its victims with anything like such dreadful and extensive fatality, that would not instantly occupy the attention of every medical man in the country? Of course it would; they would be considered monsters if they did not immediately seek out for a remedy. But here, people appeared to think that no remedy could be found. He believed this arose from ignorance of the subject; and could not but think that every professing Christian who once became acquainted with the statistics of teetotalism and of drunkenness, must come forward and aid their cause to the utmost of his ability. He believed when the people were once persuaded that they had, either from misapprehension or from a want of a proper knowledge of the subject, been misled into believing this movement an unimportant one, they would at once endeavour to do something towards helping it forward. Mr. Rotch then alluded to some of the physical results of habitual drinking, contending that, although a glass of brandy, under some peculiar circumstances—(such as he had himself once seen, where a patient was sustained by this means during the amputation of a leg)—yet its constant use would inevitably destroy his powers of digestion, and otherwise impair his health. The social and domestic evils of the custom were also briefly referred to and illustrated, and the wisdom of endeavouring to save the unhappy victims of its influence from the workhouse and the gaol, rather than of maintaining and punishing them there, was pointed out. Why, what ailed the common sense of this land, when the rate-payers went on paying ten times as much as they needed, because, forsooth, they could overlook the great cause of all the crime and distress existing—the drinking customs of society. He was not now speaking of drunkenness, but of the common drinking usages of society, by which the people were taught that there was no harm in drinking a little, and thus a class of moderate drinkers was formed, from whose ranks all the drunkards in the country arose (cheers). He asked all who heard him to countenance the movement by every means in their power—by subscribing to its funds, by attending its meetings, by recommending its principles, by employing as servants those who practised its principles, and by all other means that presented themselves. If any of those present still thought that the use of strong drink was necessary for the human frame, he would refer them to one fact. In the prisons of the Metropolis no fewer than 2,000 persons were constantly confined; these were there for different periods of time, some of them for as long as three years. Now, those persons, from the moment they entered the prison to the hour of their departure, never took anything but water, and there never was an instance known yet of a person suffering in the smallest degree from that treatment (cheers). Mr. Rotch then made a personal reference. He was an acting magistrate in a large county, and therefore the judge in many important cases. Now, his Bible taught him thus: "It is not for kings, O Lemuel, to drink wine, nor princes strong drink;" they were to be total abstainers. And why? "Lest he drink and forget the law, and pervert the judgment of the afflicted." He felt himself, as a magistrate, bound by that text to abstain, and he believed that it applied equally to all magistrates. He should be rejoiced, too, to see the ministers of religion taking up the cause, for he was aware that it would never make any very rapid progress until they did so. He was, indeed, at a loss to imagine how a class of men who were above all others seeking the welfare of their fellow-men, could see it right not to join this movement, so eminently calculated to accomplish that object (hear, hear). After making some further remarks upon the subject, Mr. Rotch concluded his address amidst considerable applause.

Mr. G. W. ANSTIE then proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Rotch, which was seconded by the Rev. Mr. Howe, Baptist Minister, of Warminster, and acknowledged, after which the meeting broke up.

In the evening a second meeting was held, Mr. Rotch presiding, when some resolutions were carried for establishing a County Temperance Society. Mr. G. W. Anstie, Rev. Mr. Howe, Mr. J. J. Fox, Mr. S. Saunders, Mr. Smith, of Trowbridge, and Mr. W. Cole, of Calne, addressed the meeting; and they were followed by Mr. Rotch, in a lengthened and deeply-interesting address. A vote of thanks was again passed by acclamation to the last-named gentleman, and a similar vote accorded to the Mayor for the use of the Town-hall on the occasion.

SELBY.

A bill, of which the following is a copy, was extensively circulated in Selby some days ago:—"It has been asserted that working men cannot perform hard work without intoxicating drinks. To prove that this is a fallacy, seven of your fellow-workmen will attend at the Victoria Room, at eight o'clock, on Tuesday evening next, the 1st of October, 1850, and state that for several years they have never tasted intoxicating drinks, and that they can do their work better without than with them." A meeting consequently took place, and a better meeting has not been held in Selby for a long time. The place was crowded, not only by working men, but by many of the middle ranks of society. Mr. Morrell was called to the chair, and he gave some interesting statistics from Mr. Porter's paper, read before the British Association for the Advancement of Science, and from Mr. Sheriff Alison, the historian of modern Europe. He also gave some interesting statements from a leading article in the Leeds Mercury, which has since been published as a tract, entitled "Working men, Seize the Crisis, and lay the foundation of future independence and comfort." He then called upon several working men, some of whom were reclaimed drunkards,

TEMPERANCE BANDS OF HOPE.

Amongst the "signs of the times" most cheering to the friends and promoters of the Temperance Movement, is the formation of those interesting societies of children called "BANDS OF HOPE," in almost every part of the kingdom. On these BANDS we may confidently found the HOPE,—first, that a large number of children will receive that instruction which shall be as armour, making them proofs against the insidious drinking customs of our country; secondly, that the cause will be intelligently advocated and zealously promoted when we are laid in the grave; and, thirdly, that the parents of many of the members of these youthful Bands will be induced, as well for the sake of their children as for their own sakes, to abandon altogether the use of intoxicating liquors. Indeed, delightful instances are daily coming to our knowledge, in which the members of these Bands have stoutly and resolutely resisted every temptation to the use of intoxicating liquors; and in which, also, they have intelligently and successfully advocated the practice among their brethren and sisters, their fathers and mothers, and others of their relations, playmates, and neighbours. Some of them have become assiduous tract distributors, and others successful collectors of funds.

That the increase of these BANDS OF HOPE is desirable, it is not necessary to argue. The importance of a Teetotal education, and the advantages of Juvenile Teetotal Societies, will be acknowledged by many, and assuredly by every consistent Teetotaler. It is certain that the taste for strong drinks is not natural, but acquired. It therefore depends upon those who have the nursing and training of children whether we shall have a sober or a drunken country. If parents vitiate the tastes of their children, fire them with the stimulus of alcohol, and make them dependent upon wine, spirits, and beer for animal excitement, they do much towards making them fond of these liquors, and, in hundreds of cases, will render them drunkards. Their palates, their earliest and liveliest emotions, and their association with others like themselves, will attach them to the pot and the bottle: thus the labours of Teetotalers will be greatly counteracted, and what wonder if we should become more literally than ever a NATION of drunkards! But let the contrary be the training of children. Let them never touch these poisons. Let them from very infancy be taught to loathe them, to comprehend their injurious properties, and to mark their destructive influence on others. Let them understand plainly that no one can use these liquors, even in small portions, without being injured by them, while excess in the use of them is sure to injure the health, the property, the comfort, the character, and in many cases to lead to disease, to beggary, to crime, and to a premature grave. Let parents teach their children, in addition, that the best protection against these evils is, first, to pledge themselves never to use the destructive drinks; and, secondly, to associate with those who are of the same mind; to form themselves into BANDS OF HOPE, and to assist and promote the Temperance cause by every means in their power. Let parents do this, and then we may confidently indulge the hope that the principle of true Temperance will take deep root in their children's hearts, and become a ruling motive in their future lives.

We trust that all Teetotal Parents, Teetotal Committees, Ministers of Religion, Teachers and Superintendents of Sabbath-schools, and all to whom is committed the training of children in the way they should go, will, by their advice, prayers, and every means in their power, encourage and promote the formation of TEMPERANCE BANDS OF HOPE.

It is pleasing to find that in America a most active Temperance Movement is being carried on in the Sabbath-schools, which has already been productive of much good. The following proposed plan of operation is gathered from one of the American Sunday-school magazines:—

SUNDAY-SCHOOL EFFORT.

There are in Great Britain about two millions of Sunday scholars between the ages of five and fifteen. What a mighty cold-water army they would be were they all enrolled on the Temperance Pledge. King Alcohol would despair of another generation of drunkards. An organization is very simple.

PLAN.

Let the superintendent keep a roll-book, and let every teacher bring up each scholar in his or her class that shall be willing (having the consent of parents) to sign the pledge, and enrol their names. On signing the pledge, every child to be presented with a certificate of membership. Of the organization the superintendent should be president, and each sex should choose a secretary or registrar. Thus organized, each school should have a temperance banner, with Scripture motto, suitable instruction, occasional public meetings, and exercises, to keep up an interest in this department of Christian benevolence. In those cases where the superintendents do not unite with the movement, let there be no dissension, but let each temperance teacher be provided with a class pledge-book.

IMPORTANCE.

The importance of this enterprise can only be known in eternity. If one child in each school can be kept by it from intemperance, it will more than compensate for all the labour. But it will enlist the children on the side of temperance, and make them active promoters of one of the most important moral reforms the world has ever known. Where, then, is the pastor, parent, or teacher, who will not bid it God speed?

OBJECTIONS ANSWERED.

1. A Sunday-school is organized for religious instruction, and not for a temperance society.

Ans. True. And it so continues. The temperance organization neither changes its nature nor interferes with its object.

2. Many parents who send their children to the Sunday-school might object to their signing the temperance pledge, and might take them away if the organization was made.

Ans. It might have been so once, but it is believed it will not be so now. Where is the parent now found who is unwilling that his child should sign the temperance pledge? Even the drunkard recommends total abstinence for his children.

3. This may lead to similar organizations for the accomplishment of other objects, and produce discord and ruin in the school.

Ans. It is not a necessary consequence, nor has it ever been known to follow, when conducted with Christian prudence. On the contrary, it tends to compassion for the drunkard, and promotes a spirit of benevolence.

4. It is gathering but a portion of the children of the place into the cold water army, and those who need it least.

Ans. This may be true. But one thing at a time. Sunday-schools are already in existence, and for a moral and benevolent purpose. The temperance enterprise may easily be engrafed on them; and through them it may be extended to other children, until the whole of the rising generation may be saved from our drinking customs.

5. It is impracticable: at least it may not succeed.

Ans. It has been done, and done with great success, and great delight to parents and children. It is no new thing, and where it has been tried it has resulted in no evil, but in great real good. Let it be tried in every Sunday-school throughout the land. We earnestly invite all Sunday-school Teachers and all parents to engage in it.

P.S.—It is requested that notice of the formation of Bands of Hope be sent to the Secretary of the Sunday-school Temperance Union, 5, Kirby-street, Hatton-garden, London.—From the Temperance Almanack for 1851.

VIRTUES OF WATER.

Dr. PARIS says:—"He is happy who considers water as his best and only drink."

Dr. TROTTER says:—"In a survey of my whole acquaintance and friends, I find that water-drinkers possess the most equal temper and cheerful dispositions."

Dr. BARTON, author of a work entitled "Hints for Naval Officers cruising in the West Indies," says:—"A more robust and vigorous state of health could scarcely be found than generally prevailed (among the officers of a vessel called the Brandy-Wine, during a cruise) in the steerage, with one exception of convulsive disease; and yet these gentlemen are well deserving the remark, one and all, of most entire temperance, having drunk water only in their messes during the whole cruise. I am of opinion that young officers should drink nothing, habitually, but water; because I think water is decidedly the most conducive to vigorous health."

GREAT TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION,
DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

We have just time to state that this meeting, which was looked forward to with much anxiety by its projectors, was held on Monday evening, the 28th ult., under the most gratifying circumstances. It was, indeed, the finest Teetotal Meeting which has been held since that held in connection with the World's Temperance Convention in 1846. The spacious building presented a very pleasing and encouraging appearance, and, though not crowded, was well filled, notwithstanding charges were made for admission, from 6d. to 1s. 6d. LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, Esq., M.P., presided; and addresses were delivered by John Cassell, Esq., George Cruikshank, Esq., Mr. Parker, the Rev. William Forster, the Rev. George Copway (or Kah-ge-gah-bowh, the Ojibway chief), Rev. G. W. M'Cree, and Mr. T. A. Smith. The addresses were delivered with great animation, and were received by the audience with unmistakable demonstrations of approval. The SHAPCOTT FAMILY, the celebrated Sax Horn Band, from Exeter, performed select pieces at intervals.

A full report of the proceedings will be given in our next. A report of great length appeared the next morning in the Daily News; and reports of various lengths appeared, also, in the Times, Morning Chronicle, Morning Herald, and other papers.

THE SHAPCOTT FAMILY.

The engagements of these distinguished performers are as follows.

Friday, Nov. 1, British School, Kentish-town.
Monday, Nov. 4, Suffolk-street, Borough-road.
Tuesday, Nov. 5, Hawkstone-hall, Waterloo-road.
Wednesday, Nov. 6, British School, Harp-alley.
Thursday, Nov. 7, Town-hall, Brentford.
Friday, Nov. 8, Town-hall, Woolwich.
Monday, Nov. 11, Literary Institution, John-street, Fitzroy-square.
Tuesday, Nov. 12, Great-hall, Broadway, Westminster.

To commence on each evening at HALF-PAST SEVEN o'clock.

THE CRYSTAL SPRING.

Give me a draught from the crystal spring,
When the burning sun is high;
When the rocks and the woods their shadows fling,
Where the pearls and pebbles lie.

Give me a draught from the crystal spring,
When the cooling breezes blow;
When the leaves of the trees are withering,
From the frost or the fleecy snow.

Give me a draught from the crystal spring,
When the win'try winds are gone;
When the flowers bloom, and the echoes ring
From the woods o'er the verdant lawn.

Give me a draught from the crystal spring,
When the rip'ning fruits appear;
When the reapers the song of harvest sing,
And plenty has crowned the year.

Give me a draught from the crystal spring,
Let me drink it day by day;
But if aught from the worm of the still you bring,
I'll pour ev'ry drop away.

A SMILE ON DRUNKENNESS.—An American preacher, descanting upon the impossibility of the drunkard retracing his steps after he had gone a certain length, made use of the following simile: "My brethren, it is a very easy task to row a boat over the Falls of Niagara, but it is an all-sufficient job to row it back again."

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

who nobly came forward and bore testimony, after many years' experience, that they could perform hard work better without intoxicating drinks than with them. Several working men signed the pledge, and one of them signed against smoking as well as drinking. He said he had smoked for 35 years, and had spent a little fortune by it.

TEMPERANCE FESTIVAL.

Monday evening, October 14, there was a large gathering of the friends and supporters of the Temperance Movement, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street. The large room being soon filled with guests, two adjoining rooms were opened and occupied. After tea, a meeting for the advocacy of temperance was held, over which JOHN CASSELL, Esq., presided. He expressed the delight he felt in witnessing so numerous and respectable an assembly, which he thought augured well for their forthcoming campaign. As the friends of temperance, their object was clear and intelligible; and it was most encouraging to observe, that in propelling their great moral engine, they had not now to encounter those petty obstacles which formerly obstructed their course. The thousands who had been rescued from the abyss of intemperance, and who had become members of Christian churches, demonstrated that the object of temperance reformers was not to interfere with the progress of the gospel, but rather to remove hindrances out of the way. They could point to homes once miserable, but now comfortable; to wives once sorrowing, but now rejoicing; to children once ill-fed, badly clothed, and uneducated, but now cared for and trained in the right path; and this proved that the object of temperance societies was not to depress but to elevate the working-classes; not to abridge their comforts, but to add to them most materially (cheers). The value and utility of the temperance principle was now fully admitted, and was recognised even by the Government of the country, as was evident from the recent regulations as to the use of strong drinks in the army and navy (cheers). He trusted that in this respect the Government of England would soon imitate the Government of America, and entirely prohibit the use of intoxicating liquors throughout the navy, and, like that Government, abolish also the degrading punishment of the lash (applause). Let but the friends of temperance be united and active, and they would reduce one of the most prolific sources of evil by which the nation was afflicted (cheering).

The Rev. W. W. ROBINSON, A.M., Incumbent of Christ Church, Chelsea, stated that he had been nine years and a half a teetotaler, and his only regret was that he had not been one forty years (hear). He had been induced to adopt the practice in consequence of the powerful arguments of a Christian lady, and with a view to increase his influence in attempts to redeem the profligate. He had, however, derived much physical good from the practice, and Providence had graciously blessed his labours to the reclamation of many. Though a minister of the Established Church, he cordially united with all who loved the Lord Jesus Christ in everything which had to do with the welfare of his fellow immortals; and, regarding the temperance cause as the handmaid of religion and piety, he could not but lament that so few of his brethren in the ministry were united with them. He regarded teetotalism as a physical remedy for a physical disease; the avenues to spiritual good were closed up by the use of strong drink, and teetotalism opened those avenues; and though it did not make men religious, it yet prepared their minds for the reception of religious truth, and the result was that many of them became decided Christians (hear, and cheers).

An appropriate melody was then sung by a select choir.

GEORGE CRUKSHANK, Esq., was received with loud cheers. He said he attended there that evening to declare his adhesion to this great and glorious cause. He was a teetotaler of three years and a-half standing, and was only sorry that he had not been a staunch and uncompromising member of the society for the whole of his life. He had twice been requested to take wine by his medical adviser during illness, but he had refused, although he had been told it would perhaps risk his life; and yet he now stood before that meeting in very good health (hear, hear). They all knew how the name of the London Tavern was associated with every great political movement, and almost every charitable institution in the kingdom; yet on no former occasion had that room been used for a greater or more philanthropic cause than the present; and it was certainly a great triumph to the teetotalers that they occupied the greatest assembly-room of the first city in the world, and that without a drop of champagne or any of the other usual wines, or even whisky or whisky-toddy (a laugh). It was necessary to have the people sober before they should make progress in any other species of reform, because it was of "no use talking to a drunken man." There was no originality in that idea, but it was one that had been forcibly impressed on his mind on a late occasion, when he attended with his friend, Mr. H. Mayhew, the writer of the London letters on "Labour and the Poor," in the Morning Chronicle. That gentleman had collected together a number of costermongers, who said, themselves, that they were the lowest class in London, but even they were trying to elevate themselves a little now. This class had arranged to hold a supper and ball, and, having been invited, he attended with his friend. The supper passed off very pleasantly, and the ball also; but during the entertainment two men who had been drinking—no doubt to get up that sort of courage which many people require before they kick up a row (laughter)—forced themselves into the assembly. All the entreaties to keep them quiet were unavailing, when one thoughtful costermonger got up, and, shaking his head, exclaimed, "Ah, it's no use talking to a drunken man!" (laughter.) Mr. Cruikshank concluded by expressing his regret that he was unable to support the cause in a pecuniary sense so well as he could wish, but he should gladly give it the humble aid of his pencil and pen (cheers).

The Rev. W. FORSTER, of Kentish-town, delivered an eloquent and impressive address. He had, he said, been a practical abstainer for some time, but had entertained some foolish prejudices as to pledge taking; he thought it argued mental and moral weakness—that it would prevent that elevation of moral power upon which a man ought to rest—that it would keep a man, as it were, in leading-strings—in a state of pupillage, or minority. But he found that while insulated he was comparatively powerless, he therefore determined to sign the total abstinence pledge, not to preserve himself from the dangers of strong drink, but to encourage and assist the youths and others of his congregation (cheers). He regretted that he had not joined the society sooner, as he had benefitted considerably by the practice. The rev. gentleman then proceeded to remind the friends of temperance that the battle was not yet fought, and that though the victory, when achieved, would be great, that the welkin did not yet ring with the shouts of the victors. Drunkenness was striking men down by thousands every year, including both youth and manhood; it had made its fastnesses and fortresses in distilleries, breweries, gin-shops, public-houses, and even private families (hear). But still there was no room for despair. Some might say the cause was hopeless; then the cause of humanity was hopeless—the cause of philanthropy, of morality, of religion, of all that was good, was hopeless too! Some might say, "You may as well attempt to beat down the walls of a city with a feather, as attempt to demolish the strongholds of intemperance. But he had faith in God—in Christ—in the Holy Spirit—in the power of truth, and success was certain. An awakening was taking place among all classes of the community, and they might be assured that their efforts would prevail. Mankind would be restored—would become radiant in moral beauty and in spiritual excellence; earth would become a moral paradise, and peace and heavenly benediction would be pronounced upon a world ransomed and redeemed (much cheering).

Another melody was then sung, and a collection in aid of the funds of the society was then made.

The CHAIRMAN then introduced the Rev. George Copway, formerly a chief of the Ojibway Indians, under the name of Kah-ge-ga-Gah-Bowh; and observed that the chief had visited this nation, not merely to gratify his own curiosity, or that of others, but to instruct, and especially to interest the people of this country in behalf of the native Indians of America (hear).

The Rev. G. COPWAY, who, on rising, was greatly cheered, said, he had found that in this country, as in his country, it was very common to have a tavern at one corner, and a church or chapel at the other. It was by means of the firewaters that the English had sought to subdue his countrymen; but since the Temperance Reformation had commenced, waves had come from this country to wash away the former stains (hear). The temperance cause was gaining in the opinion of good men, and there was good reason to hope that they would unite to promote it, in accordance with the Spirit of the Gospel. While the drinking custom prevailed, little or no progress was made in education or religion; but since temperance had sprung up, it had formed, as it were, railroads and electric telegraphs, and good principles ran through all the country (cheers). Temperance men were now beginning where their forefathers ought to have begun. Ships were freighted with New England rum at the bottom, tiers of Bibles in the middle, and missionaries at the top; but before the missionaries of the Bible could get through the land, the devil's missionaries had been before them (hear, hear). Formerly, men took the sword in one hand, and the Bible in the other; but they had become disgusted with blood and carnage, and, more lately, they took the Bible in one hand, and rum in the other (hear). But he looked forward to a day when a man who made and sold intoxicating drink would be as much wondered at as teetotalers were when they made their first appearance. He should like to live to see that day—(cheers)—for the purpose of putting such a man in a glass-case, to let people see what sort of a creature a rum-seller was (laughter, and cheers). Oh, the power of strong drink! It made men weak, vicious, and altogether bad. Man was a great and noble being. The eagle might soar to the sun, but he must come down again; but man could soar, could rove from star to star, and still rise higher and higher. But when he saw a man diseased in body, from head to foot, his noble frame made feeble and infirm, and his mind, as well as his body, weakened and ruined by strong drink, he could not but rejoice in the progress of the temperance principle (cheers). Mr. Copway then narrated some of the miseries brought upon his countrymen by the use of the fire-waters—destruction far greater than that wrought by guns and swords; and concluded by expressing his earnest hope that the temperance cause might greatly prosper (applause).

After another melody had been sung,

MR. J. W. GREEN then read the following statement:—Most of the friends present must be aware that a series of large Temperance Meetings in Exeter-hall was commenced in October last; and it is now matter of pleasing history, that those meetings were well attended, and that many intelligent and effective addresses were delivered. By these means a large fund of information, on all points connected with the Temperance Movement, was furnished to the thousands who attended, and, through the medium of the press, diffused throughout the kingdom and the world. Not only were fair reports given in several of the daily papers of London, but abstracts were published in a variety of Temperance and other periodicals, in this country, and also in the East and West Indies, in Nova Scotia, British Canada, and the United States of America. Several of the most intelligent and experienced friends and patrons of the Temperance Movement, have testified their approbation of these meetings in the most decided and unequivocal manner. Many societies in the manufacturing and agricultural districts have adopted similar modes of arresting public attention, and of communicating information. The apathy and indifference of thousands of Teetotalers have been exchanged for zeal and activity. The regular meetings of local societies have been materially improved. And an acknowledgment has been drawn forth from some of the leading promoters of philanthropic and political movements, as to the soundness of the Teetotal principle, and as to the intimate connection between its prevalence, and the success of those undertakings in which they are engaged.

At the last meeting held in Exeter-hall, the Chairman observed, that in consequence of the intense interest excited by the series of meetings then closing, he trusted that "if their lives were spared to next autumn, they would commence another equally vigorous campaign." That season has now arrived. During the interval the Committee have not been inactive. In addition to getting up the large meeting on Good-Friday last, and the Excursion to Tunbridge Wells, they have met almost every week to devise plans for future usefulness. Believing no plan so likely to be useful as that adopted last season, they have determined to commence another series of Monthly Meetings, with as many improvements on the last as past experience and future circumstances may suggest. The present meeting may be regarded as a short and interesting prelude. On the 28th inst., the last Monday in the present month, they intend to hold,—what in modern parlance is termed a "Monster Meeting," in the THEATRE ROYAL DRURY LANE; when they will present as many attractions as their means will allow, and which they trust—to use a phrase commonly employed in reference to gatherings in that great building—will prove "a bumper." This they propose to follow up by a series of Monthly Meetings in Exeter-hall, as soon as that place, which is now undergoing important repairs, is ready for the purpose. It is also in contemplation to hold a series of minor meetings in various parts of the metropolis, in the intervals of these large gatherings, for the purpose of promoting an intelligent and efficient advocacy.

It is scarcely necessary to observe, that for the accomplishment of these objects adequate funds must be raised. Not only must the hire of places of meeting be paid, but eminent advocates must occasionally be brought from distant parts of the kingdom, and information through the instrumentality of the press must be employed to a far greater extent. In reference to the past series, it may be sufficient on this occasion to state that, including rent, advertising, printing, reporting, sending out several hundred newspapers, and other incidentals, the expenditure amounted to about £253; and that the collections and subscriptions amounted to about the same sum; so that though the Treasurer's coffer is completely emptied, the Committee have the consolation of knowing that they shall commence the ensuing series of meetings free from the sad incumbrance of debt. But "nothing can come of nothing." For the full accomplishment of their object, the Committee require FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS; which, if their friends will entrust to their care, they promise to use to the best possible advantage, and with the strictest regard to economy. They have incurred a very serious responsibility in the hire of Drury-lane Theatre, but if their friends rally round them, as no doubt they will, the expenses of that undertaking will be fully met. The Committee have not lost sight of the Great Industrial Exhibition of 1851, and of the importance of making some memorable demonstration during that period. The precise nature of that demonstration must be determined according to circumstances, which cannot at present be ascertained.

As to FUNDS, the members of the Committee made a beginning at their preliminary meeting, when several friends expressed their readiness to double the amount of their former subscriptions. Other friends have since added their names.

[A list of donations will be found at the end of this article.]

J. S. BUCKINGHAM, Esq., who was warmly greeted, alluded to the meetings usually held in places like that in which they were then assembled, for patriotic and benevolent purposes; and said it was pleasing to find that taverns and theatres, places which but too generally ministered to dissipation, were being occupied for the advocacy of temperance, which he considered as standing at the head of all the great movements of a reformatory character. The temperance question was one of vast importance as a physical and moral question; but it came home to many, more especially when it was regarded as a question of economy (hear). It might well be asked why men, especially worthy men, should be willing to spend a fifth, a fourth, or a third, of their earnings to purchase drinks which were undermining their constitutions, depriving them of comfort, and making them miserable for time and eternity. It arose from the delusion which prevailed. These drinks were regarded as essential to hospitality, as a means of promoting strength, and as sustaining under changes of season, climate, and so on. These delusions Mr. Buckingham exposed by suitable arguments and illustrations, and concluded by urging all present to engage with heart and soul in the promotion of practices which were intimately connected with the prosperity of all other institutions (cheers).

MR. B. GLOVER, an agent in the employ of the National Temperance Society, eloquently enforced the claims of the temperance movement. He drew a vivid picture of the miseries inflicted on individuals and families by the use of strong drinks, and also of the blessings which invariably followed in the train of total abstinence from them. While he commended those who thought it their duty to send Bibles and missionaries to distant lands, he reminded them that men, women, and children, were perishing near their own doors through the love of strong drinks, and urged them by a variety of powerful motives, to do all they could to gladden the thousands who were thus made miserable. Mr. Glover was much cheered.

The Rev. G. COPWAY again addressed the audience. He expressed the delight with which he had listened to the various addresses delivered that evening. Meetings such as the present would prove a mighty element in the regeneration of the great Babylon. The temperance cause was evidently taking deep root, and it would soon become a mighty tree, towering high and spreading its branches, from the inhabitants of which songs of melody were heard ascending to the throne of God (cheers).

Another temperance melody was then sung, and the interesting meeting concluded.

* * * In consequence of the unfinished state of EXETER HALL, the Committee are not able to announce the day on which the series of meetings in that place will commence. It is expected that it will take place on Monday, Dec. 2,

MARYLEBONE AND FITZROY

On Monday, the 21st ult. the Anniversary of the Teetotal Society of the above district was celebrated in the Hall, Little Portland-street. A number of persons partook of an excellent tea, after which a public meeting was held, over which the Rev. THOMAS SPENCER, A M., presided.

The Hon. Secretary, Mr. J. P. Draper, presented an interesting report of the proceedings of the society during the year then ended. The weekly meetings had been well attended, also the monthly meetings for the relation of experience. A Band of Hope had been formed, and already numbers sixty youthful members. As the result of addresses delivered at the meetings, and the efforts of individual members, 436 signatures to the Temperance Pledge had been obtained. Several thousand tracts had been circulated, including 230 copies of Dr. Carpenter's Essay on the physiological properties of alcoholic drinks, a copy having been sent to every medical practitioner in the district.

The Rev. CHAIRMAN, after remarking upon some points in the report, referred to a passage of Scripture on which he had addressed an audience on the preceding Sabbath: "As ye have opportunity, do good unto all men." He contended that those who did not endeavour to do good to the drunkard did not comply with that injunction; either they did not regard the drunkard as a man, or they neglected a plain and positive duty. He believed that party-spirit operated to keep many aloof from the society. He thought that clergyman placed himself in a very anomalous position who said he approved of Teetotalism, and yet did not see it to be his duty to look after the drunkard. Such a man certainly seemed to have forgotten that his Master came "to seek and to save that which was lost." A short time ago twelve clergymen met to celebrate the day of St. John the Baptist, and they drank wine! Was that in imitation of that self-denying man? The very essence of the life of a Christian was self-denial; the taking up of the cross, and the following of Christ; and yet those seemed to be things altogether unknown to many who professed to teach in his name! Referring to Sunday-schools, the Chairman said he would not assert that the teachers taught the children anything that was wrong, but it seemed evident that they did not teach them enough. What said the Apostle? "Add to your faith virtue," that is courage to profess your faith; "and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance;" they—the generality of teachers—taught the former, but the latter was not attended to. The secret was that the supporters—large subscribers to Sunday and other schools, and also chapels, were in various ways connected with the traffic. It was high time that that subject was looked well into.

The Rev. GEORGE COPWAY, late the Ojibway Chief, Kah-ge-gah-Bowh, believed that the Temperance Cause was the cause of humanity and of God; and that though it now dragged along somewhat heavily, it would soon mightily prevail. It prevailed greatly in America, but in this country wherever he went, the coloured fire-waters were put before him, and when he refused to take them complaints were made that he was unsocial. Such a cause ought not to rest on the shoulders of a few, but should be taken up by the many, with zeal and spirit. They must, however, remember that though their cause was great and noble, it could not prosper without the divine blessing. The great good that had already been effected by temperance societies was most encouraging. Mr. Copway gave an appalling account of the miseries and horrors inflicted upon his countrymen by the terrible fire-waters, given to them by white men, who boasted of their kindness and sensibility.

The Rev. W. FORSTER, of Kentish-town, reminded the members of the society that the enterprise in which they were engaged was most momentous, and required constant and vigorous exertion. The victims of intemperance were falling by thousands, and one of the most frightful symptoms was the apathy of those who ought to be foremost in the conflict. Teetotalers, however, must not be discouraged, for as sure as there was reason, the love of happiness, piety, and Christianity, so surely would the work go on and prosper till it finally triumphed. They had on their side physiological science, medical opinion, human reason, and the solemn declaration of Scripture; all these they could invoke, and they would come at their call, "to the help of the Lord against the mighty."

Mr. W. HORSELL exposed the drinking customs of society as the source and root of intemperance; and said that it became the sober to protest against those customs, many of the consequences of which fell upon them. It was their duty to spread that information which might tend to root such evils out.

T. ENGALL, Esq., surgeon, stated that he had been a Teetotaler for some years, and was glad to be able, in any way, to help forward so good a cause. He believed firmly that the drinking customs referred to were maintained by delusion, and in consequence of that delusion strong drinks were used till nine-tenths of the cases of insanity, and about the same proportion of other diseases, might be clearly traced to their use. He had lately visited a ward in a union, in which were twelve cases, ten of which he traced to the use of strong drinks. Such drinks were certainly poisons, and by the use of them men were diseased, degraded, and destroyed.

The CHAIRMAN addressed a few words to those who said they had tried Teetotalism, and found it would not suit them. Now, the honour and dignity of a man was, that his soul should rule his body; and Paul declared that he kept under his body, and brought it into subjection. But if men would treat and pamper their stomachs, and allow their bodies to be masters, it was pretty evident that Teetotalism would not suit them as long as they lived. If, on the other hand, they allowed the soul to rule the body, they would soon find Teetotalism suit them. They might be assured that strong drink could not be taken without injury, though, for a time, it might seem to do them good.

The Rev. W. M'CREE briefly pointed out the inconsistency of those professing Christians, especially those who held office in Christian churches, and yet refused to grapple fairly with the Temperance Question.

Mr. MILLER, the treasurer, proposed a resolution of thanks to the Chairman, which was cordially carried, and the meeting was concluded about ten o'clock.

HOXTON.

The Band of Hope held their fifth meeting in the Hoxton Ragged-schools on Wednesday, the 2nd of October. A. H. Dymond took the chair. J. Vanderkiste, Esq., Mr. Giffin, Mr. Tweedie, and J. B. Standing addressed the meeting during the evening. Fifty-nine pledges were obtained.

ISLINGTON.

The friends of Temperance in this densely-populated district are happy to know that the good seeds of Teetotalism which have been sown have not proved altogether unproductive; though, as bread cast upon the waters, they have sprung forth and yielded fruit. May it be the first-fruits of an abundant harvest! In connection with the society meeting in the hall, Islington-green, a females' association has just been formed, and held its first meeting on Monday, October 7, over which Mrs. Stearne presided. Several female advocates spoke on the occasion, and the result was, that five females were induced to sign the pledge. We are also pleased to state, that the Rev. Mr. Gilbert, pastor of Barnsbury Chapel, Islington, has recently identified himself with the Teetotal Movement.

On Thursday, October 10, a highly-interesting lecture was delivered by Mr. Hemwood, from Uxbridge. Subject: "The Christian's duty in reference to the Temperance Cause." We sincerely hope that these efforts will prove effectual in arresting the progress of the hydra-headed monster, intemperance. And may the true advocates of abstinence in every part of the world be stimulated to increased exertions in this great and noble cause, which has for its basis, truth, and for its object, the moral elevation of mankind!

WILLIAM DREW.

SHEPHERD'S-RUSH.

The individual who is actively identified with the working of a truthful cause, and honestly concerned to extend and perpetuate its benefits, need to have "good understanding" of human nature, and to be well-informed as to the variety of elements that characteristically constitute human society. Otherwise he will at times be graciously disappointed and discouraged in his labours. Perhaps it will be safe to say none need this useful knowledge more than those sincerely desirous of promoting the success of the Temperance Reformation. It cannot be denied that Teetotalism is in itself a great practical good; so good that it deserves to be linked with every institution calculated and designed to improve and elevate mankind. But, like all other true and righteous instrumentalities, it is capable of being wickedly misused. For instance, the sober traducer and reviler may become more active in the hateful vocation of propagating the venom of slander; the dishonest knave more on the alert, and more successful in practising plausible deception; the betrayer of private confidence and virtue more artful, deliberate and intent in the pursuit and capture of his victim from the very fact of their sobriety. Substantial reasons could be given for introducing the above remarks. However, it is pleasing to know that the characters there described have ever formed a miserable minority; take Teetotalers in the aggregate, and it may be affirmed, without the fear of successful contradiction, that there are not more thoughtful, intelligent heads, and noble, benevolent hearts to be met with in any society consisting of a corresponding number of members. In the latter category we are pleased to recognise that venerable, steady, ardent friend of all that is good, Dr. OXLEY whom we were favoured to meet not long ago at Shepherd's-bush, where he presided at a festival and public meeting.

In his opening address, the worthy Chairman feelingly alluded to the great increase of pauper lunatics, as evinced by the erections of new and commodious asylums for their reception, ascribing intemperance as one great cause of that fearful necessity. He then urged the practice of Total Abstinence, as consistent with the first law of nature—namely, self-preservation; contending it was calculated to preserve health, character, and property, and thereby promotive of comfort and usefulness. As a consequence, all classes were greatly interested in the Temperance Movement; but more especially did it become the imperative duty of the Christian Church to support and help forward the Temperance Reformation.

Appropriate and effective addresses were successively delivered by Messrs. Harper, Reynolds, Spriggs, Campbell, and Crackell.

W. S.

P. S.—Since the above meeting, we have come in contact with the following official document:—"The Commissioners in Lunacy have reported an estimate of the lunatics in England and Wales, on January 1, 1849. In the country asylums, hospitals, and licensed houses, there are 9,659 paupers; in poor-law unions and places under local act, 8,496; in Gilbert unions, and other places not in union, 124 paupers; the whole, 18,279 poor people, whose condition is the most pitiable and deplorable."—Morning Advertiser, Sept. 11, 1850.

Taking Dr. Oxley as an authority, that a large proportion of pauper lunatics owe the wreck of their reason and the ruin of their intellect to intemperance, what an awful responsibility rests upon the makers, vendors, and users of strong drink! and how consolatory the reflection that Teetotalism is a complete exemption from that tremendous responsibility!—W. S.

BRENTWOOD, ESSEX.

An open-air meeting was held last month, in a meadow, near the town. About 1,500 collected together, including some of the clergy and gentry of the town and neighbourhood. The meeting began at half-past two; Rev. Mr. M'Cree taking the chair till the arrival of B. ROTCH, Esq. After a good opening speech by Mr. M'Cree, Messrs. Sterne, D. Waters, Rev. J. Hall addressed the meeting till the arrival of B. Rotch, Esq., who made an impressive speech. After which C. F. Butler, of Childerditch, said a few words. 500 persons then sat down in a spacious marquee. Tea being over, the evening meeting commenced, Mr. Rotch taking the chair, who gave short addresses between the speeches of Messrs. Sterne, Applegate, and Dr. Perfit. An excellent speech by the Rev. Mr. M'Cree concluded the day's proceedings. A brass band played at intervals, and during tea. This was the grandest demonstration that has been made in Essex in behalf of Teetotalism.

On Thursday, October the 17th, a meeting was held at Hutton, a village a short distance from Brentwood; the Rev. J. Hall in the chair. Messrs. Bourk, Barker, Marly, M'Bride, and others, addressed the meeting, and several pledges were taken.

PONTEFRACT.

Amidst much opposition, there has been a few men in this place, whose hearts kindling with love towards their fellow-creatures, and having experienced the good effects of Total Abstinence, could not see the dreadful ravages the drinking customs of society were making upon their countrymen without using an effort for their rescue; they therefore re-organized the society in January last. Meetings were held during the winter season, and there is every reason to believe good has been the result. They also issue "monthly visitors," and determined on holding a series of meetings, to commence the coming winter. Accordingly Mr. G. E. Lomax, of Manchester, was engaged, and the first lecture delivered on Monday, October 14th, in the Town-hall, on "The Men for the Times." The chair was taken by Mr. Broadley, Wesleyan local preacher, of Ackworth, and the hall was well attended. On Tuesday a soiree was held in the same place, when about 170 sat down to partake of "the cup that cheers, but not inebriates," and were greatly enlivened by harmonious strains of music from the harps of the infantile Lockwood family, which gave great satisfaction, and added much to the general entertainment. After tea, the chair was taken by Benjamin Wilson, Esq., of Bankhouse, Mirfield, and the audience addressed by the Rev. A. Wornoss, President of the Society, Messrs. Walker, of Ackworth, J. Croysdale, John Robertshaw, and G. E. Lomax, all of whom spoke in eloquent terms of the good effects resulting from Total Abstinence, and earnestly recommended their hearers to try the abstinence principle. In the interval of speaking, the harps again gave forth their charming melody, and the juvenile performers were greatly applauded. Mr. G. E. Lomax also lectured, on Wednesday evening, on "Things as they are, and Things as they ought to be." The chair was occupied by Mr. Walker, of Ackworth. And on Thursday evening the same gentleman lectured on "What has been done for man, and what ought to be done by man." Mr. J. Croysdale presided. At the close of this meeting a good number of signatures were added to the pledge.

E. P. ROGERS, Sec.

STOCKTON-ON-TEES.

The Temperance Cause, in this place, has recently experienced a revival. Mrs. Stamp delivered three lectures a few weeks ago, to very large audiences, and her labours have had the effect of arousing the Teetotalers, and have given an impetus to the movement, which will, we hope, long be felt. A Working Men's Demonstration Meeting was announced at the close of Mrs. Stamp's lectures, and great success attended the meetings, and a large amount of good accomplished. Several drunkards were induced to sign the pledge, and also numbers of moderate drinkers. In consequence of the feeling which existed in favour of Teetotalism, the committee held a tea-party, for the purpose of raising a little money, on which occasion about 300 persons set down. After tea a public meeting was held in the Congregational Chapel, which was soon filled. Mr. John Dodshon occupied the chair, and the meeting was addressed by Mr. J. M. Browne, of Northallerton, Mr. Dodds, of Newcastle, Mr. T. R. Taylor, and Mr. Taylor, of Middlesborough, and several others. At the conclusion of the meeting Mr. Dodds appealed to the audience for subscriptions, towards paying the debt, and upwards of £16 was raised. This meeting was one of the largest and most interesting which has ever been held on the temperance subject in this place.

RECENT PUBLICATION.

THE TASK OF THE AGE: an Inquiry into the Condition of the Working Classes, and the Means of their Moral and Social Elevation. By D. G. PAINE. London: Houlston and Stoneman, Paternoster-row.

"THE TASK OF THE AGE" Mr. Paine considers to be, "the moral and social elevation of the people." That "the People"—by which phrase is to be understood, chiefly, the Working Classes—need to be elevated; that their condition, physical, mental, social, and moral, is far below what it might be, and what it must be, before England can be "great, glorious, and free," all are ready to admit. But the admission is too general to produce any deep impression, or to lead to any practical result. Some leave the evil to right itself; others sit down, despairing of any improvement; while a third class apply remedies which are inappropriate and inefficient, and which, in some cases, only aggravate the evil. The result is, that "the people," are not elevated; and this is the more to be lamented, because the elements of their elevation are in existence; the instrumentalities for improving them are every day multiplying. To ascertain in what respect "the people" need to be elevated, and by what means their elevation may be most effectually secured, is a "task" which every man who aspires to the character of a patriot and philanthropist—and who does not?—ought carefully to study. Such a student may be greatly assisted by this volume.

Mr. Paine has divided his Essay into eight chapters: the first is introductory; the second describes the state of the Working Classes; the third, the means hitherto relied on for their elevation; the fourth, the chief causes why education has failed in effecting their elevation; the fifth points out the means necessary to suppress the chief hindrances to their elevation; the sixth, the means necessary to their elevation, and how they can be facilitated; the seventh, the influence of the Press; and the eighth, the conclusion. The facts adduced by Mr. Paine show the present condition of large portions of our population to be most appalling. His examination of the means hitherto employed for the elevation of the people, and the causes of the failure of those means, is conducted with great discrimination. The Means necessary for the elevation of the people, and the way in which these means can be facilitated, are few, simple, and easy of application: Education—Sabbath Observance—an alteration in the time and method of paying wages—Mechanics' and Literary Institutions—an improved public Press—and, above all, and as essential to the success of all other instrumentalities, the abolition of the use of intoxicating drinks. On this latter point, Mr. Paine—whom we remember as one of the earliest advocates of Teetotalism in the Metropolis, and whom we rejoice to own as a friend and coadjutor—dwells with an emphasis which will not only endear him to Teetotalers, but which can scarcely fail to convince any who read without prejudice, and who are sincerely desirous of the improvement and elevation of the people. He justly regards the passion for strong drinks as the cause—the chief cause—of the depression and degradation of the people; as that which obstructs the operation of the means employed for their improvement; and as that the removal of which will give efficiency to all the other means employed. One-third, at least, of the volume is devoted to this subject. Mr. Paine's views of "compulsive education" do not square exactly with our own, and there is, here and there, a sentence over which, had the manuscript passed through our hands, we might perhaps have drawn the pen; but if by leaving out what we think objectionable, we should reduce the volume some two or three pages, there are still left upwards of one hundred and fifty pages, the perusal of which we most cordially recommend, not only to our teetotal readers, but to all who desire to assist in the moral and social elevation of the Working Classes. If there be one feature of "the age" which more than another cheers us as we descend into the vale of years, it is the efforts which are making by men of all classes—politicians, philanthropists, and Christians—to effect this great object. Mr. Paine has well performed his part, and this is no mean praise.

MORE FACTS ABOUT DRINKING, AND ITS DEADLY EFFECTS ON MINISTERS.

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

THE laws of nature are immutable, and cannot be interfered with or altered but by the Great Legislator himself; and we are sure that he will not employ miracles to repeal them without a worthy reason. It would hardly conduce to the welfare and perfection of mankind, if, as often as we liked, we could set at defiance the physical laws of the universe, and then prevail upon the Creator to minister to our folly by altering the course of nature. The tide flows too early for the sluggard, and too late for the impatient man; but still it is not reasonable to expect the Almighty to change the laws of gravitation, to gratify the sloth of the one or the impetuosity of the other. This is a plain illustration, but it will answer our purpose as well as any other we could select, and is quite à propos to the matter before us. Nutrition and poison have their fixed operations, as well as the tide; the former saves, and the latter destroys. This, to some individuals, may seem a dire fatality; and they may be almost ready to charge the Father of Mercies with unkindness, because he has thus arranged our physical constitution, and thousands upon thousands of prayers are presented to induce Him to change these laws. Many have a strong impression, that if the Eternal would but manage the world according to our desires and caprice, matters would go on much better. For example, we eat and drink all manner of indigestible and poisonous things, and then we hope and pray that the Creator will interfere by a miracle and prevent all the injury which otherwise will occur; and we are much disposed to charge Him with the want of mercy, if He refuses to comply with our request. We should think it passing strange for a man to ask a blessing upon a dose of prussic acid, or a deadly draught of laudanum; and yet we hope to obtain the divine smile upon intoxicating beverages! In any correct catalogue of poisons, alcohol is a prominent substance; and therefore cannot be taken, even in small quantities, with impunity; and yet there are thousands who hope to imbibe this baneful liquor, and suffer no inconvenience; forgetting that the laws of nature must be altered, or the Deity interfere with a miracle, before their wishes can be realized.

We have offered these remarks because we have a sad case to relate. The person of whom we are about to speak was a minister of promising talent, who dropped into the grave at the early age of thirty, through the use of intoxicating liquors. Not, be it remembered, that he was a drunkard; he was merely, as people said, "fond of eating and drinking." As we knew him well, we often warned him of the consequence; again and again we told him that his manner of living would bring him to a premature grave, but his general reply was a good-natured laugh. "He was young, strong, and healthy, and was sure that his mode of life was conducive to longevity rather than otherwise," was his confident answer; and thus he eat and drank himself into eternity, and as perfectly destroyed himself before his time as he would have done had he made use of the razor, the knife, or the halter. But we may as well enter into a few details.

Our young friend was ruddy and fair to look upon, rather inclined to be corpulent, and of an exceedingly pleasing countenance. His face was an epistle of commendation. Good temper and good nature shone in every feature. In fact, he was amiable to a fault. Before he was twenty he was the member of a church, and a preacher of the Gospel. His address was fluent and pleasing, and, added to his personable appearance, made him popular. We hardly ever knew a readier speaker. His abilities were rather above than below mediocrity. He was particularly cheerful and merry, and was the life of any society into which he entered. Hence he was much courted. Alas! too much courted!—courted to his cost; for the frequent invitations which took him so much from home, broke in upon his studies, rendered him volatile, and fed his propensity for good fare.

From the earnest entreaties of friends and the force of the truth, he more than once became a teetotaler, and lectured eloquently upon the subject; but then moderation people laid hold of him, jeered him, laughed at him, tried to frighten him, begged him to drink, and a second time tempted him from his steadfastness, and thus brought him to a premature grave. We have said that he was fond of gratifying his taste for sumptuous food. He was an enormous meat-eater, and, rather unclerically, boasted of the capacity of his appetite. This disposition for gluttony was fatal to his teetotalism. Over-eating requires a good supply of intoxicating liquors; hence in the Scriptures you have the glutton and the drunkard associated in the same person. You may wash down three dinners by drinking; but if you eat without drinking, you can only take one. All great eaters, sooner or later, break their pledge. Temperance is temperance in everything, and checks gluttony as well as drunkenness. The great advantage of eating without drinking is, that you will find it hard to eat too much. Our young friend was a man given to appetite, and this proved his ruin, and brought him to an early tomb. One morning the post brought the following note:—

"Dear Sir,—Knowing that you were acquainted with the Rev. — I write to inform you that he is no more. He was taken ill last Friday with inflammation of the bowels; all proper means were resorted to, but after enduring the most violent martyrdom of pain, he breathed his last on Monday morning.—I remain, dear sir, yours &c., * *"

Here was a short warning for a young minister of thirty; but, if you had known him, you would not have been much surprised. He began to look a living, bloated mass of inflammation, so that had he dropped down dead on the road, or in the pulpit, it would have been no marvel. Many, no doubt, spoke of his early removal as a mysterious visitation of Providence, and none more so than those who tempted him, prompted him, and pressed him to drink the liquors which proved his ruin. His body showed that all the laws of health had been set at defiance, and that he was laying violent hands upon himself. Could we enter into a whole history of the affair, it might be satisfactorily demonstrated that he had exhausted all the resources of health. He had brought on indigestion, shaken his nerves, enfeebled his muscles, corrupted his blood, and covered himself with a heavy load of diseased corpulency, till at last nature could bear no more, but gave way, and launched his soul into eternity. We wish our readers to observe that the young minister in question was no drunkard, and yet he drank enough to kill himself forty or fifty years before his time!

The case before us is a truly awful one. Here is a body which ought now to be warm with life and vigorous with health, become the food of worms; the tongue that might be heralding the Saviour, is a silent mass of corruption; and, still more awful to say, the soul which should have tabernacled here for another half century, has thrust itself uninvited to the bar of God. All its prospects of usefulness given up, the youth it might have instructed, the sinners it might have converted, the saints it might have fed, edified, and led on in the way to Sion, all deserted and sacrificed for the sake of quaffing a fiery poison!

And, alas! this example of the accursed effects of moderate drinking is not a solitary one. We have crowds of professing men and women who stand high in the church, obtruding themselves almost daily into the presence of their Judge. They go thither uncalled; they leave vast fields of usefulness which they might have occupied and blessed; they compass their own death, and the temporal and spiritual death of thousands; they allow not disease and dissolution to approach naturally and slowly, as our Creator intended, but they summon their destroyers, and hasten them to do their work. Our young friend sent for the fever and inflammation. He was urgent with them to cut short his life and his usefulness. Every glass he took was a suicidal draught. There was death in the cup. Premature disease had often reminded him that his course was a fatal one; that he must eat more moderately, and drink nothing stronger than water. He knew in his body and in his reason and conscience that Teetotalism was right, was health, was life, was usefulness; and yet he drank and died. Instead of dying of inflammation, he ought never to have had an inflammatory symptom. Judgment and moderation in eating, and total abstinence from stimulants in drinking, are a perfect shield against fever, inflammation, and a hundred other ailments and diseases. Too much eating, too much sleep, and too much drinking of anything, but especially of intoxicating liquors, keep the gravedigger at work, and the bell tolling. In nine cases out of ten, the passing knell and the solemn funeral are an impressive teetotal lecture. How the Judge of all will say to these suicides, "Well done, good and faithful servants!" we are at a loss to divine.

How can men or women be "good" or "faithful," who waste the bounties of Divine Providence? who convert wholesome fruits or grain into poisons, and then distribute, recommend, and praise the deadly venom, and even have the audacity to call it a good creature of God, and perhaps even quote God's Word to induce their fellows to drink and die? What goodness or fidelity is there in such wantonness, waste, cruelty, and presumption? What could demons do more to deceive and destroy? And then what faithfulness can there be in drowning the intellect in liquor—in drying up the nerves with a fiery poison—in baptizing the body with every sort of disease—in unfitting ourselves for the spiritual race—in running away from our post—in leaving souls to perish, and hurrying, uncalled, into eternity? Surely none will be so bold as to assert that these deeds are "good or faithful;" and yet they are daily committed by the manufacture, the sale, the commendation, and distribution of intoxicating drinks!

We have seen minister after minister, deacon after deacon, and private Christians of both sexes, in vast numbers, carried to the grave amidst the tears and sympathies of thousands, and in each instance the (so-called) moderate glass was the chief instrument of death; and was handed round over the coffin as the most harmless of beverages. How shocked we should be, if over the corpse of one who had died from prussic acid, we saw the mourners imbibing the poison and praising its virtues, and yet the counterpart of this infatuation is acted over and over again at funerals in our day. The minister, the church-officer, the man, the woman, or the youth died through strong drink, yet a stronger dose than usual is introduced at the burial to cheer the hearts of survivors! We dare say, that at the funeral of the young minister in question, liquor such as that which killed him was liberally provided! When shall this madness cease! When will people learn that alcohol is a poison, and that no one, be he minister or who he may, can use it with impunity?

IMPORTANT MOVEMENTS CONDUCTIVE TO TEMPERANCE.

It will, no doubt, be cheering to Teetotalers to find that the following are among the regulations as to refreshments in the CRYSTAL PALACE, now in the course of erection for the Industrial Exhibition of 1851.

"Three areas are to be fitted up for the sale and consumption of refreshments, which are not to be taken out of the areas:—

"Area No. 1. (in the centre of the building) for ices, pastry, sandwiches, patties, fruits, tea, coffee, chocolate, cocoa, lemonade, seltzer, and soda-water.

"Areas No 2 and 3, for bread, butter, and cheese, tea, coffee, chocolate, cocoa, ginger-beer, spruce beer, and similar drinks, a list of which must be approved by the Executive Committee.

"There must be no seats." "No cooking whatever will be allowed, and no heating apparatus can be used except for the purpose of warming water and making tea, coffee, chocolate, and similar beverages.

"The contractor at each refreshment area, must supply fresh filtered water in glasses GRATIS to visitors, and keep a sufficient supply at each area of the articles specified as above.

"No wine, spirits, beer, or INTOXICATING DRINKS, can be sold or admitted by the contractor."

The ADMIRALTY REGULATIONS which follow, will also be regarded as "movements in the right direction:"—

It is stated, in the United Service Gazette for November, that the Admiralty have at length determined to allow no person to be entered on board Her Majesty's ships, or be employed in the service as a "mess-man," whether in the gun-room mess or the ward-room mess. The reason assigned for this regulation is, that their lordships have fully satisfied themselves that most of the extravagance, and nearly all of the intemperance, with its concomitants—ruin, disgrace, degradation, and loss of position in the service and society—are attributable to the practice of the gun-room mess of large ships appointing a regular "messman," from whom any quantity of spirits or wine could be procured by paying for it.

We read, also, in the Portsmouth Naval Gazette, that the Admiralty have prepared a circular, declaring that officers of the fleet shall not, in future, be allowed to purchase spirits duty free.

BRADFORD.

The Bradford Central Branch Temperance Society have recently been making a demonstration extraordinary, during which meetings were held in the society's room, Cheapside, when addresses were delivered by Mr. E. J. Lomax, of Manchester, and Mr. J. Clarke, &c. A tea-party, also, was held, which was numerously attended; and at the public meeting which followed the room was crowded. The speeches were listened to with the deepest attention.

GREAT TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION AT DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

An aggregate meeting of the promoters and friends of the Temperance Movement was held on the evening of the 28th ult. at Drury-lane Theatre. The meeting was convened by the Committee entrusted with the superintendence of a series of public meetings to be held in Exeter-hall during the ensuing winter, who contemplate also holding a large demonstration in the metropolis, as well as a conference of the friends of Temperance from all parts of the world during the summer of 1851. The building was well filled, notwithstanding that a charge was made for admission, and which, according to an explanation given in the course of the meeting, had been increased at the instance of the proprietors of the theatre to something like playhouse prices, with the view of ensuring respectability. The pit and galleries were full, and a goodly number of persons were distributed on the stage, and in some of the boxes.

Previous to the commencement of the business of the evening, several pieces were played by a Sax-horn band (the Shapcotts from Exeter) in a manner which appeared to give satisfaction to the audience.

The chair was taken by Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., M.P. for Derby; and amongst the gentlemen seated at the table in the centre of the stage were:—Rev. William Forster;—Willmore, Esq.; George Cruikshank, Esq.; Dr. Gourlay; William Sims, Esq.; John Cassell, Esq. The Rev. George Copway (Kah-ge-gah-Bowh), the Ojibway Chief, was also present at the request of the Committee, in full Indian costume, and was warmly welcomed.

The Chairman having taken his seat,

Mr. GREEN, one of the secretaries, begged to explain to the meeting that, in consequence of a clause in the lease of the theatre, the committee of management had felt themselves obliged to interfere to prevent admission at the low prices which the association had fixed, in order, as they stated, to maintain the respectability of the house, thus connecting respectability with the power to pay a certain amount of money (hear, hear). The teetotalers did not recognise that test (cheers). They had long since discovered—

“That the gould was but the guinea's stamp,” and that

and there was “a good time coming” when that principle would be universally recognised, and he believed they would have only to “wait a” very “little longer” for it (cheers, and a laugh). The committee who had made the arrangements for this meeting were, however, gratified that, notwithstanding the increase in the charge for admission, the house was so well filled (hear). There were several noblemen and gentlemen friendly to the cause who they had hoped would have been present, but who, being away in various distant parts of the kingdom or abroad, could not make it convenient to attend. From many of these they had letters explaining the reason of their absence, including Lord Ashley (hear), the Earl of Harrowby, Lord Kinnaird, The Hon. A. Kinnsird, Mr. J. Silk Buckingham, Mr. T. Beaumont, of Bradford; Mr. A. Prentice, of Manchester; and they had also a letter from the most distinguished man perhaps in the kingdom—the hero of a hundred fights, whose name was known throughout both hemispheres, the Duke of Wellington (cheers and laughter). They had better hear his grace's answer to the invitation. It was as follows: “Walmer Castle, Oct. 19, 1850.—P.M. The Duke of Wellington presents his compliments to Mr. Tisdale. He has received his letter without date, and is much concerned that his public duty will prevent him being in London on Monday the 28th of this month.” (cheers and loud laughter.)

The CHAIRMAN then rose. He observed that the letter they had just heard read was from the hero of many fights; but they were also engaged in a great fight; and when they conquered—as they would do before long—their victory would be more glorious a thousand times than any that the Duke of Wellington and all the generals the world had produced had ever achieved (cheers). He rejoiced to see so vast a concourse assembled for so noble a purpose as to abolish that which was the greatest source of misery to mankind—drunkenness! (cheers.) The cause they had in hand—that of universal sobriety—was not of this day's growth. It had now been progressing eighteen years, and who could say that that great cause was not conquering? Those who had been induced to abstain from alcoholic beverages altogether found themselves far better in health, far more effective in mental ability and judgment, and consequently far better subjects of the state than while they had been the habitual consumers of strong drinks. The object of that meeting was to put facts before the public, and to show what advantage to the whole community must result from the extension of the abstaining principle. It was not sufficient that those who had themselves embraced the teetotal principle, should now sit down with their arms folded and say, we have done all that is necessary, we leave it to others to follow our example if they please. It was their duty to go further, and endeavour to extend that principle, to impress its advantages on others, and endeavour by all the means in their power to induce their fellow subjects to embrace it also, and thus England would no longer present to foreign nations the spectacle of the most intemperate country in the world, but would show them that while she was the most prosperous, she was, at the same time, the most sober nation in the world. (loud cries of “Hear.”) Much he lamented the contrast he observed on a recent visit to the Continent, between the people there and those of this country. In France he scarcely saw an intoxicated person the whole time he was there. He hoped to see the time, and that before long, when he should be able to say the same of the whole of the United Kingdom (cheers). Solomon, the wisest of mankind, had in the most forcible language put before his people the evils of intemperance. They knew, from the charges of the judges at assizes and quarter sessions, that almost all moral evils might be traced to drunkenness; and the most eminent physicians had borne testimony that the majority of our physical diseases resulted from the same cause. He had been a teetotaler for seventeen years, and during the whole of that time he had enjoyed good health—far better than at any former period of his life. There were thousands who could say the same; and he could not but believe that with the success which had already attended the principle of teetotalism, it must ere long prevail universally in this country (hear, hear). He had great pleasure in introducing to their notice Mr. John Cassell, an old, earnest, and consistent advocate of the cause (hear, hear).

Mr. J. CASSELL could speak of the advantage of the principle of total abstinence from a personal experience of fifteen years (hear, hear). He looked upon this great meeting as a proof of the rapid progress of teetotalism in this country. For years England had presented to the world a moral anomaly. Whilst among her population there was the greatest energy in propagating religion and morality, and in sending forth to all nations the truths of Christianity, there was the greatest amount of drunkenness, and consequently of immorality and crime. While they had the largest number of churches and chapels of almost any country in the world, they at the same time possessed the largest number of gin-shops, beer-houses, and manufactories for intoxicating drinks; and those same men who were the most earnest advocates of missionary effort in carrying the light of the Gospel to foreign parts, were many of them interested in a manufactory which reduced the people of this country to a condition below that of the brute creation, and kept them in filth, rags, crime, and wretchedness all their lives. In 1835 no less than fifty million pounds were spent in strong drinks; nor was the demoralizing habit confined to the men, for by the police returns it appeared that no fewer than 11,612 women were apprehended on the charge of drunkenness in that same year. Again, we not only demoralized our own people by the indirect encouragement we gave to the crime of drunkenness, but we propagated the evil in places where, but for us, it would be unknown. We sent our rum to our new colonies, and demoralized the native population, as we had done in America, New Zealand, and Africa (hear, hear). The United States had unfortunately done the same, and one Indian chief had prayed that death in the shape of rum might no longer be sent out to destroy his people. One would have thought, when a remedy for this gigantic evil, which had created 600,000 drunkards a year in this country, and sent 60,000 annually to their graves, had been proposed, that the remedy, teetotalism, would have been eagerly seized upon by those who took upon themselves the moral and religious instruction and enlightenment of the people; but so far from it, the advocates of total abstinence were condemned by the press and from the pulpit—no place could be obtained for their public meetings;—and when they did manage to find a place, the Bible was brought down to their meetings by their opponents, and quoted against them (hear). They were asked, “What! do you want to deprive the poor man of every comfort?" (hear.) At one meeting in Lincolnshire he recollected the speaker got up and said, "I hope always to see the Englishman with his fitch of bacon, his bag of flour, his Cheshire cheese, and his barrel of strong beer in his house." And that sentiment was met with immense cheering, until a Lancashire man got up, and in Lancashire dialect said, "I agree with three parts of that gentleman's speech. I agree with him about the flour, the bacon, and the cheese, but with regard to the beer he had always found that the barrel of strong beer ran away with the others." (cheers.) Well, that sort of difficulty had long since been got rid of (hear). Then they had to meet the objections of those clergymen and religious men who were most anxious to extend the light of Gospel truth to the people, and who admitted that drunkenness was their great hindrance, and that the working classes were being driven to pauperism, sickness, and death by it, but who could not be induced to forego their own glass of wine after dinner. These cared not for spirits, and were willing enough to join in a movement against the use of spirits; but when it came to total abstinence, they answered, "Why, men's constitutions differ, and while some can do without stimulants, others cannot;" and in some places, as in the mining districts of Wales, they asked the teetotal missionaries, "Why would you condemn the ironworkers? men who are exposed to such severe work and such intense heat, to live upon water—the thing is impossible." The reply given to this was, "If the work is so severe and so hot, water would be far better than beer, the men would perspire less by drinking it, and would be consequently less liable to fatigue than if they drank beer or other intoxicating drinks;" and they said to the labourers themselves, if you lay out the 2d. it costs you for a pint of beer in bread, you will obtain more of that nourishment by which your strength is maintained than you would get from 2s. 8d. worth of beer, the latter besides having the disadvantage of being diluted by several pints of water. Well, the labourers followed their advice; and in this instance the people were before the priests (hear, hear). They were met with similar objections in the case of the fishermen of Cornwall. It was said: "These men cannot possibly endure the extreme cold they are subjected to, without the aid of intoxicating liquors;" but, in answer to that, the missionaries brought forward the evidence of Sir J. Ross and the Rev Dr. Scoresby, that, in the Arctic Regions, seamen could endure the intense cold to which they were exposed much better without intoxicating drinks than with, and the result was, that at St. Ives they got almost the whole of the working men to become teetotalers, though they could not get the priests to join them (hear). It was the same with other trades; with the tailors, the agricultural labourers. Similar objections were started only to be answered and knocked down like so many nine pins (hear). And now, besides the numbers in England and Scotland, millions had also embraced total abstinence principles in Ireland, and millions also in America (hear). These principles were spreading everywhere, and must continue to spread, to the moral as well as the physical advantage of the whole body of the people, and of the working classes especially. Mr. Green could tell them that almost all the contributions to the Supplementary Numbers of the "Working Man's Friend" were contributed by teetotalers. This society was not a mere teetotal society: it was a man-elevating, an uplifting society (hear, hear). In Sheffield £14,000 a year used formerly to be spent in strong drinks, principally by the working men; but now, not only there but in the manufacturing districts generally, the working population were becoming sober, and instead of their children being consigned to the factories as soon almost as they could walk and talk, they were now kept at home, well fed and clothed, and sent to school. This was one of the many benefits resulting from the change from drunkenness to sobriety on the part of their parents (hear). They had already done much—what was now wanted was to make their principles tell on public opinion (hear, hear). Members of Parliament now did not scorn to attend their meetings (cheers). There was one present with them that day, and they had expected several more. They yet expected Sir Joshua Walmsley—(cheers)—who would have been present at the commencement of the proceedings but that he was obliged to attend a special committee, and he had no doubt he would arrive before the meeting terminated. That their principle was already beginning to operate with the Legislature and the Government they had proof (hear). In the army and navy many beneficial changes had been introduced in furtherance of the cause of temperance.

The alterations in the Canteen system was one, and the reducing of the allowance of grog to one-half in the case of the men, and abolishing it altogether in the case of the midshipmen and the boys was another. We were about to have a great Exhibition in Hyde-park next year, and he understood that provision was to be made for supplying refreshments on the ground. In connection with that circumstance, he had the other day, when going over the building with a great friend to the temperance cause, Mr. Cobden (cheers), discovered a secret, that no intoxicating liquors were to be allowed to be sold on the ground (cheers). He thanked the company present for attending in such numbers, and, in conclusion, begged to inform them that the committee had determined on holding a number of such meetings, which, he believed, would tell on the country, and that thousands of habitual drunkards now steeped in rags and misery, would, with their families, thank them for their efforts. He doubted not that many now present could bear personal testimony to the beneficial change which total abstinence from intoxicating drinks had produced in their condition—many a family which had exchanged what was once a little hell for what was now a little heaven—many a man who wore now, indeed, the image of his Creator, but who had once worn that of a demon (hear). He looked confidently forward to the day, which he hoped would soon arrive, when there should not be a drunkard on the face of the globe (hear).

Mr. G. CRUIKSHANK was next called on, and was loudly cheered. He said: I think we may congratulate ourselves upon having what is termed in theatrical parlance a good house (cheers). We have not only a good house in numbers, but also because it is for a good purpose; and although there is a very excellent pit, and very respectable boxes, yet I cannot help paying the highest compliment to the highest part of the house, and that is the gallery (cheers). I have trod the stage as an amateur actor, and have known what it is to see a well-filled house; and it has always cheered me in my performances when I have seen a well-filled gallery (hear, hear). But I assure you I was little prepared to see these galleries filled upon such an occasion as this. The circumstance is most gratifying to the well-wishers to this good and excellent cause (hear, hear). In addressing an audience in such a place it is almost impossible not to have theatrical images forced upon one's imagination (applause). First of all, up starts Shakspeare; and though I never studied him professionally, it occurs to me there is one character which I might bring forward on this occasion without much trouble, and that is Sir Toby Belch (hear, hear, and laughter). It is worthy of remark, as illustrating the great genius of Shakspeare, that in drawing the picture of this sot he gives him a disgusting name. He makes him cry out when they are endeavouring to obtain something like order and silence—"What! because thou art virtuous, shall we have no more cakes and ale?" (hear, hear.) This is the language which our opponents apply to us. In answer to their question, I say—"Not exactly so; you are welcome to the cakes, but we wish to take away the ale; because we know, many of us from experience, and from the effects it has upon others, that ale is very bad for you, while the cakes are very good." (cheers.) If you go to that wonderful play, "Othello," where Shakspeare introduces a drunken character on the stage, he does it in such a masterly manner as to show the disgusting nature of intoxication; and he makes Cassio say: "Oh, thou invisible spirit of wine, if thou hast no name to be known by, let us call thee devil!" (cheers.) Then, again, he exclaims: "Oh, that men should put an enemy into their mouths to steal away their brains!" (cheers.) These are only fragmentary passages, which have occurred to me at the moment. I have no doubt it would be possible to get up a complete exposure and condemnation of drunkenness from the pages of Shakspeare; and on some other occasion I will endeavour to do so, for I am convinced Shakspeare is quite a powerful authority against intoxication. A quarter of a century ago it was no uncommon thing with gentlemen of the upper classes, on leaving the dinner-table, to go into the drawing-room—some half-intoxicated, others wholly so. They have now reformed their disgusting practice; and it is to be hoped, that they will not again return to it. But that which has happened once may happen again, and if ever it does happen again, I am sure that our charman, who is himself a member of those classes, will agree with me in saying that there will be an end of the aristocracy; they will be swept away by the mighty flood of teetotalers, which will rush over them like a torrent (cheers). I have great pleasure in saying that, at present, there is little fear of that; the higher classes are fast coming round to us (cheers). My profession causes me to mix with the higher circles of society occasionally; and I hardly ever go into any company of that class, at all numerous, without finding a teetotaler amongst them. A man of fortune assured me that he had met two noblemen at dinner the other day who were teetotalers, (hear, hear, and a cry of "Name.") I do not give the names for obvious reasons; it might not be agreeable to the parties; but you may rely upon the fact. This shows that the aristocracy are coming round to our side (hear, hear). Every day and every hour are adding fresh supporters to our cause; for those who are not against us are in one sense with us. Nevertheless, we have our enemies, and we have three very powerful ones. The first is ignorance; the second, custom; the third, appetite (hear). I will just give you one instance of the ignorance with which we have to contend. This I heard in a round-about way, for of course I don't go to a public-house myself, neither do I send my servants; but if they choose to go, I cannot help it. This is a land of liberty, and I don't absolutely forbid my cook a pint of ale, if she will have it (hear, hear). Well, she had gone to the public-house, I suppose on this errand; and the landlady attacked her, saying, "I cannot believe anybody can be a Christian that does not drink beer. What was it sent for?" (laughter.) I suppose the poor creature was so ignorant that she believed ale descended from the clouds (great laughter). Custom is one of our most powerful enemies; for, be it recollected, that in many cases, mothers teach their children to drink (hear, hear). It is a fearful truth that the circumstance of mothers indulging their boys with a little drop of beer or a little drop of wine, has, in some instances, led to the most direful and horrible consequences. Amongst other good lessons which my mother taught me when young (and I had hoped that she would have been present to hear me state it) was the importance of never wasting bread (hear, hear). This lesson has never been effaced from my mind, and never will be; it is my constant practice never to waste a crumb of bread. I do wish to heaven that she had taught me never to drink intoxicating liquors; for I imagine the lesson would have been equally impressive and permanent, and then I should have escaped a great deal of misery which I have suffered (hear, hear). Though our cause is now progressing mightily, yet we have fearful odds against us, and I conceive that our only chance of ultimate success is by training up children in principles of total abstinence (hear, hear). To this end, we must appeal to the mothers, who are the great leaders in all social improvements (cheers). All the energies of teetotalers ought now to be directed to that great object, the education of the young. The other day I was presiding at a juvenile temperance meeting at Lewes, at which about 170 children were present, all temperance children. It was indeed a glorious sight. I had been informed that a new goal was in course of erection on the hill near the place of meeting, which is to cost £37,000, and I asked, "Who are you building this goal for?" After reasoning the matter, I showed that at last it came to this, that they were rearing this huge building for the rising generation (hear, hear). And would it not be much better, I asked, to lay out half the money in endeavouring to bring up a sober population? (cheers.) The other day I had occasion to examine a housebreaker in a case which came under my notice, and I asked—Did you ever commit a robbery without first going and getting some drink? The answer was, No. And I venture to say, there never has been a robbery or a serious act of violence committed except under the influence of these intoxicating drinks (hear, hear). I alluded to the good house with which we are honoured; but we can boast to-night, not only of our good house, but of our excellent company of performers (cheers). Need I point to our respected chairman—a noble example of energetic devotion to the temperance cause (cheers). I might say the same of several other gentlemen on the platform; in particular, I might refer to a "dressed" character, the Indian chief (hear, hear). I recently made a sketch, but thought it too strong to publish, of a clergyman, with a Bible in one hand and a rum bottle in the other, (cheers, and cries of "Bring it out.") The same idea was entertained by my friend the Indian chief, who threw it out at a recent meeting at the London Tavern. The "fire-water" of which he told is burning up the people in this country, as well as in America. Last summer I passed down Drury-lane, where intoxication largely prevailed, and I could see the worst passions depicted in the countenances of the people. It is much to be feared the case is the same in nearly all the low neighbourhoods of London (hear, hear).

Mr. PARKER, a working man, said he did not know why he had been asked to the meeting, except that the committee were anxious to avoid anything like class distinction. The present age had been said to lack faith, and to be a matter-of-fact age. He especially represented matter-of-fact men; for working men followed out what was called the only true philosophy, the inductive philosophy, and required to be satisfied of the facts before they gave in to a theory (hear, hear). He did not arrogate to working men the honour of being workers par excellence; for all were workers who exerted energies, whether of mind or body. He would state one little fact: He had worked for fourteen and a-half years, and done as much work in a twelvemonth, and done it as well as any other man, without a single drop of intoxicating liquor (cheers). No one had been more prejudiced against teetotalism than himself; but he had read their publications, reduced them to practice, and was certain that their principles would pass through any ordeal. Teetotalism was good for the working man, the gentleman, or the student; could he be convinced there was any evil in it, he would abandon it at once (cheers). Who were their great opponents? Setting aside the ignorant and those interested in the sale of liquor, there were two classes who were chiefly blameable: those who were charged with the cure of bodily disease, and those who were bound to attend to our spiritual welfare (hear, hear). No excuse could be offered for those ministers who refused to examine the evidence in favour of total abstinence. Dr. Elliottson had said that the medical profession knew nothing of three-fourths of the diseases with which humanity was afflicted, and had but a shrewd guess at the remaining fourth. With that fact before them, who would implicitly adopt the recommendation of medical men to take port—that article being composed of different ingredients according to the place where it was purchased? (hear.) This society did not assault their fellow-men by almsgiving, but taught them to help themselves. At one time they had been assailed by vulgar epithets, and something still harder; but a change had now come over the spirit of the times (hear, hear). The society dealt in hard facts, and not in visionary theories.

The Rev. W. FORSTER, of Kentish-town, said: He was tempted to call the meeting a great national event. Its character, its object, its numbers, its locality, seemed to claim for it that designation. He said he would call the movement out of which it had sprung—as the bubble from the bosom and strength of the irresistible stream, or the electric flash from the centre of the thunder-cloud surcharged with the purifying lightning and the fertilizing shower—a most important national fact. He admitted that men were in danger of exaggerating that which they believed to have a mighty and manifold influence for good—of attributing a panacean power to that which they knew to be a remedy for many diseases; still he thought he was guilty of no extravagance or empiricism, but rather gave utterance to rigid scientific truth, when he maintained that no prescription or dietary could be of any avail for the complicated and chronic maladies of this nation, which did not enjoin on the patient a total abstinence from all alcoholic drinks. He granted that, compared with other nations, ours might be considered in a hale and happy condition. Old England may be said to have "a pulse like a cannon"—to possess a heart of oak, a form of adamant, and a soul of fire—to combine the experience of age with the elasticity of youth—to be moving along its majestic way with unabated spirit and power—to number long centuries in its coming life—to have flashing on its vision a glorious future of enterprise, progress, and enjoyment. All parties admit, however, that we have many deep-seated evils which require to be removed. Many have been the universal medicines which have been prescribed to this end. He did not say they have no curative force. He did not say they may not each have a part of the ingredients which must enter into the potent panacea necessary to restore this yet mighty country to perfect health. This, however, he would say: They might build churches for the accommodation of all classes of our population—they might provide religious teachers of great learning, orthodox creeds, devout spirit, and active oversight—they might establish day and Sunday schools of great effi-

It must, it is presumed, be acknowledged, that among the means employed for the dissemination of important principles and the advancement of great objects, none have proved more effectual than a succession of Demonstration Meetings in the most conspicuous and commodious places that can be secured. Not only has London been powerfully operated upon by such Meetings, but by the reports of them, circulated through the medium of the press, the public mind throughout the kingdom has been instructed and influenced, and provincial bodies have been roused to corresponding exertions.

Amongst the great movements of the present day which are designed to promote the elevation of the industrial classes, and the general prosperity of the nation, the Temperance Movement is entitled to considerable prominence. Hence a number of gentlemen formed themselves into a Committee, for the purpose of conducting a Series of Meetings for the advancement of the Temperance Reformation, in Exeter-hall, during the months of October, November, and December, 1849, and January, February, and March, 1850. Those meetings were well attended, and many intelligent and effective addresses were delivered. A large fund of information on all points connected with the Temperance Movement was thus furnished to thousands, and, through the medium of the press, diffused throughout the kingdom and the world. Not only were fair reports given in several of the daily papers of London, but abstracts were published in a variety of temperance and other periodicals in this country, and also in the East and West Indies, in Nova Scotia, British Canada, and the United States of America. Several of the most intelligent and experienced friends and patrons of the Temperance Movement have testified their approbation of these meetings in the most decided and unequivocal manner. Many societies in the manufacturing and agricultural districts have adopted similar modes of arresting public attention and of communicating information. The apathy and indifference of thousands of Teetotalers have been exchanged for zeal and activity. The regular meetings of local societies have been materially improved. And an acknowledgment has been drawn forth from some of the leading promoters of philanthropic and political movements as to the soundness of the teetotal principle, and as to the intimate connection between its prevalence, and the success of those undertakings in which they are engaged.

At the last meeting held in Exeter-hall, the Chairman observed, that, in consequence of the intense interest excited by the series of meetings then closing, he trusted that, "if their lives were spared to next autumn, they would commence another equally vigorous campaign." That season has arrived. During the interval the Committee were not inactive. In addition to getting up a large meeting on Good-Friday last, and an Excursion to Tunbridge Wells, they met almost every week to devise plans for future usefulness. Believing no plan so likely to be useful as that adopted last season, they determined to commence another series of Monthly Meetings, with as many improvements on the last as past experience and future circumstances might suggest. They commenced by holding a Social Meeting in the great hall of the LONDON TAVERN, October 14; this was numerously and respectably attended, and several ladies and gentlemen proved their willingness to assist in the accomplishment of the proposed object. On the 28th of October a meeting was convened in the THEATRE ROYAL DRURY LANE; here, also, the attendance was large and respectable, and a number of eloquent and effective addresses were delivered. The chair was occupied by LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, Esq., M.P., and reports of the meeting, some of them of great length, appeared in the daily and evening, and most of the weekly, papers in the Metropolis, and afterwards in several provincial papers.

EXETER-HALL, which has recently undergone considerable improvements, has been engaged for a SERIES of SIX MEETINGS, the first of which is intended to be held on Monday evening, December 2; the remaining five meetings to take place on the evenings of the first Mondays in the five months following. The Committee have resolved to spare no pains, in order that this Series of Meetings may be rendered as attractive and efficient as possible; and they feel fully confident that their efforts will be duly encouraged and crowned with corresponding success.

It is scarcely necessary to observe that, for the accomplishment of these objects, adequate funds must be raised. Not only must the hire of places of meeting be paid, but eminent advocates must occasionally be brought from distant parts of the kingdom, and information through the instrumentality of the press must be employed to a far greater extent. In reference to the past series it may be sufficient on this occasion to state that, including rent, advertising, printing, reporting, sending out several hundred newspapers, and other incidentals, the expenditure amounted to about £253; and that the collections and subscriptions amounted to about the same sum; so that, though the Treasurer's coffer is completely emptied, the Committee have the consolation of knowing that they shall commence the ensuing series of meetings free from the sad incumbrance of debt. But "nothing can come of nothing." For the full accomplishment of their object the Committee require FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS; which, if their friends will trust to their care, they promise to use to the best possible advantage, and with the strictest regard to economy. The Committee have not lost sight of the Great Industrial Exhibition of 1851, and of the importance of making some memorable demonstration during that period. The precise nature of that demonstration must be determined according to circumstances, which cannot at present be ascertained.

THE DRUG ALCOHOL.

[BY H. MUDGE.]

THAT Alcohol may be fairly reckoned a drug, may be easily proved, for we find it treated of in dictionaries, and other volumes that relate to medicinal substances, and also in the most celebrated works on poisons; or, look into a druggist's shop, and you will see the bottle containing it appropriately labelled. When pure, it is a colourless fluid, lighter than water; very inflammable, burning with a bluish flame, having a peculiar and penetrating odour, and a burning taste. Alcohol is drunk in the form of either some ardent spirit, or some fermented liquor; immense quantities being annually consumed in the British Isles, as well as in several other parts of the world. In round numbers we may say that, of alcohol there is consumed in this country—

In ale and porter (allowing 6 per cent.)	25	millions gals.
In ardent spirits, „ 50 „	13	„
In wine, „ 20 „	1	„
In cyder, perry, and home-made wine,	2	„

Why are people so fond of taking this drug? On the druggist's shelf there are many substances besides alcohol, beginning with the letter A, and we do not habitually use these. Why, then, should the inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland swallow the enormous quantity of forty-one millions of this strong drug annually? The answer is found to be involved in "the lusts of the flesh, and the pride of life." To provide liquors containing alcohol is fashionable, and is reputed to be hospitable and respectable? And then the peculiar effects of the drug on the body, and through the body on the mind, lead the drinkers to regard it as a cordial, a comfort, a blessing, a necessary of life! To believe that such a stimulant is needed at all in our daily life, is a delusion, fatal to multitudes of the human family. Man to need a fiery, blinding stimulus, when he is suffering the things of this present evil world, to rack him to death with their excitement! Alas! send him to bed to repose under the influence of "godliness with contentment," and he will walk by a wiser rule, and attain to a better fate.

Be it remembered that the effects of alcohol are cumulative—that is, it accumulates in the body of the drinker, and, by-and-by, unexpectedly shows its terrible power. Bound hand and foot, and liver and brain, and muscles and nerves, and body and soul, the deluded victim is handed over to perdition, and cast into the prison-house for ever. Now, in the use of other drugs of this class, (as foxglove, belladonna, lunar caustic, &c.) doctors are very careful, watch narrowly their administration, and order them to be discontinued early. Why, then, we ask, are the doctors so careless about alcohol? The answer must be, I fear, unfavourable to their disinterestedness.

Missionaries, writing home from China, graphically detail the sufferings of opium-eaters; and then designate this natural product as a "CURSED DRUG." Now, alcohol at home is destroying as fast as opium abroad; yet, when the missionary returns to England, he drinks alcohol, which, however, judging from its pestilent effects, has to be entered in the same column as opium, which column, the missionary being the authority, we shall now conspicuously head—

"CURSED DRUGS! BEWARE!!"

THE BAND OF HOPE.

While thus around the festive board,
The joys of Temperance we record;
Let Love each youthful breast inspire,
And fill each soul with holy fire.

Let smiling youth at once begin
To shun the drinks that lead to sin;
And in life's morning let us press,
Into the ranks of Soberness.

May we pursue chaste Virtue's way,
'Neath holy Wisdom's sunlit ray;
Let meek-eyed Peace, and godlike Truth,
Direct our steps, and guide our youth.

O let us not inactive stand,
While drunkenness o'erspreads our land;
But onward press, come weal or woe,
And fearless meet the common foe.

Let us be strong in Abstinence;
Be moral force our main defence;
In one united league combine,
'Gainst Bacchus vile, the god of wine.

Raise loud the trumpet's cheering blast,
While health, and strength, and being last;
Let every drinking temple fall,
Like ancient Jericho's high wall!

Then on, ye youthful Temperance Band!
Industrious be each heart and hand;
'Gainst Prejudice and Custom cope
A mighty BAND led on by HOPE.

Hackney, November 18, 1850.

ciency for all the poor children of the realm—they might found hospitals, almshouses, penitentiaries, and asylums for the sick, the aged, the vicious, and insane—they might extend the franchise until it takes in every male twenty-one years old, uncorrupted by pauperism and untainted by crime—they might cut down our public expenditure to the utmost limits of retrenchment, until Mr. Hume sat silent in the House of Commons, having nothing of which to complain—they might remove all restrictions upon trade, and get others to follow their example—they might secure the guarantees of universal peace in the appointment of a vigorous Court of Arbitration for the adjustment of national disputes, in the disbandment of the European armies and navies, and in the conversion of "swords into ploughshares, and spears into pruning-hooks"—they might get rid of all taxes on knowledge, and, were it possible and righteous, of all taxes on everything else—yet, he said, if they did not abolish the drinking customs and habits of society, every element of good would, to a great extent, be neutralized by this monster evil (great cheering). He would cite Nineveh, Babylon, and Persia to corroborate what he affirmed. They fell, not because they were necessarily poor, had to labour hard for daily bread, to live upon a coarse and a scanty food, and the plain waters of the Tigris, the Euphrates, or some other generous stream. No, sir; their increasing wealth pampered their love of intoxicating drinks, melted away their virtues in luxury, fed them up as fat and filthy victims for the swords of the warriors, rendered brave and hardy by temperance and a scanty fare (hear). What we have to fear in this country is, that our prosperity will prove a snare—will bring upon us a deeper poverty than want of wealth—will swell the number of millions spent on that which corrupts, poisons, and slays the people—will put in our power still greater means of our national overthrow. He did not think sixty or a hundred millions a year would destroy us if we were a sober, frugal, and virtuous nation. It would, of course, retard our progress. It was not the mere waste of the sixty millions spent on drink which we have to deplore. It was, he granted, a large part of the wages of the working men, of the profits of the tradesmen, of the incomes of the rich, to be squandered away on that which does not contribute to the health, energy, intelligence, skill, industry, enterprise, and longevity of the people. But this sum is not merely lost: it lives to produce the most ruinous effects. It supplied our goals with criminals, our asylums with maniacs, our hospitals with patients, our streets with impudent beggars, our bills of mortality with premature deaths, our graveyards with the corpses of men and women, who have not lived out half their days. This was only a part of the evils—merely the blotches and eruptions of the social body, showing the internal state superinduced by the deleterious action of alcoholic beverages. Sixty millions' worth of intoxicating drinks must subject the nation to great physical, mental, moral, and spiritual deterioration. It must shed a blight upon our whole humanity. It must injuriously affect all that we do as a people. Our laws, our institutions, our manners, our trade and commerce, our work, our amusements—everything by which we evolve our national life—yea, our national life itself, and therefore all the forms in which it obtains its self-expression—must be sadly marred and blurred by sixty millions' worth of poison every year. The loss of so much money, or rather of so much labour, was a serious evil, a great drawback on national improvement. All other causes of good will avail nothing until this will be removed. He did not say that temperance alone can carry us to that point of individual and social excellence at which we ought to arrive; but it was not too much to affirm, that all other causes of progress could not carry us there, if temperance be not predominant to give effect to all the rest. The time was not far distant when statesmen would have to take into consideration the temperance question in their measures for the welfare of this country. Teetotalism was an absolute condition of national progress. To this important conviction public men are slowly arriving. Of this necessity the country must be made self-conscious; to this conclusion the national mind must be conducted. On this point it was the mission of the Temperance Society to enlighten the intellect, form the opinion, rouse the conscience, quicken the heart, and sway the will of the great British nation. Arduous is the work, certain the success, glorious the results, and splendid the reward. Then, oh! then (he said), as centuries roll away, they will find and leave this great and mighty nation surrounded, like a healthy and happy mother, with a numerous offspring, all living in obedience to the laws of the Universal Father, subjecting their propensities, passions, and appetites to the gentle reign of reason, conscience, and the moral affections, the high-born aristocracy of the soul; freed from all starvation, want, pauperism, vice, and crime; cultivating the virtues which enrich, ennoble, and purify our fallen humanity; living in a state of perfect friendship, amity, and confidence with other nations; prolonging life to a period, and enjoying it to an extent, which will bring back the golden age, when the saints of earth and the sanctities of heaven walked together in holy fellowship; lying down, after a long term of years, to us, short-lived mortals, incredible in length, to breathe forth a well-spent life into the bosom of the living God, like a weary child falling asleep on the warm and loving breast of its mother, on the still evening of a long summer's day. Oh, sir, say not this is a Utopian vision. Our race are made for such virtues, such dignity, such happiness as this, or else they have been made in vain. The Creator has given them ample means of emerging from the sensuality in which they have long wallowed, or else he has acted strangely towards them, while he has been most liberal to the inferior animals. The tendency of all the movements of the present stirring and broad-awake age is to bring this nation and others to the highest pitch of individual, family, and social perfection, or else they are a useless employment of force. But, sir, to evolve all man's native power for good—to give effect to all the God-given means of his progress—to turn all other movements to a beneficent account—the absolute condition—not laid down by the puny authority of man, but published by the all-mighty Lawgiver of the world—the absolute condition, I say, is, a total, universal, and permanent abstinence from alcoholic drinks (long-continued cheers).

Mr. J. CASSELL said he wished to introduce to the meeting his friend the Rev. George Copway (the Indian chief above referred to), who had come over to this country, not expressly to advocate the cause of temperance, but to awaken in British hearts sympathy on behalf of his race—a race of which he was himself a noble specimen (cheers). He was anxious to arrest the destroying hand, and he considered that the only remedy—the only thing that could prevent the North American Indians from being exterminated was the concentration and organization of them into a nation, with a form of government and the blessings of education and civilization (cheers). He begged to add that this gentleman was not, like some persons who have visited this country, what was termed half-caste, but a thorough-bred Indian.

The Rev. G. COPWAY then stood forward, and was received with loud cheers. He said that in attempting to address them in reference to the great temperance cause, he felt somewhat at a loss when he beheld so many around him who were engaged in such a glorious movement. However dark his early life had been in the woods of America—for he had spent 16 years of it in the wigwam—he should now look on his attendance at that meeting as a bright spot in his existence (cheers). In 1845 or 1846 he was requested by some ladies to attend a meeting at Rochester, in the United States. As he would not be thought ungallant, he consented to attend, risking whether he could make a speech or not. After pondering over his speech for two days, and committing it to memory, he went to the place of assembly, where were gathered a thousand people, with his first temperance lecture in his pocket; but when he saw the names of the speakers on the occasion, his heart began to throb (laughter); and at last when the turn came for himself to speak, he was only able to bow, and say, "Ladies and gentlemen." When he had bowed and said "Ladies and gentlemen" five times, he took his speech out of his pocket and threw it at the people, saying, "This is my temperance speech." (laughter.) He could not help expressing his gratitude to his friends, who took so much interest in the condition of the noble Indians of North America. The name "Cruikshank" was very familiar in America (cheers); and while he heard that gentleman speak he could not but think that his fathers must have borne that name of Cruikshank because they were drunkards, and that now he had become a temperance advocate he ought to be re-baptized, seeing that his legs were now straight enough (great laughter). The great improvement in progress in America commenced with the Temperance Movement. When he first studied the geography of this country he could not help wondering that so small an island should be called "Great Britain;" but now that he was acquainted with its noble Christian institutions, and saw the temperance cause progressing in the land, its advocates presenting doleful pictures before the eyes of intelligence, only to urge forward to fresh exertions, his wonder ceased. The temperance cause, once despised, was now advancing like the whirlwind. It was beginning to be loved by men of a higher order. Reform was everywhere progressing—in church, in state, and in society; and that man must be perblind who did not perceive the rapidity of its march. That which was once so small was now beginning to gird the earth. Many a man who had once lain in the gutter, was now washed, and was taking his proper position in society, and after becoming temperate, he was bearing forward to yonder world. The English and the American nations must unite in this cause. So also must the minister and his flock. Religion must be added to temperance, and the man who had ceased to be a drunkard must be pointed to Zion. There was many diamonds in the gutter which needed to be raised up, and it was the work of temperance men to bring these jewels into their proper position. Let them be taken up, polished, and placed before the sun, and their brilliancy would be evident to all. He liked to see the white man and the coloured man stand together; but when he saw the drunkard, diseased, and in the gutter, without a hat or shoes, hell raging in his soul, the sight of a brother in such a position was for him too much to bear (cheers). Yes, he loved the drunkard, and for him he would labour as long as he lived (cheers). How much evil had alcoholic drink done to his country! What rivers of blood had it caused to flow! The mighty Mississippi was as nothing to the mothers' and children's tears which it had made to stream down. The responsibilities of England were in proportion to the greatness of her power, and she was bound to set the nations around her an example of temperance. As he looked at the pillars around him, he couldn't help thinking that if England did but look around the world, and observe what alcoholic drink had done on all hands, she would at once breathe a resolution in favour of temperance which would spread from Europe to the Rocky Mountains, and thence to the far east. In the valleys of the Missouri, Mississippi and the St. Lawrence, he had seen the poetic Indian drinking fire-water to his ruin. Oh, what sights had he witnessed amongst his countrymen! They were living happily in the wigwam when a white man came amongst them with a barrel of spirits, and then, too soon, the kind father who had before loved his family, was seen to dash his own child against the tree, and to dance like a fiend round the wild fires. What was his position the next morning? He was an object of pity and distress, and the thorns of intemperance planted in his breast. When the English first landed in America, the Indians looked forth to see whether they were the Gods of the sea, and when they found that they had limbs like their own, instead of seeking to destroy them, better feelings took possession of their breasts. The Indian took the poor shivering European to his breast. And what was the first return made by the white man? Why, in the spring of the very next year he stole the corn of his benefactor. That would have been nothing; but when he saw Indians cut down by alcoholic drinks, he could not help saying, "A demon was that man who first introduced them into North America." He well recollected a cousin of his own with whom he constantly associated and played when a boy. He was first in all youthful frolics—the leader in every swimming, racing, and climbing match. On revisiting his native village, some time ago, he found that this companion of his youth, whose name was "Moses," had just before been drowned. How did it happen? He obtained possession of a gallon of rum in exchange for a deer. He (the speaker) could not help cursing alcoholic drink, which had deprived him of the gratification of seeing his former playfellow. It was this cause—alcoholic drink—which had done most to devastate and destroy the Indians. There were once five millions of that race, but they had been gradually reduced by the influence of strong drinks. He should shortly return to his native country, for he loved that country, and wished to be a link between his nation and the white man. He would, on his return, endeavour to fasten to a mountain a chain extending from the interior wilds to the homes of civilization, and to erect a monument of total abstinence, which should be the wonder of the earth—a monument to the great man who was first to propagate on a wide scale the cause of temperance in this country (cheers). If God should smile he hoped to see the day when the Indians would, with the consent of Congress, have a home 150 miles square in extent. They already had their chapels, their press, their bible—all the elements, in fact, of Christian civilization; and he pictured to himself the time when the war-knife would be dropped, and the Indian take a glorious position in the world. He must now close. He hoped that if any of them should ever come within a hundred miles of his neighbourhood they would visit him. He could not promise to place before them decanters, but he believed the English people loved venison—(laughter), and they should have some of that, also some Johnny cake, for which the country was celebrated, and a hearty welcome in a glass of clear cold water (cheers).

The Rev. G. W. M'CREE then addressed the meeting. He said the world had its heroes, and they had theirs, but the men whom they had selected for their admiration and love were not like the men whose monuments filled every part of this city. The men whom they honoured were not men of blood, but men of virtue, of humanity, and of religion; they designated them heroes, not because they had gained the battle of Waterloo, or of the Nile, but because they had laboured to save the perishing. What had other heroes accomplished in their own age and their own land (hear, hear). The men whom they had selected for honour had sought to lead the children of this age in a holier and better path than that trodden by their fathers, and to glorify the age by the annihilation of intemperance; and in saying this he uttered the highest eulogy. These men had laboured for the country's good. Honour, then, to Joseph Livesey and the men of Preston (cheers)—those pioneers of temperance and truth, who in a lukewarm age came forward to expound the principles of temperance. Honour to James Silk Buckingham (cheers), who, whether in Europe or America, in the camp or the palace, had maintained the cause of temperance with a silvery eloquence which would have done honour to any senator in the world (cheers). Honour to the true liberator of his country, Father Mathew, whose apostolic labours it would be well if many of our bishops would imitate. Honour to Doctor Lees, who had propounded with clearness the philosophy of temperance. Honour to Jabez Burns and Benjamin Parsons—to Jabez, who was "more honourable than his brethren;" and to Benjamin, "whose mess should be five times as much as that of his brethren,"—men whose fearless advocacy of temperance principles had made their names dear to all its friends. Honour to John Cassell, the "Working Man's Friend and Family Instructor," who had successfully reared the Standard of Freedom, and whose fidelity to the principles they espoused would hasten the advent of "Teetotal Times." Honour to George Cruikshank, the Hogarth of the 19th century, whose "Bottle" contained no dark imp, and who would, he trusted, prove an angel of light to his generation. Honour to the secretaries and officers of temperance societies generally, without whose labours England would have been less virtuous and less glorious than she was. Honour to the temperance women of England, whose tears of charity had consecrated the Movement, and would crown its success. Honour to all temperance advocates, paid or unpaid, known or unknown. Honour to their brethren across the Atlantic, and might God deliver them from all slavery, whether that of property in human beings or that of drink (cheers). But honour, especial honour to Him, before whose throne they prostrated themselves with reverence, and to whom they presented with all humility the trophies of the temperance cause, and let all the people say amen! (cheers).

Mr. A. SMITH next addressed the meeting. He said he had lately been reading a work on the art of forgetfulness, written by a professor, who undertook to teach any one to forget what he had learnt in six lessons; and, as an example, he might mention the case of a member of Parliament who had been in Parliament only three weeks, and yet had forgotten all his previous promises (laughter). He rejoiced that their chairman had not forgotten his temperance principles. He would not, at that late hour, detain them any length. He had heard it objected by a minister of the Gospel that temperance was a mechanical instrument—that the Gospel was the only thing which could make a man a Christian. Admitting the fact, he denied its application; and his short reply to the minister in question was, that on his own principle he ought not to use locks, because Christianity forbade stealing, and was the true remedy against the disposition to steal (laughter). The cause of teetotalism would stand the test of science, of common sense, and of Scripture (cheers). Knowledge was often said to be power, wealth was considered power; but love also was power, and the Temperance Movement had love for its basis. There was "joy in the presence of angels over one sinner that repented," over one poor drunkard that abandoned the habit of intoxication and became a Christian in heart and in practice. The cause of temperance had made and was making steady progress. Fifteen years ago no teetotal meetings were held in London; now fifty were held every week. They had now a great number of advocates, literature of their own, a press of their own, while all the newspapers now gave them fair play (cheers). The increased taste of the people for reading—the opening of new institutions and museums—the extending railway excursions—all these movements were in favour of temperance. It was an indubitable truth that the condition of this country would be infinitely better than it was were no alcoholic drinks consumed. Let them look at the signs of the times. Who could have anticipated fifteen years ago that they would have the Drum Polka in Drury lane? Who could have anticipated George Cruikshank's appearing for them with his Bottle, or a member of Parliament's taking the chair, having previously obtained his seat without making the voters drunk? (laughter.) Let them, then, per-everc (cheers). There was nothing in his whole life upon which he could look with so much satisfaction as the part which he had taken in the Temperance Movement. Such was his feeling last year as he reviewed his past life when lying upon a bed of sickness.

Mr. CRUIKSHANK proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman, who had, he said, performed his part ably and well.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. J. W. GREEN, and carried by acclamation.

The CHAIRMAN, in returning thanks, said it was because he believed that no other movement was so important to the welfare of the working classes, that he had come there to preside over that august meeting. Adverting to the allusion to his own return to Parliament, he observed that he would not for any consideration have beastified his fellow-men in order to secure their suffrages. When the mind of the multitude became pervaded with the principles of temperance, which could only be accomplished by the friends of the cause all acting as missionaries, they would have to congratulate each other on the final triumph of the cause (cheers).

The proceedings terminated with the performance of the "National Anthem" by the Shapcott family, whose performances greatly enlivened the proceedings of the evening.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

WALWORTH.

The anniversary of the Total Abstinence Society, usually meeting in the School-room, York-street, Walworth, was celebrated in the large School-room, Newington-butts, on Tuesday evening, October 29. After tea, the chair was occupied by G. Cruikshank, Esq., who cautioned the Teetotalers present against boasting, however great might be the success which attended their exertions. They had abundant cause to be thankful, but to boast might expose them to danger. He addressed himself also to mothers, beseeching them to be careful how they taught their children to drink liquors, which might be the cause of injury and mischief to them through life. Mr. J. Sears read a brief report of the operations of the society. Rev. J. Doxsey referred to the decrease in the consumption of strong drink within the last few years as encouraging the belief that temperance principles were spreading. Mr. Driver, Mr. Holden, Mr. J. W. Green, Mr. J. Sears, and Mr. Freemantle addressed the meeting, and the chairman concluded with a brief exhortation.

HORSLEY DOWN.

On Monday evening, Nov. 4, the annual meeting of the County of Surrey Temperance Association was held in the School-room, Fair-street, Horsley Down. The Rev. J. Burns, D.D., presided. He stated that for the last fifteen years he had been a teetotaler, and that, for the last ten years, his church, his vestry, and his house had been fully purged from alcoholic drinks. He had ample opportunities for making observations, and it was his belief that the Temperance cause was never in a more hopeful condition than at present. But there was still much intemperance, and they must go on diffusing light, and especially among the upper classes of society. There was every encouragement to exertion; teetotalers were getting dovetailed, as it were, into many of the great movements of the day, and if teetotalers held fast, and went on in a right spirit, they would ultimately prevail. The object of each meeting should be to make and to mend teetotalers. Mr. Yearron, the secretary, read a brief report, in which it was stated that 159 meetings had been held during the year, and about 400 signatures to the pledge received. Many persons were reaping the benefits of a firm adherence to the principle of total abstinence, and many families experienced the comforts of domestic sobriety. Mr. J. W. Green took a rapid glance at the general principles of teetotalism, and the motives which should actuate teetotalers to spread those principles with fidelity and zeal. Messrs. Campbell, Johnson, and Watts also addressed the meeting.

HAWKSTONE-HALL, WATERLOO-ROAD.

The annual meeting of the members and friends of the Society meeting in the above place, was held on Tuesday evening November 19, W. WEST, Esq., in the chair. Mr. G. C. Campbell, one of the secretaries, read a brief report, which presented a favourable view of the condition and prospects of the society. Mr. Duffy entertained the audience by referring to a notice he had seen in a grocer's window—"Removed seven doors from the Blind-school." That, he thought, might be written over every teetotaler's door. Seven was the number of perfection. The teetotaler had once been in the "Blind-school," but he had got light, and he had removed to a complete distance from it, and enjoyed unspeakable benefits in consequence; and, especially, he had come seven doors nearer to the house of God. Dr. Oxley delivered a very impressive address, in the course of which he reminded the audience that they were not their own; that they were sent into the world for high and important purposes; that the use of strong drink interfered mischievously with their bodies and minds, and that no man had a right so to use his powers, or the gifts of Providence, as to do injury to himself, or to those around him. God would surely require of them a strict account. Dr. J. Burns thought all persons must agree that intemperance was a great, a prolific, and an extensive evil. He thought, also, all must agree that it was not evil to abstain, and that, as but few had power to resist temptation, abstinence was the safest plan. Facts proved that no man, however wise or good, was safe who used intoxicating liquors. He supposed, further, it would be admitted that there was such a thing as perfect sobriety; and in what did that consist but in entire abstinence from drinks that intoxicated. He had abstained for about fifteen years, and he found that he was none too sober for any purpose of life. Wherever true sobriety had been secured, it had been, by the blessing of God, upon teetotalism. Mr. T. A. Smith and the Rev. J. Doxsey briefly addressed the meeting. Thanks to the chairman was moved by Mr. Spriggs, and seconded by Mr. J. W. Green, and the meeting terminated.

HARP-ALLEY, FARRINGTON-STREET.

The thirteenth Annual Meeting of the FARRINGTON WARD Total Abstinence Society was held on Monday evening, November 24, in the Hall of the Literary and Scientific Institution, Aldersgate-street. Dr. OXLEY, who presided, said that every teetotaler present must testify to the excellence of the principle of Teetotalism, unless he was unfaithful to his profession. As to those who were not teetotalers, it was the wish of the friends of the system to make them as wise as themselves, because they believed that, as far as the question of Temperance was concerned, they were wiser than those around them. Strong drinks were not adapted to the human constitution, and therefore teetotalers held it to be morally wrong to use them. On the other hand, abstinence from them contributed to bodily health, to mental vigour, to social comfort, to respectability of character, and, in many cases, to religious enjoyment.

Mr. J. W. GREEN read a report of the operations of the society during the past year, from which it appeared that the society was in a prosperous state.

Mr. T. B. SMITHES moved the adoption of the report. He said that no individual ought to content himself with subscribing to the funds of the society; he should also work in every possible way, and on all proper occasions, to promote the cause. He recommended strongly the distribution of tracts, the formation of Bands of Hope, and the introduction of the principle into Sabbath-schools and among the teachers of youth.

Mr. VALENTINE WARD, in seconding the resolution, remarked on the opposition presented to the spread of Teetotalism, arising from prejudice, from custom, and from an unwillingness to exercise self-denial for the benefit of others. He urged the members to promote union among themselves, and to deal with those who differed from them with as much tenderness as truth and honesty would permit.

Mr. MANN moved a resolution expressive of the suitability and efficiency of the total abstinence principle for the prevention and cure of intemperance. He felt it to be his peculiar province, as a labouring man, to address labouring men; and to them he could recommend total abstinence from strong drink, on the ground of his own experience for about fifteen years. Partial or occasional abstinence would avail but little; it would not keep them out of the way of temptation, and intemperance would never be banished from the world. If, then, the teetotal system was so excellent, it was the duty, as the resolution said, of every well-wisher to the community to promote it in every possible way.

Mr. G. C. CAMPBELL said that some persons asked, if Teetotalism was so excellent and valuable, how it was that more persons had not adopted it? Now he believed that hundreds adopted it who did not join the teetotal societies. It was a fact that hundreds now drank very little compared with what they were accustomed to drink before the total abstinence principle was promulgated. The consumption of strong drinks had greatly decreased, and the consumption of unintoxicating beverages had considerably increased. At public dinners but little intoxicating drinks were used comparatively, and on several recent occasions soirees and tea-parties were substituted for dinners. Several regulations had recently been made in reference to the use of strong liquors in the navy, at the Greenwich School, &c.; and of which movements ought to encourage teetotalism.

The Rev. W. MCCREB addressed chiefly the young men present in very impressive terms. If they would be truly safe and happy, he urged them, among other good things, to be sure that they got Teetotalism. That would benefit them greatly—first, as to worldly prosperity; secondly, as to mental improvement; and thirdly, as to moral greatness. Each of these particulars he enforced by appropriate illustrations.

Mr. BERRY, of Islington, addressed the audience; and the Chairman concluded with a few sentences of exhortation.

LEWES, SUSSEX.

On the fourth anniversary of the Lewes Juvenile Temperance Society, a large number of children assembled in the Baptist Chapel in the afternoon, when addresses were delivered by George Cruikshank, Esq., the Rev. I. Dozsey, and Messrs. Morris, junior, and Davey. In the evening a numerous and respectable meeting was held in the County-hall, over which George Cruikshank, Esq., presided. He remarked on the importance of Juvenile Teetotalism, and in an earnest and impressive manner advocated the cause of temperance. Mr. J. Ripley, the Brighton Temperance Missionary, favoured the company with a temperance melody of his own composing, entitled "The Patriot's Prophecy." The Secretary briefly reported the society's operations during the past year, which evidenced that the success realized is calculated to encourage to renewed effort. The Rev. I. Dozsey presented the claims of the temperance movement, condemned the drinking customs, and expressed his decided conviction that the temperance principle must ultimately triumph because based on the rock—truth. The Chairman again addressed the meeting; and, after a vote of thanks to him, &c., we were brought to the termination of our fourth Anniversary.

HASTINGS.

The cause of Temperance is progressing in this place. Last month a lecture was delivered by Mr. F. Beck, on "The Conservative Influence of Teetotalism, nationally considered." The meeting was large, and the lecture well received. Since then two addresses have been given by Mrs. Hardwick, illustrative of various points in the great Temperance question. A lecture has also been delivered by Mr. J. Harding, on "The Chemistry of Fermentation." On Monday and Tuesday evenings, Nov. 18 and 19, the celebrated Shapcott family gave two musical entertainments in the Swan assembly-room, in connection with the Temperance Society. The performances of these talented teetotal musicians were received with great applause by large and respectable audiences; and the judicious addresses given by Mr. Shapcott, sen., during the intervals, on points connected with the Temperance cause, pleased and instructed.

DUNSTABLE.

On Wednesday, November 6, a meeting was held in the Temperance-hall. Mr. Joseph Gutteridge occupied the chair, and opened the meeting with a few well-timed observations. Mr. Hiron, Baptist minister of Luton, dwelt upon the moral bearings of the Temperance question, and proved to a demonstration the great evil and danger of drinking intoxicating drinks as regards the body and the soul, and concluded by a solemn appeal to all present to adopt the short and comprehensive motto of the society—"To drink no intoxicating drinks." Mr. R. G. Mason stated some startling facts in reference to the missionary movements in connection with the wine and spirit bottles, and detailed some interesting particulars—on the one hand presenting to the minds of all present the great and appalling evils of intemperance—of its degradation, its debasement, and destruction; and, on the other, the results of total abstinence—of its power to elevate its adherent to a high state of social and intellectual existence—to secure the cultivation of the finest feelings of humanity, and to lead the soul to the contemplation of the vast and momentous realities of eternity. The audience was numerous, respectable, and most attentive, and at the close, several subscribed to the declaration of the society.

BEDFORD.

On Monday evening, November 11, the Rev. G. Mason delivered a lecture on the necessity and advantages of true temperance. The New Hall, Wellington-street, was crowded, the audience including many influential parties in the town. The lecturer made an eloquent appeal in behalf of temperance, and at the close was rewarded with a vote of thanks.

LEEDS.

The second monthly meeting of this society for the present season was held at the Music-hall, on Tuesday evening, November 12. The platform was occupied by S. Bowley, Esq., of Gloucester; Rev. E. H. Weeks, of Dewsbury; Rev. J. Stuart, of Hull; Ald. J. Wilson, Councillor Joseph Walker, Robert Jowitt, Esq., Newman Cash, Esq., Thomas Harvey, Esq., Jarvis Brady, Esq., of Leeds, together with the president and committee of the Temperance Society. The saloon was well filled with an intelligent and attentive auditory. Mr. Bowley officiated as chairman, and delivered a most eloquent and effective address, urging strongly the abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, on the ground that they are not only totally unnecessary to secure health, but on the contrary that they are positively injurious to it. He also dwelt much upon the necessity, on moral grounds, of abstaining from the use of these drinks, and drew some affecting pictures of distress which had resulted from intemperate habits. The Rev. Mr. Weeks and the Rev. Mr. Stuart also delivered able speeches on the subject.

SKIPTON.

During this month Mr. W. Warham, surgeon, of Newcastle-under-Lyne, Staffordshire, has been labouring assiduously in the promotion of temperance principles, and has created much interest in this locality by his physiological lectures, which are illustrated by upwards of 300 drawings and diagrams. Skipton, Gargrave, and Settle have had the benefit of his lectures.

TODMORDEN.

The members and friends of the Temperance Society took tea together on Saturday, November 9, in the school-room of the Independent chapel. The arrangements gave satisfaction to all present. The meeting was addressed by several advocates of the Abstinence cause; also a number of melodies, recitations, &c., were given, which added much to the evening's entertainment.

JERSEY.

The island of Jersey has recently been visited by Mr. James Teare, one of the originators of the Total Abstinence Movement. He arrived in the island on Saturday, the 14th ult., from Guernsey, where he had been labouring a fortnight. On the following afternoon he preached in the Temperance-hall, also on the two next Sabbath afternoons; and delivered several lectures in the same place, in behalf of total abstinence, to large audiences. He also delivered a lecture at St. Aubin's; and a tea-meeting was held at the Government-works, Greycliff, after which Mr. Teare delivered a powerful address. During his stay he has met with a warm reception, and his labours amongst us have not been in vain. We hope again ere long to have him amongst us; for the thorough-going principles advocated by him are what we require, to rouse the little-drop drinkers from their lethargic state, to show them that they are the cause of drunkenness. Mr. Teare left this island for Exeter, and may his labours still continue to be blessed wherever he goes!

Since Mr. Teare's visit, Mr. D. G. Paine, of Deptford, author of the "Task of the Age," &c., has been here for a week, and delivered three lectures. Mrs. Hardwick also has delivered one lecture.

JAMES METIVIER, Secretary.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

STOP THIEF: or, Hints to Housekeepers to Prevent Housebreaking. By GEORGE CRUIKSHANK. With numerous wood-cuts. London: Bradbury and Evans.

MR. CRUIKSHANK proceeds in this pamphlet on the principle of "Fast bind, fast find," and in order that Housekeepers may see the necessity of doing something to prevent their houses from being broken into by thieves, he exposes the tricks and artifices to which burglars resort for the accomplishment of their felonious intentions. This he does with a minuteness which is almost startling; and one might suspect that he was desirous of instructing pupils in the "art and mystery," were it not that the cautions and advices he founds upon his revelations demonstrate that his purpose is to defeat the machinations of burglars, and to render their attempts at mischief null and void. While Mr. Cruikshank has employed both his pen and his pencil to furnish accurate representations of the "tools of the trade," he has also employed them as industriously to render those tools useless and unavailing. He proposes a number of admirable preventives, all of which are easy of application. We mean to avail ourselves of some of his suggestions, and recommend every housekeeper immediately to purchase a copy of his cheap and valuable "Hints."

Mr. Cruikshank has not forgotten his teetotalism while penning these advices. He says: "It is a general notion that where a great many house robberies take place together, it indicates a distressed state of the country, and that men are thus driven by want to the commission of these offences. This I unhesitatingly deny to be the fact, and I am supported in this denial by the best information and the best authority—all the burglaries are committed by a set of idle, dissolute vagabonds, who pass nearly the whole of their time between the beer-shop and the gin-palace (for it is a curious fact, but I do not believe that a thief was ever traced to a cook-shop, or from a cook-shop, or a baker's, or a butcher's, but always the public-house), from which they always go, under the influence of drink, to commit their robberies, and to which places they either send or go as soon as possible after their return, and where they generally spend nearly all the produce of their plunder. It is impossible to conceive a more degraded, mean, rascally, and unmanly state for human beings to live in than do most of these cunning, artful, but wretched and mistaken creatures, who only change this state of miserable slavery to their appetites and their passions, to become, perhaps, prisoners for life, or to end with shame a life it seems a pity should ever have begun." Again: "To some persons it may seem rather out of place here for me to allude to the subject of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks; but 'thieving' and 'drinking' are so mixed up together, that it seems almost impossible to speak of the former without touching upon the latter. It is the hope of the total abstainer, that, when the drinking habits of society are utterly abolished, and the lower classes educated, these together will go far to put a stop to thieving and acts of violence. This may be doubted; but has not the work begun?—in the 'Ragged-school,' and in what are termed the 'Juvenile Temperance Bands of Hope.' In the one we find children who would formerly have grown up, most likely, to be thieves, beginning, for the first time in their lives in this Christian land, to hear and to understand something of Christianity, and to feel that 'honesty' is the best policy.' On the other hand, we find that there are thousands of children who are not only receiving religious education, but who totally refuse—and, it is to be hoped, ever will refuse—to take any kind of intoxicating beverage. Now, if the men who are engaged in these good works are doing anything, they are most assuredly, to a great extent, putting a stop to thieving. They may not be able to stop all or any of those youths who have grown up as thieves; but when we see a school-class of young, reputed thieves, reading the New Testament, it is surely a most extraordinary sight, and a circumstance from which good may come, but of evil, none."

We are happy to find that Mr. Cruikshank is not alone in these remarks. In a review of his pamphlet in the Weekly News of last week, after general commendations of the plans recommended, the reviewer says:—"The ultimate remedy must be, abstinence from beer. It is in the intervals of his visits to public-houses that the thief marks his house, and burglariously enters. Of course, the logical inference is obvious. If ever we may hope for the arrival of a time when burglars shall be as scarce as highwaymen now are, it must be when Whitbread, Buxton, Barclay and Perkins are forgotten; when the dimensions of a quart pot are a question for the antiquary; when Jack Cade shall be justified and it shall be felony to drink small beer; when the last of the draymen shall be put in a museum, and the last of Teetotalers shall be at the head of the Excise:—then, and not till then, shall burglaries cease." And let not Teetotalers despair of the arrival of such a period.

THE BANNER OF HOPE Temperance Pledge-book. London: G. Watson, Kirby-street, Hatton-garden.

Beautifully neat! Got up, if we mistake not, by our indefatigable friend, T. B. Smithies.

THE FULNESS OF THE SPIRIT, not of Strong Drink. The substance of a discourse by T. THOMAS. Cardiff: Owen, Duke-street.

In this tract the Apostle's caution against drunkenness is enforced on the grounds of the exceeding sinfulness of that vice—of its being the source of innumerable other evils, personal, social, and moral, as it unfits a man for the society of the pious, and membership in the church of God on earth, and as it shuts the soul out of heaven. This, and the solemn admonitions and exhortations which follow, renders it an excellent tract to circulate among professing Christians.

TEMPERANCE TRACTS, Nos. 1 and 2. By the Rev. THOMAS SPENCER, A.M. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

We are glad to find that these tracts are reprinted, and that the one now before us, No. 2, is one of the fourth edition of 5,000. They deserve very extensive circulation because of the infirmation they contain; because of the excellent spirit in which they are written; and because they bear so intimately and so powerfully on some of the leading questions of the day. The number before us contains:—"Teetotalism favourable to the working of a Poor-law;" "Pauperism and Teetotalism;" "Teetotalism essential to the prosperity of our land;" "The proceedings of a Temperance meeting;" and, not the least important, "Rules for Health-seekers, by Dr. Gully, of Malvern, Worcestershire."

Advertisements, and articles intended for insertion, should be addressed to the Editor, 335, Strand, London; also, all orders for the Stamped Edition, with remittance for the amount, in postage-stamps, or Post-office orders, to John Cassell, as above.

TEETOTAL THOUGHTS FOR THE NEW YEAR.

[BY THE REV. BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

TEETOTALISM has now been in active operation, in our country and America, for sixteen or seventeen years, and has effected one of the greatest revolutions in the world that has ever been produced in so short a time. Among the various pamphlets that were sent out to retard our efforts, one was written to prove that the love of strong drinks was so inveterate, that any attempt to induce mankind to give them up was little better than madness. It was thought that you might as well endeavour to stop the motion of the winds, the tide, or the earth, as to persuade the people to abandon these deleterious liquors. But the Teetotalers were not to be frightened. Having given up the use of stimulants, they had stronger nerves than other folks, and consequently more mental and moral courage than those whose physical and spiritual constitutions are shaken by alcoholic poisons. "Try, try, try again," was their motto, and richly have they been repaid for their perseverance. As we enter upon 1851 we can look back upon some of the most delightful scenes that could gladden the heart of the patriot, the philanthropist, or the Christian. Were we to publish a report of the good that has been effected, we should require a large number of thick octavos, quartos, or even folios. We have cause, therefore, to thank God, and resolve to proceed.

Our effort is a most glorious one, if we reflect that we have had to do with those whom our most assiduous, sanguine, and hopeful philanthropists and Christians had abandoned in despair. Men and women, not only without clothes, food, furniture, or homes, but also, apparently, without one trace of humanity. We seemed to have the demoniaes of Scripture residing among us. They dwelt among the tombs; they were a terror to all who passed by; it might almost be said that they wore no clothes, and ate no food; nor was it possible to bind them by any physical or moral bonds. Many of them had not even a garret, or a bed of straw to lie on. They slept under hayricks or arches; and some of them in brick and lime-kilns, notwithstanding that many of their brethren had been poisoned in those holes by the foul air, or burnt to ashes. We knew a case in which a poor drunken wretch, who slept in a lime-kiln, was found in the morning with his own bones calcined. But this made no difference to his fellows. No one took warning from the awful scene, or drank the less. Even Christians quaffed the liquor with as much zest as ever, and ministers within a short distance of the catastrophe, forgot the Cross to descant upon the blessings of strong drink, and to pour out a vial of wrath upon the villainous Teetotalers.

It was, indeed, a wretched mass of humanity, which the Total Abstiners sought to save. The love of drink in them was so strong that it swallowed up every other affection. Women had their teeth extracted, and their beautiful tresses cut, and sold them for drink. Some anticipated the resurrectionist, and bartered their bodies away to the anatomist for these poisons, and thus, as it were, drank themselves while they were alive. Mothers lost all regard for their tender offspring, and sacrificed the food, the clothing, the bedding, the health, and, at last, the precious lives of their children for drink. Husbands became worse than tigers or bears. Virtue was sold for drink; character sacrificed for drink. Men and women stole for drink, swindled for drink, gambled for drink, and murdered to get money for drink. A gallon of beer, or a few glasses of gin, would hire villains for any and every sort of blackguardism, inhumanity, cruelty, or crime. The slavery of strong drink was ten thousand times worse than that of Barbary, America, Jamaica, or Brazil. The ravages of this plague were more extensive and deadly than those of war, the small-pox, typhus fever, influenza, or cholera. All sense of decency was destroyed, and even the commonest instinct of humanity entirely lost, through the bottle.

Men and women, who were born with hearts as tender as the Queen's, would drink, and play at cards on the coffin which contained the putrescent remains of a brother, a sister, a husband, a wife, or a child, whose corpse filled the dwelling with an insufferable and poisonous effluvia.

The abandoned woman, frantic with drink, has been known to roll the dead body of her paramour out of his coffin, and drag him round the room by the hair of his head, for the amusement of her guilty companions.

But these would fail to give only a faint idea of the blighting and blasting influence of these liquors. The glance we have taken above, affords but a partial specimen of the ruin and desolation which alcoholic drink has occasioned.

These, then, ye philanthropists—ye tract distributors—ye visitors of the sick—ye city missionaries and preachers of the Gospel—these, whom you had abandoned in despair, these are among the trophies of that Teetotalism on which some of you frown so contemptuously, and at which others of you feel so indignant—ay, and even boast of your achievements, if you can induce one whom we have reformed to break his pledge. Notwithstanding your anger or disdain, we are not afraid to compare notes with you, or measure our success with yours. Not a few of these, whom, by your example, you encouraged to drink, and whom you afterwards abandoned as hopelessly lost, are now clothed, and in their right mind. Teetotalism has, indeed, been one of the greatest and grandest philanthropists of the day. It has fed the hungry, clothed the naked, healed the sick, and restored the dying. It has furnished the house, sent the children to the school, recalled mothers from hard toil to nurse their offspring and to bless their household. Having exorcised them of the demon of strong drink, the heart has been brought back to its natural instincts and yearnings, and all the domestic affections have been resuscitated. The miracle would hardly have been more beneficial, if the dead had been raised. Drunken fathers, mothers, or children, are often worse than if they were dead, and therefore to emancipate such from their worse than bestial appetite is to perform a work as valuable to society as recalling valuable lives from the tomb.

Many a man who formerly was in rags is now in comfortable circumstances, and some, through teetotalism, have already retired from business to live upon their means. The country for many generations will owe a debt of gratitude to JAMES TAYLOR, of Birmingham, the secretary of the Freehold Land Society. That man will make the fortunes of thousands of his countrymen, and a hundred years hence will be ranked with your Clarksons and Howards; and yet all that James Taylor has done, and is still destined to do, is the work of Total Abstinence. His happy resolve, which he made in a drunken fit, "to sign the pledge in the morning," has given him all his power, and enabled him to become one of the first of patriots. Had the professors and ministers of religion who cry down teetotalism only succeeded in stopping the glorious movement, James Taylor might now have been a vagabond, or perhaps in a drunkard's grave and a drunkard's hell, and the country have been for ever deprived of his valuable talents and labours.

But we may proceed a little further. There are thousands now on the road to heaven, who but for the Temperance cause would at this moment have been numbered with the lost. Not that we make a Saviour of Total Abstinence; but, in these cases, it has been the Wilberforce that has burst their fetters, and the missionary which has led them to the house of prayer and to the Cross. Some of us hardly ever attend a prayer-meeting, without hearing voices addressing the Son of God, which, but for the Temperance pledge, would to this moment have continued to blaspheme His name. They signed the pledge—they left the alehouse and their guilty companions—they came to the sanctuary and chose the saints as their friends—and now they are on the road to Heaven!

And this is not all. Many of the abandoned women, whom none of our former philanthropic and religious machinery reached, are now among our most valuable agents in reclaiming others. We have known them bring one poor drunken wretch after another, not only to the pledge-book, but to the Church meeting and to the Lord's table; and thus the saving of one has been the salvation of many. We have heard these reclaimed inebriates plead earnestly and eloquently with God and man. They used powerful arguments to reclaim the drunkard, to induce the moderate drinkers to give up their baneful and seductive glass; to arouse church members and ministers from the folly and wickedness of sanctifying a poison; and, further, they called upon every one to repent and believe the Gospel; and above all, wrestled with the King of kings, to pour out his Spirit upon all mankind. Many of these, too, have been reclaimed from the lowest depths of vice. When we have been listening to the powerful appeals of these men, we have again and again had it whispered, that a few years ago these very philanthropists were a terror and a curse to themselves and to all around them. Only a few weeks ago a case of this very kind came under our notice. The individual, whose thrilling appeals went to every heart, was, before he signed the pledge, an incarnate demon, and now is a faithful preacher of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

We cannot conclude this paper without observing that Total Abstinence has been even more useful in preventing drunkenness than in reclaiming drunkards. What hosts would have fallen into this debasing vice but for the Temperance Movement! Myriads through eternity will bless God for the honoured individual who first proposed that we should totally abstain from these accursed beverages. We have among us numbers of respectable women whom strong drink would have transformed into street walkers; we have men whom these liquors would have converted into thieves and vagabonds; we have those in the Church who might now have been numbered with demons; and we have ministers who would, ere now, have lost their health, characters, and usefulness if they had not joined our ranks.

With such glowing facts before us, we "THANK GOD AND TAKE COURAGE." Happily, our cause is everywhere progressing. We have reason to believe that the exertions of 1850 have given a mighty impetus to the effort, and if we are as faithful and as active, and zealous as we ought to be, another year will not revolve without our seeing and realizing greater things than these.

CONTENTMENT.

[BY DALMOGAND.]

IF earthly felicity unmingled, is, like the philosopher's stone, visionary and unacquirable, should not we desist from the vain pursuit, and pass our appointed days in sweet CONTENTMENT?—He who knows full well the present, past, and future—

"Whose instant glance pervades

ought to be esteemed the better judge of what conduces to the creature's benefit.

Religion and reason are the great originators and sustainers of this important virtue. Man should ever recollect, that not for his own individual gratification was he made earth's tenant—that not in this world has the Creator thought expedient to confer the entire rewards of his obedience, but in a glorious hereafter. Enigmatic are the ways of Providence. How often does that which man, in his short-sightedness, bewails as the greatest possible calamity, redound to his advantage! Repeatedly, for example, have parties been deprived of a conveyance by a particular vessel, and at length, to still their outcry, heard that the ship had perished. The messenger to Nineveh was wrath on the destruction of his pleasant gourd, but its withering taught him mercy: objects of idolatrous affection may disappear, yet their departure may prove the bringing in of a better hope. If lovers of the Deity, all occurrences, we are instructed, work together for our profit. Is it, then, beseeching, or can it be pleasing to the Almighty, that his creatures should, by discontent, exhibit such a deficiency of confidence in His power and wisdom? Contentment, however, when at variance with the maxims of its founders, is not only reprehensible, but highly sinful. By the labour of his hands and intellect, man was commanded to subsist—utterable his shame, if averse to employing the faculties received, he fails to seek for himself and the dependers on his care a fitting livelihood. But censurable, too, is the inordinate love of gain-getting; for the avaricious man, in his pursuit of wealth, neglects more urgent matters, and not seldom "pierces himself through with many sorrows," foolishly preferring momentary riches and eternal poverty to an abiding treasure.

Wilful ignorance, being in direct dissonance to religion and reason, is likewise criminal. These were bestowed on us as our conductors, and not without our needing them; for, as the outbound-voyager requires a chart and compass to guide his path to the desired haven, so does the heaven-bound. Rocks and whirlpools, material and spiritual, abound; and he who desires no counsel, moves in double hazard of disaster. Curiosity ranks among the first manifestations of the infant mind, and extended knowledge gives increased enjoyment. But, into those things which are evidently veiled off from the rude gaze of man, to seek not to inquire is wisdom.

There exist, we see, two varying species of contentment, which may be contra-distinguished by the adjuncts, blind and enlightened, false and true—the one the fruit of sloth or ignorance, the other the premium acquired by hearkening to the teachings of inspiration and of reason, the foretaste of predicted bliss, and what I am endeavouring to inculcate. To the man possessed of competence—in the proper signification of the word—but across whose bosom flits a casual pang of discontent or envy, I submit these paradoxes:—

I. That he, in turn, is often the envy of the envied.

II. That those abounding most in wealth and pomp, are vexed with care, disease, and sorrow, with which he, comparatively, is unacquainted.

III. That they at one time may have aspired to these possessions with sentiments akin to his, but now have found their vainness and delusion.

IV. That wealth or grandeur is, for the most part, but gilded poverty.

The solution of each item might form the groundwork of a lengthened homily; but conciseness being imperative, words must suffice for sentences, and the first paradox, being so transparent, may be dismissed in silence. Increased riches bring not with them corresponding natural wants, so the possessors must rack their ingenuity to discover artificial; and these fancied wants, soon wearying, give place to others, which will preclude due attention to the natural and essential. To health of mind and body, morbidity succeeds; concern about futurity evaporates—all is entombed in present sensuality. Again, those delightful anticipations of wealth's solidities will, on proving a deception, if not counteracted by religion's soothing influence, lay the seed of bitter disappointment. Lastly, to detect the genuine or spurious state of wealth's appearances, tests must be used, and a contentment-gauge seems the most certain. If content, unmoved by all the gaudy joys of riches, remain at zero, then, in a moral light, must wealth be reckoned pauperism in masquerade. Neither poverty nor riches for one's portion is a standard wish, as sensible as it is old. Each should impress upon his memory that the mind or body cannot flourish in a state of inactivity, and that as sin and sorrow made their entrance into this world in quick succession, so must they make their exit before it can become again the repository of happiness.

For well nigh six thousand years our globe has been the battle-field of godliness and devilry, and we need not waste all our energy in deploring this sad fact, but should also manifest our contentedness to fight beneath the gonfalon of truth till our discharge, come when it may. To repine that we are placed in a state of probation is labour lost; and surrounding folly should obtain, not our sanction, but our protest. To have ourselves and those around us conformed to the Divine will, forms an exalted aim: Jesus Christ has withdrawn to Heaven, leaving his disciples as executors and representatives.

Blind, or false contentment may receive a passing illustration in the sluggard, the debtor, or the drunkard.

SLOTH appears a very prevalent distemper in these days, and it is one which, if not opposed, soon arrays both the outward and inner man in enfeebling raiment. Vegetables have life; beasts possess life and motion; and the sluggard, having even these but in imperfection, displays little anxiety about occupying the higher stage of thoughtful enterprise. How exceedingly proposterous for such an individual to prate of his contentment, seeing that his mode of life must be viewed as a rebellious burlesque on Nature's laws! A visitor of a certain corner of the kingdom informed me that, asking on one occasion the way to some locality, the phlegmatic native, considering it too much trouble to unpocket his hand, gave the direction with his foot. All of us, I fear, have our fits of indistinctness towards active duties, but the demon of sluggishness must not be permitted to usurp dominion over us; for the attendant on lazy habits, either in an individual or a community, is wretchedness. Let, then, physical or mental indolence be abjured as totally indefensible.

DEBT is another predicament in which contented ejaculations sometimes escape. Paul, however, when he expresses contentment in any circumstances, evidently excludes avoidable debt; nay, he admonishes against it. But the apostolic moralist may be an authority rather old-fashioned for many of our knowing moderns, who practise the cozening profession with a diligence and an ardour which, otherwise expended, would secure them from the gripe of penury. A debtor and a slave are very often synonymous terms. Individuals who come under responsibilities which they cannot in probability meet, hang, as it were, so many dead-weights round their necks to root them in the mire; while those who trepan the unsuspecting with fair words, and pride themselves on their dexterity in contracting debts never meant to be liquidated, will at least, with other thievish spirits, be driven from the heavenly porch. Consequently, reader, the greater care we exercise in keeping away from unwarranted debts, in commerce or in morals, the likelier will be our fortune to discover true contentment.

DRUNKENNESS, again, like the witches' cauldron in Macbeth, affords its votary a ghastly satisfaction, and he, hiccuping, adopts their song:—

“Black spirits and white,
Red spirits and grey;
Mingle, mingle, mingle,
You that mingle may.”

Poor drunkard! at this death-dance of thine men laugh, when they should rather, sighing, ask how a brother should have become such a wanderer from rectitude. Little children sometimes ramble forth in quest of flowers further and further from their home, till, perceiving their stray condition, they, with an outburst of lamentation, lie down and, peradventure, perish. Much in the same way men diverge from the region of sobriety, and find that they have unconsciously entered into another province, where, deeming return more arduous, they fix their dwelling. Is it allowable that we should remain at ease either in or with intemperance? If answered in the negative, let us not slumber.

I might, in conclusion, point a shaft at false discontent, comparing its victim to Sterne's Smeifungus, who travelled from “Dan to Beersheba, and declared all barren;” or, preferring a similitude from nature, bid the discontented behold his counterpart in one of Iceland's mud-heaving fountains; but I shall add a contrast.

The river Nile at stated periods overflows its banks, and irrigates the surrounding meadows; instils into the languid herbage vigour, and adapts the sun-searched soil for germination. Then free, relieved by its alluvial ejection, it glides on in peace. Analogous to the action of this noble stream is the procedure of the enlightened contented man. He, too, has burst embankments—those of sloth and ignorance—and now diffuses cheerfulness around; endeavours to confirm his family in the faith of Christ, or to prepare their previously-neglected minds for engraftment with religion's precious truths. Then buoyant, disburdened of that load of discontent and its accompanying evils, he pursues the tenour of his heaven-ward course, tranquil, and rejoicing.

A SOUND OPINION.—“Total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, if the writer may be allowed to judge from a trial of more than sixteen years, is no sin against human health. Rather is it to animal man a boon and a blessing.”—The Christian Miscellany.

THE SALVATION OF SOULS HINDERED BY INTemperance.—“The preaching of the Gospel would be attended with greater success, were it not for the intemperate habits which prevail to a fearful extent in this particular locality. We have, nevertheless, in our small society some cheering instances of the power of divine grace in eradicating even this deep-rooted vice.”—Cape Colony.

RICHARD COBDEN AND TEETOTALISM.

THE advocates of Teetotalism, in order to encourage those whom they address to renewed exertions for the dissemination of their principles, frequently refer to the fact that they have on their side many excellent and influential men, who, though they have not subscribed their names in the pledge-book of any society, and do not appear on temperance platforms, are yet often heard advocating the practice, on the ground of its acknowledged excellence, and, in many cases, on the ground of their own personal experience. Among such men we rejoice to find RICHARD COBDEN; and we have great pleasure in furnishing an illustration taken from a speech delivered at Leeds at the recent meeting of the West Riding Freehold Land Society. After advertizing to the improvident habits of a large portion of the working classes, and to the poverty and misery which usually resulted from such habits, and which he could not help regarding as a righteous retribution. Mr. Cobden said: I do not like to be thought reading sermons to the working classes, because it seems so much like assuming that you are better than they; and especially ought I not to be thought to do so to those now present, because, by being here, they prove that they, to some extent at least, do not need it. But, gentlemen, I cannot help feeling intolerant when I think what an amazing amount of money is wasted every year by the working classes in this country. Gentlemen, there was a paper prepared and read by Mr. Porter, Secretary of the Board of Trade, containing some facts which are really startling, but to which everybody who knows Mr. Porter's careful and elaborate labour, and the position he holds, must attach the highest importance. By this paper Mr. Porter makes out that many, many millions are spent every year by the working classes in intoxicating drinks; and spent, too, when they must be absent from their wives and families (applause). Now this is so utterly and thoroughly selfish (laughter and loud cheers). I don't mean to say that they ought to make a practice of drinking it in the presence of their wives and children; but the fact of their doing these things absent from their homes shows that they are doing that which cannot receive the approbation of their wives and children (loud applause). And, gentlemen, I believe that the people of this country are awakening to the importance of improved habits, in order to secure the benefits of societies such as this (hear, hear). When you see your distinguished member and others of his class coming forward to recommend saving habits, believe me they are giving you proofs of their disinterestedness; for, though I do not at present stand in the position of the hon. representative who has addressed you, yet, if I did, and wanted to make the people slaves in this country, then I would say to the working classes—"Follow drinking habits (vehement and reiterated cheering). Spend every shilling you get on the Saturday night as fast as you can get it, and then I am sure I shall have you at my price on Monday morning." Why, gentlemen, when I say that the working classes who spend all their money extravagantly must be slaves, I am convinced, and you will also understand me to say, that those men who are drunkards, and save nothing out of their wages, when they are fair and remunerative, that those men are the greatest enemies to their own order (hear, hear). For I defy those who are sober to keep up wages when the majority are improvident and drunken (applause). As a politician, I confess that my fate is cast amongst the great mass of the people (hear, hear); and I cannot myself hope to see any real progress made in any direction in this country, unless it has its beginning in the social improvement and the progress of morality in the hearts of the people themselves (hear, hear). Gentlemen, I have always appealed to the mass of the people for sympathy and support in every measure I have come out with (hear, and applause); and therefore, as I feel that whatever I am at,—whatever I seek for the good of the people of this country and the world at large, has for its object to raise the morality and advance the happiness of the great mass of the people—I cannot fail to feel interested in their moral and social elevation (hear, hear). But you cannot make the body of the people otherwise than slaves, unless you can emancipate them: from the thralldom which makes them the slaves of their own vices. But, gentlemen, the reason why I feel more and more bitter against this pest of intemperance is this— that I, who have never at any time a strong constitution, have been obliged to abstain from everything but water, in order to do the work I had set myself to perform, and to resort more and more to the pump and the cow—(a laugh)—every day of my life (great cheering). Don't, I beg, take me as a specimen of a teetotaler. I have been always worked beyond my strength, and I never was strong, to begin with; but what I have accomplished has been done by abstinence from those liquors which are consumed in such rivers in this country. Everything taken beyond water—I don't include tea and coffee, of course—but everything stronger than that is worse than useless; and when I contemplate the injuries caused by the large quantities of spirituous liquors taken in this country, I cannot but feel somewhat intolerant when I speak of it.

AN APPEAL FOR THE PERISHING INEBRIATE.

By the REV. JANEZ BURNS, D.D.

HARK! the crowds in misery groaning,
Bound by drinking custom's chain;
Tell them they are only freemen
Who from alcohol abstain.

Hark! around the hearth the brawling,
Where the drink is handed round;
Let them sign, and all abstaining,
Then shall social joy abound.

Hark! from yonder brutal masses,
Oaths and blasphemies arise;
Let them break the dazzling goblet,
And in moral greatness rise.

Hark! the felon's sighs ascending
From his wretched dreary cell;
It was drink that first allured him
To the paths which lead to hell.

Hark! the ravings of the madman,
How the glory's past away;
'T was the sparkling cup unmann'd him,
Blighting in him reason's ray.

Hark! the drunkard just expiring,
Listen to his dying breath;
"For the drink my soul I barter'd,
Who can bear eternal death!"

Christians, rouse your souls to action;
Try these wretched ones to bless;
By your influence and example,
Lead the way to happiness.

Let not precious souls around you,
Through your drinking be destroyed;*
Save from falling by your conduct,
Those for whom the Saviour died.†

INTOXICATING DRINKS AND THE GRAND INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION.

IN our last number we congratulated our Teetotal readers on the fact that among the regulations as to refreshments in the Crystal Palace, wine, spirits, beer, and all intoxicating drinks are expressly excluded. We were, however, deeply grieved, in reading the account of the recent visit of His Royal Highness Prince Albert, to find the following statement:—"As the Prince was leaving the Exhibition, the men employed on the building, to the number of 2,000, formed in a semicircle round the spot where the Royal carriage was drawn up. As they waited in respectful silence the Prince's appearance, a brewer's dray entered the gates with two hundred and fifty gallons of beer, and, as if by instinct, they recognized that the grateful supply was for them. Of course, they welcomed the dray with cheers." We were the more grieved at this, because we had been given to understand that the contractors for the building had, very wisely, prohibited the use of any strong drink on the premises. The incident, however, may not be altogether without its use, as it has drawn forth from some intelligent and thoroughly consistent Teetotalers, a remonstrance which we have much pleasure in presenting to our readers, and which we trust may have a salutary influence as to the future:—

TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE ALBERT.

“London, Dec. 10, 1850.

SIR.—At no former period of the history of our beloved country was the attention of the whole civilised world so intensely directed toward it, probably, as at the present moment. And this is mainly owing to the noble and happy conception of your Royal Highness, in projecting the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations, to take place in the ensuing year: for which all ranks and classes of men in all lands are ready to yield to you the homage of their spontaneous and unbought praise.

Standing, therefore, as our country now confessedly does, at the head of the kingdoms and nations of the earth, in all the great elements of physical and moral power—in wealth, skill, enterprise, industry, intelligence, and practical morality—our responsibilities as a people are proportionately heavy; according to the Scriptural maxim, that ‘where much is given much will be required.’

As members of Temperance Societies, we have observed, with inexpressible delight, many of your Royal Highness’s public efforts to improve the condition of the labouring classes, and to introduce more provident habits among the humbler ranks of society, by the personal patronage afforded by you to the establishment of Public Baths, Model Lodging-houses, Asylums for Servants, and still more recently by the distribution of prizes with your own hand to certain individuals in the parishes surrounding your royal residence at Windsor, who were deemed most worthy, for their habits of industry, order, domestic and personal cleanliness, and sobriety.

We have noticed also, with great satisfaction, that in the regulations for the refreshment of the visitors to the Great Exhibition of 1851, a clause has been inserted, with the approbation of your Royal Highness, prohibiting the sale or supply of any intoxicating beverages, even in the smallest quantity, to any parties.

While these circumstances have filled our hearts with joy, at the exercise of your great and powerful influence in favour of one of the most important movements of the present age—the promotion of temperate habits among all classes of our countrymen—we frankly acknowledge to your Royal Highness that we have felt a corresponding degree of sorrow at learning, from the public journals, that your first official visit to the Crystal Palace now erecting for the Exhibition was attended by the entry of a brewer’s dray, with 250 gallons of beer to be drunk by the working men employed on the edifice, and that their vociferous cheers were as much excited by the appearance of this miscalled “beon,” as by your august presence at the same moment of time.

We would fain hope that this incident was neither designed by, nor approved of, your Royal Highness; but, associated, as it has been and will continue to be, with your first Royal visit to this noble pile, it cannot fail to give the sanction of your high rank, superior intelligence, and known philanthropy, to this mode of exercising hospitality among the working classes.

And yet we have abundance of the most painful evidence to prove that this encouragement, by the example of the great, to the consumption of this and other intoxicating beverages by the working men of the kingdom, has been productive of more loss to the nation and the community, in life, health, money, character, and happiness, than any other single cause that can be named: neither plague nor pestilence, war nor famine, having committed such ravages on national wealth and individual prosperity, as the widespread habit of indulging in intoxicating drinks.

In the large volume of evidence laid before the House of Commons on this subject in 1834, and in the valuable Statistical Report, read before the British Association for the Promotion of Science, at its recent meeting in Edinburgh during the present year, by Mr. G. Porter, of the Board of Trade, and author of the well-known work, the “Progress of the Nation,” it has been proved to demonstration that a sum far exceeding the whole revenue of the kingdom is expended yearly in Great Britain and Ireland in intoxicating drinks, of which beer forms by far the largest portion; and that while this is wholly unnecessary to sustain the health and strength of the labourer (to whom, indeed, it is deleterious rather than beneficial, as shown by the admirable work of Dr. Carpenter, “On the Use and Abuse of Alcoholic Drinks,” dedicated, by permission, to your Royal Highness,) it is the most fruitful of all existing sources in the production of crime, disease, insanity, prostitution, and wretchedness in every form,—and, besides all this, it wastes wholesome and nutritious grain, enough to feed more than eight millions of people for an entire year.

Your Royal Highness has given too many proofs to the world of the intensity of your desire to lessen all these evils, to permit us for a moment to doubt its sincerity. We therefore hope, either that this distribution of intoxicating drink among the workmen at the Crystal Palace was devised by others, and was without your Royal sanction or approbation, or that it was permitted without a due consideration of the effect of such an example on the rest of the world.

When it is expected that some thousands of foreigners will visit England to behold this great Exhibition of 1851, and when it is known that, with all our blessings and advantages, the reproach of our country, in the eyes of most other nations, is the addition of its labouring classes to intemperate habits, we have additional reason for expressing our earnest desire and hope that your Royal Highness will, with that active and practical benevolence by which your whole public life has been characterised, use the influence of your Royal dignity, high station, and deserved popularity, in assisting to wipe off this stain from the national escutcheon; so that the foreign visitors, returning to their own countries, may add to the praises which they will be disposed to bestow on England and the English for many undoubted excellent qualities, their surprise and admiration at the purity and sobriety of our manners, as compared with their previous impressions, and the consequent increase of health, order, and morality, as the legitimate fruits of the disuse of intoxicating drinks.

Trusting that your Royal Highness will attribute the freedom with which we have ventured to express our sentiments to its true cause, an honest zeal for the reputation of our common country, and the welfare of our fellow-men; and with feelings of the most profound and sincere respect and gratitude, as well as earnest prayers for the prolongation of your valuable life, and that of our beloved Queen, from whose past joint career we may entertain the fairest hopes for the future tranquillity and prosperity of the realm, we have the honour to remain, your Royal Highness’s most humble servants, (Signed) &c. &c. &c.

HOW TO STAY THE TIDE OF WOE.

If we would see the Temperance cause,
Triumphant o’er our land;
We must be vigilant, nor pause,—
Drink has a powerful hand.
Then while we may,
Let each one help to stay
This tide of woe;
’Twill stronger flow,
’Twill fiercer grow,
The longer we delay.

There’s many a heart that’s mourning now,
There’s many a heart that’s sad;
Intemperance darkens many a brow,
Drives many raving mad.
Then while we may, &c.

Here in our midst its victims go,
They stagger by our side;
Be “up and doing” ere the foe
Shall rough-shod o’er us ride.
Then while we may, &c.

O Christians, pray, the cause is good,
And lend a helping hand,
Against the overwhelming flood,
All take a fearless stand.

Yes! while we may
Let each one stop to stay
This tide of woe;
’Twill stronger flow,
’Twill fiercer grow,
The longer we delay.

THE TEMPERANCE REFORMATION.

MOVEMENTS FOR 1851.

As will be seen from an advertisement in our first page, a MEETING will be held in EXETER-HALL, on Monday evening, January 6, for the purpose of affording to some Teetotalers, engaged in various laborious occupations, an opportunity of demonstrating to the persons who may then be assembled, the practicability and efficiency of the teetotal system. The Meeting is convened by the Committee, to whom has been entrusted the management of a Series of Temperance Demonstrations in the Metropolis, which Series was introduced to notice at the social gathering held in the LONDON TAVERN, Bishopsgate, in October last, and which commenced with the Great Meeting in the THEATRE ROYAL DRURY LANE, in November last. It is the Second of a Series of SIX MEETINGS, to be held in EXETER-HALL. A large gathering is confidently expected, and it is believed that many EMPLOYERS will be present, and that they will be deeply interested in the important details which will then be furnished, proving that their interests are greatly implicated in the success of the Temperance Movement. Invitations will be sent to the principal Employers in and around the Metropolis, and measures are adopted to make the Meeting extensively known among the Operative Classes also.

The Committee have already intimated that FUNDS, to the amount of about FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS, will be required, to enable them to carry out their designs in reference to these Meetings, as well as to put it in their power to assist in other great Temperance Movements during the year 1851, anticipating, as they do, a large influx of temperance men, from all parts of the kingdom and from every quarter of the globe, during the Industrial Exhibition in Hyde-park. The Committee have made a promising commencement, but they find it necessary to repeat their appeal. The attention of the public has been powerfully attracted to the Temperance Movement by the operations of this Committee, and it is earnestly hoped that a greater impetus may be given to it by the liberality of those who profess to regard it as one of the most important movements of the age.

THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT AND THE PAPER DUTY.

WE hail with great satisfaction the announcement which has reached us, that a vigorous movement is in active course of organization for the purpose of arousing the country to a sense of the injustice perpetrated on all classes of the community by the excise duty on paper. It is a subject in which the friends of Temperance have an especial interest, as they already owe a deep debt of gratitude to the popular press for the service it has rendered their cause, and would be able to make a still more extensive and efficient use of it, if it were once emancipated from this impost.

It has been amply demonstrated that the Duty on Paper, insignificant as a source of public revenue, and almost imperceptible in its influence upon the price of the comparatively costly books used by the upper classes, puts insurmountable barriers in the way of a really cheap and good literature for the masses; that it augments the price of the publications designed for the people to an extent that greatly limits their circulation, and restricts the reading of the poor man within the narrowest bounds; that it brings failure upon the most deserving and enterprising efforts of philanthropic men, who have sought, by turning the appliances of large capitals and vast establishments to the creation of a popular literature, to promote the great object of Whig aspiration—the spread of useful knowledge; and that, by denying the struggling workman the healthful recreation of a cheap press, it has driven him to idleness, or to the sensual excitements of dissipation, in moments he might otherwise have improved for the cultivation of his nobler faculties. That Messrs. Chambers of Edinburgh should have been compelled to abandon a cheap and useful publication, which had reached a sale of 80,000 copies weekly, because—thanks to the Paper Duty—it did not pay, and that the same cause should have arrested so many of the noble enterprises of Mr. Charles Knight, are sufficient proof of the extent to which this impost, perpetuated for the sake of a revenue of £800,000, impedes the growth of reading habits amongst the people, and withholds from them the supply of wholesome mental food.

There is no public movement in this country more deeply indebted to the service of a cheap press, or whose future advancement is more dependent upon the wide circulation of a popular literature, than the cause of Total Abstinence. The tracts and other publications issued by its friends, have carried its principles into the home of the poor drunkard, moved the minds of masses whom it would have been impossible to carry to a Temperance meeting. The promoters of every important movement have felt the value of the services the press is capable of rendering it, as they have shown by the extent to which they have enlisted them. It was for this end the Anti-Corn-law League, the most gigantic as it was the most successfully organized agitation of modern times, gathered their vast funds. They raised their hundreds of thousands that they might print and circulate their statistics and arguments throughout the length and breadth of the land, that they might be carried home to every hearth, become the family talk of every household, and thus win their way to the nation's familiar convictions. The rapid triumph of their cause crowned this judicious policy, and shows us what is the secret of success in every agitation that seeks to instruct and convince the minds of the masses.

It is scarcely credible to persons not practically connected with the trade of publishing, to understand to how great an extent the issue of cheap books and tracts is impeded by the operation of the paper duty. In the case of large and costly works, the general expenses of producing which are large, this duty makes an insignificant item, and its pressure is imperceptible to the wealthy purchaser. But in the publication of books intended for the people, and sold at a price so near the cost of production as to make the profit on each copy the veriest shadow of a fraction, and so to require an immense circulation to sustain them at all, this duty of 1½d. per lb. makes the whole difference between profit and loss. Nor indeed is the sum thus directly exacted by the excise the only element to be taken into account in this argument. The difference the duty really makes in the cost of paper is much more than its own amount. The manufacturer has to make his payments to the excise in ready money, and most of his transactions with his customers are necessarily conducted, more or less, upon the credit system. This obliges him to employ a larger capital in his trade than he would otherwise require, and the interest upon this becomes an item of charge to the purchaser of the article. As in every other branch of commercial enterprise, again, the paper-maker is liable to bad debts. But part of the money the failure of his customer thus deprives him of he has already paid, in the shape of duty, to Government, and for this actual loss of cash he has to make up by a general increase of his trade charges. Such are illustrations of the indirect operation of this impost, which, together with the direct exaction itself, renders the interference of the excise a most serious barrier in the way of a cheap and good literature for the people, to say nothing of the intolerable vexation occasioned by the incessant meddling of the revenue officer with every part of the process of the mill.

We hope the friends of Temperance will be alive to their duty in this matter. They are the natural allies of any movement intended to promote a cheap press. It is the very life and soul of their cause. It is their most efficient and mighty weapon to attack the drinking usages of society, and break down the degrading habits which still hold the masses in thralldom.

Every tract we issue is a missionary gone forth to make his converts. The larger the scale in which we multiply them, the more numerous are our agents of good—our angels of mercy—at work in the world, seeking to lead the wretched drunkard to sobriety and peace.

Our course as Teetotalers is plain. We must stand in the forefront of those who demand the repeal of the paper tax. We must send our petitions to the legislature to aid the efforts of the public spirited men who are trying to secure for the friends of progress the great boon of an untaxed press. An appeal is being made to Sunday-school teachers, and to members of mechanics' institutes, to send special petitions to the legislature on this matter. It is well; but we, too, have a special plea. We are doing a great work for the public good. Let us, too, ask respectfully, but firmly, that the Government may take this impediment from our path. Teetotalers, make your voice heard, and demand the REPEAL OF THE PAPER DUTY!

ANCIENT LAW RESPECTING DRUNKENNESS.—A certain people among the ancient Greeks (the Locrians, I think) punished with double rigour any crime committed in liquor; first and principally for getting drunk, and secondly, for the crime committed; for certainly he who eradicates his reason deliberately, as drunkards do, is much more guilty of what is committed for want of that reason, destroyed by his own fault, than he whose reason is overcome by any accidental attack of passion.—Taylor's Laconics.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the Teetotal Times.

SIR,—After the publication of "The Bottle" and "The Drunkard's Children," it was my intention to have followed up those works by others bearing upon the Temperance question. Circumstances have hitherto prevented me from doing this; but having still a great desire to carry out this idea, and also being very strongly urged by many friends to do so, I now propose to publish a series of Twenty-four Plates, as a continuous story, contrasting the advantages of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks, with the evils arising from their use. The size of each subject would be about 6½ inches by 9½—the two contrasting subjects to be printed together on a sheet of paper the same size as one of the plates of "The Bottle"—to be published monthly, price twopenne. The price is put thus low in the desire that they may have an extensive circulation; but by so doing, I run considerable risk of remuneration, as the execution of this sort of works requires much time and labour, besides incurring considerable expense; and therefore, before commencing this Temperance work, I beg through you to call upon all the Temperance Societies, and the friends of this important cause, who may wish to further my views by becoming subscribers to my proposed work, to have the kindness to inform me as early as possible (postage free) the number of copies they would wish to subscribe for; and should I then find the number sufficient to guarantee me from loss, I will acquaint them of it,—and shall then require the subscribers to forward it me immediately, by Post-office order (free), the amount they have proposed to subscribe for, for the first month, and so on afterwards for each succeeding month until completed.

TEMPERANCE LECTURES.

We are requested to state that Mr. Warham, surgeon, of Newcastle-under-Lyme, is willing to give his series of lectures to those societies that have not yet seen his valuable drawings of the various organs of the body, both in their healthy and diseased states; the latter showing the evil effects of intoxicating drinks on the human body,—calculated to make a deep and lasting impression. His diagrams and paintings, about three hundred in number, form a picture gallery of science, health, and disease. As Mr. Warham requires only ten shillings for each lecture, in addition to his travelling expenses by second-class carriage, societies within a reasonable distance will find this an attractive and economical mode of advancing the Temperance Movement.

MINISTERIAL RUIN THROUGH DRINK.—A. was early converted, and for years walked worthy of the Gospel. His grace and gifts gave promise of his being long an able minister of the New Testament. But he soon declined, and presented reproof. Devotion to the pipe issued in gross intemperance and other sins. Deposed from the ministry, "he became a public profligate, a profane swearer, a reeling drunkard, and street-fighter. His wife died broken-hearted. He opened a low beer-shop, in which he soon expended the little property he possessed." In the "clay-pit" he obtained "a scanty support for himself and his children." He fell from bad to worse, and, sustaining injury in his employment, the part mortified, and he died, in great agony of mind, a lost man.—The Christian Miscellany.

TAXATION ON MALT LIQUORS.—If a labouring man consume one pot of beer daily, the taxation, direct and indirect, on him is—firstly, on the land whereon the barley is grown; secondly, on the taxed labour which grows it; thirdly, on the malt; fourthly, on the maltster's charges for vexatious excise regulations; fifthly, on hops; and sixthly, on the license for a publican. On all these items 3d. out of 4d. is tax; therefore, on 365 pots, the working man pays an annual tax of £4 14s. 3d.—R. Montgomery Martin.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

GREAT TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION
IN EXETER HALL.

The first of a series of meetings for 1850 and 1851 took place on Monday evening, the 2nd December; SAMUEL BOWLY, Esq., of Gloucester, presiding.

The proceedings commenced by Mr. J. W. GREEN stating that several letters had been received by the committee from persons whom they had expected to be present, but who were unavoidably detained from the meeting. He read one from James Taylor, Esq., the coroner of Bolton, a gentleman who has exerted himself with laudable zeal to keep down the number of houses licensed for the sale of intoxicating drinks in that borough. Mr. Green stated that although the committee regretted his absence on that occasion, they were happy to state that arrangements would shortly be made to give Mr. Taylor an opportunity of bringing the evils of the licensing system under the notice of the friends of Temperance in London (cheers).

The CHAIRMAN then briefly stated the object of the present meeting. He felt that it was not very flattering to them, as Christians and philanthropists, that the public were not willing to pay the price of a couple of quarts of beer to attend and support so good a cause. If the meeting had been convened for the purpose of attacking the Pope, there would no doubt have been a crowded house; but he for one was inclined to think that the Cardinal, with his scarlet hat and stockings, was not half so mischievous a personage as a certain Mr. Boniface who lived yonder, and came, not with the patent of a foreign prince, but the license and authority of her Majesty the Queen (hear, hear). Reference had been made in Mr. Taylor's note to the licensing system. He (the Chairman) believed the time would shortly come when the magistrates of England would find much better employment upon a temperance platform than upon the magistrates' bench on a licensing day (hear). The friends of temperance had, however, an uphill work before them—their cause was not yet popular; nevertheless, as they had truth on their side they were more powerful than if they had numbers only, and they must ultimately prevail (hear). He was not at all afraid of their principles, whatever might be their amount of success; he had now advocated the cause for sixteen years, and each returning year confirmed him more deeply than ever in the conviction that the temperance cause was of the utmost importance to the health and welfare of the public (hear). He believed that it was comparatively useless to expend their efforts in endeavouring to promote education and religion while gin-shops were encouraged and intemperance promoted, and thus all their benevolent enterprises frustrated. Let them strive to convince the Christian public that the only way to remove the present miseries of the world was to make people temperate, and they would soon have reason to rejoice in the prosperity of their undertaking (cheers).

ARCHIBALD PRENTICE, Esq., of Manchester, said he had been intrusted with a message from his townsmen to the people of London, and it was to say that they had sixty places of meeting in Manchester, and held as many as 105 temperance meetings every week (cheers). True, they were not meetings in large halls, like the present; but small meetings consisting, some of them, of not more than 100 people, and held in obscure corners of the town; but they were attended by earnest speakers and attentive hearers, and by their means, as many as 10,000 people weekly received instruction in temperance principles (hear, hear). He had also another message to deliver, and that was, that if during the forthcoming exhibition, the London friends determined on getting up a grand temperance demonstration, the people of Manchester, to the number of 2,000, would be very happy to accept a respectful invitation to attend (hear, hear). The committee who superintended the arrangements for the present meeting had requested him to direct the attention of the friends to the effects of temperance on wages. Now he would not detain them long with a dry question of political economy; but he thought they would all see, with him, the importance of the working classes thoroughly understanding how the present drinking habits of society trench upon their own interests. He had had many opportunities of witnessing the effects of turns-out, and had paid special attention to the subject. Adam Smith, Richard Cobden, and other Economists, told them, that if there was a greater demand for labour than there was supply, the price of labour would rise; that if there was a greater amount of labour thrown into the market than there was demand for its profitable employment, the price of it would fall; while, if the demand and supply were equal, prices would remain stationary. In the course of his experience, however, he had seen wages fall when trade was stationary, and it arose from this, that, whenever disputes arose between masters and their men, the former having capital to fall back upon, and the latter none, the weakest party must go to the wall. It was important, therefore, to draw the attention of working men to this fact, and to endeavour to impress upon them the necessity of providing for such contingencies. If a dispute should arise in a mill where there were 1,000 teetotal hands, and a turn-out should be the result, the men would stand in a better position than the same number of intemperate men, and would not be obliged to give in a few days, and return to work on any terms, however disadvantageous. The temperate man could have credit at the provision-shop if he required it; he had his house comfortably furnished, besides, perhaps, something in the shape of savings to rely upon; while the intemperate man, without credit, clothes, or money, could not stand for a single day, and must return to work on any condition, however unjust, in order to supply the cravings of his hungry family with food, and his own depraved appetite with drink (hear). There were, doubtless, political and commercial reasons for the great depression in some branches of trade, but it must not be forgotten that the real cause of the distressed condition of the shirt makers and slop tailors was, that men had not been sufficiently careful of their money and health, and, therefore, their poor miserable wives and daughters were obliged to turn out and work at any price they could possibly get (hear). If there were better economy in spending the wages of the men, and if so much was not wasted in drink, the women would be employed at home where they should be, instead of being compelled to wear out their existence in working for tailors and shirt makers (hear). Now, although in some cases it would be almost impossible to make savings out of the very small earnings of working men, yet, upon the whole, it must not be forgotten that a vast amount of money passed through their hands, out of which, something might be put by to form a resource in the times of difficulty and low wages. The public expenditure of the country was about £50,000,000 a year, and people, perhaps very justly, complained that they were over-taxed; but nothing was ever said about spending £60,000,000 a year in unnecessary and intoxicating drinks, the use of which was mischievous in the extreme (hear). Of that large sum squandered in drink, it was said the working classes contributed one-half. Why, if the sum of £30,000,000 was laid out in the purchase of freeholds, a million might be purchased annually, and, in the course of six years, there would be universal suffrage in the country. In America there were circumstances which prevented great depression in wages, for the labouring man there, when manufacturers were low, could have resort to agriculture. Now he (Mr. P.) would like to see teetotalism progressing, not only among working men, but amongst other industrial classes, such as authors, poets, and artists. Since the time of George Morland, any man who could daub upon canvass thought that he had equal genius if he could drink as much gin as that celebrated painter; and the poet Burns had been pointed at as one who resorted to the exciting cup to fire his fancy and inspire his muse; but he (the speaker) contended that both would have been better men had they been thoroughly sober men, and that no true genius could attain its just development without temperance (hear). Having spoken of the additional attractions of plate-glass and music to which dram-sellers were now-a-days compelled to resort in order to captivate their votaries, and which he took as a very hopeful sign, inasmuch as it showed that other inducements besides drink were becoming necessary, he urged the manliness of at once and for ever renouncing the use of that which had been proved to be so pernicious to health and happiness. Having become teetotals themselves, let them seek to convert the majorities which now opposed the march of temperance into minorities, and thus, as pioneers, let them prepare the way for the reign of righteousness, truth, and peace (cheers).

GEORGE CRUIKSHANK, Esq., who was most cordially greeted, said the subject which had been given to him to speak upon was the public press, and he felt it was so important a topic that he could have desired the task to have fallen into more competent hands. The only reason why he had undertaken it was, because from early life he had been associated with literary men, many of whom had been connected with the press, and of all of whom he was able to speak well (hear). He had always found them exceedingly liberal and kind in their conduct towards all who came within their reach, and he had experienced it. On a late occasion at a meeting held in Drury-lane Theatre, some of the speakers alluded to the triumphs of the temperance cause, and he (Mr. Cruikshank, identified himself with it, for he was proud to stand in such a connection; but they also alluded to the commencement of the great work, and described the manner in which its advocates were formerly treated, when something heavier than words was used against them—viz., brick-bats. They also referred to the pleasing change which had come over public opinion, and pointed to their then position as a great triumph. They, moreover, pointed to the number of gentlemen of the press present, and they called that a triumph, and no doubt it was. He joined the teetotalers in celebrating their triumphs, but he thought they should be cautious not to boast too much, for in his experience bragging had always led to failure. Let them therefore celebrate their triumphs with meekness and thankfulness; at the same time, not forgetting that they were triumphs. He had now to call their attention to another triumph, and that was with respect to the statements made in the public prints. He was sure that they owed to the Press their best thanks for the very excellent reports they had given of that meeting; and he was satisfied that he should have the voice of the present audience with him if he were to propose a vote of thanks for that service (hear, hear). But he was sorry to say there was one exception—one great exception—and that was the Times newspaper (hear). What he was about to say would be uttered with every possible respect to the parties, because he did not forget that some of themselves had been moderate, and some perhaps immoderate, drinkers, and they must not be angry with those who had not yet come round to their way of thinking (hear). But the Times seemed to have gone out of the way, and to have been actuated by some spiteful feeling, as a few extracts from the leading article of that journal on the late temperance meeting in Drury-lane Theatre would show. Mr. Cruikshank proceeded to read and commenting upon the article in question from the Times of the 30th October, which was perhaps as puerile an effusion as ever appeared in the pages of the "leading journal." He then gave an instance or two of the evil effects of intemperance in parties once connected with that paper, and also in the case of a clergyman, a friend of the speaker's; concluding by congratulating the audience on the prosperous position of their great cause (cheers).

The CHAIRMAN said he thought they had nothing to fear from the article referred to. Indeed, it was a powerful argument in support of their cause, when the mighty Times made so weak an attack upon it (hear, hear).

The Rev. Dr. BURNS, after alluding to the comparative smallness of attendance, through the public misunderstanding as to the terms of admission, said he was happy to inform their Manchester friend that the state of temperance in the metropolis was a very healthy one. There were between fifty and one hundred meetings held every week in London, and he believed that a large aggregate meeting in that hall once a month could be well sustained. With respect to the leader in the Times, he considered that it had done the cause of teetotalism good service, for in the first place it had published to the world the names of persons as connected with the movement, which were of no mean standing, and then, secondly, it had given currency to certain statements which it would not be easy to gainsay (hear). During his teetotal career he had seen great changes in connexion with the press; at one time an article on the subject could hardly find a place in any respectable periodical, but now they were ably supported in some of the best journals of the country, and when the "leading" paper could publish no more forcible objection to their plan than the one referred to, he thought they ought to be well satisfied of the truthfulness and sterling value of the principle they avowed (hear and cheers). In attempting to justify the zeal and earnestness with which this great cause was being carried forward, the learned doctor said, it need only be borne in mind that intemperance was one of the deadliest trees. Intemperance was remotely or intimately connected with all the evils which distract society, curse our species, and dishonour our God; it fostered ignorance, degraded humanity, and robbed man of all the blessings which were provided for him in the Gospel (hear, hear). It was the great stream which fed our prisons with felons, our asylums with lunatics, our hospitals with patients (hear). Do away with drink, and the great proportion of the prison houses of England would be "to let;" Hanwell would hold all the maniacs of the kingdom, and our hospitals would not be over-crowded, as at present (hear). While the legislature were seeking to improve prison discipline, and were anxiously asking, "What shall we do with our criminal population?" the Temperance Society was quietly endeavouring to solve the question by cutting off the supply altogether, convinced that if the population of England was ever to be a moral community, they must become a sober people (cheers). In carrying out their enterprise, two things were requisite, as indeed they were in every good cause; first, to entertain a clear and just conception of it; and, secondly, to hold fast the object in a good spirit (hear, hear). That they had the truth with them in this matter was certain, and they could support it on reason, philosophy, morality, patriotism, and religion; and if, in an earnest, enlightened, prayerful spirit, they prosecuted their work, public opinion would one day go completely with them; and it was not at all improbable that, before long, the editor of the Times (for it was well known that even the Times sometimes changed its views) would head an article something in this style—"A great Fact! Teetotalism the grand panacea for a world's drunkenness." (cheers.)

Mr. T. A. SMITH said he rejoiced that light was spreading. Thirty years ago few persons knew anything about alcohol; but the teetotalers had taken that deadly poison into the laboratory, had subjected it to tests, and shown to the public what were the relations which its constituent elements bore to those of the human body. The foundation of all natural philosophy was experience—experience founded upon experiment. He denied the allegation of the Times, that "the individual experience (of teetotalers) is invariably met with some opposing experience," and he would defy any one to prove it. For himself, he had tried teetotalism under all circumstances, and he was certainly convinced that a man is better without than with stimulating drinks. Let them look at the effects of drunkenness in the poverty, wretchedness, squalor, and crime, which, alas! so extensively prevailed, and contrast all that misery with the comfort and happiness which entire abstinence promoted, and then decide which of the two was most desirable.

The SECRETARY having announced several subscriptions, The CHAIRMAN closed the proceedings with some appropriate observations. There was, he said, one point upon which they were all agreed, viz., that intemperance was producing a vast amount of evil. He referred to testimony which he had received on the subject of the increase of intemperance in the town of Preston with the improved rate of wages, to show that through this unhappy vice prosperity was sometimes made a curse to the working classes, instead of a blessing. He then dwelt on the obstacles which the drinking customs of the country placed in the way of all benevolent enterprises. He had recently visited the extensive industrial schools of Liverpool, containing 1,100 pauper children, and he found upon inquiry that a large proportion of them were driven there by the intemperance of their parents; and that out of thirty-three lately introduced, only three could read their letters. In his own city, Gloucester, they had a benevolent society set on foot to investigate the evils which surrounded them. The income of that society was only £200 a year, while at the same time the expenditure of the locality in intoxicating drinks, was £40,000; and there was as much money spent there in that way on one fair-day as would support the whole of the charities in that city. One thing, he said, had been abundantly demonstrated—namely, that by means of total abstinence from strong drink a great number of individuals and families had been essentially benefited, in their bodies, their characters, and their circumstances. Could the advocates for the use of strong drink say the same of their system? (hear and cheers.) What good had the use of strong drink ever done to individuals or to families? (cheers repeated.) He concluded by urging each individual in his sphere to extend a knowledge of the blessings and urge the practice of entire abstinence as promotive not only of the highest amount of physical enjoyment, but of intellectual, moral, and spiritual well-being. To the religious world he felt they must specially appeal, and call upon Christians to practise that self-denying and benevolent spirit which they professed to cherish, by giving up any paltry indulgence of appetite to insure in their own persons, and by their own influence, so real and permanent a blessing.

J. D. BASSETT, Esq., of Leighton Buzzard, moved a resolution of thanks to the chairman. Their friend Bowly, by the time he reached his home, would have travelled more than 300 miles for the purpose of attending that meeting; and he believed that there were no two men to whose zealous and unremitting exertions the temperance cause was more deeply indebted than to the chairman and John Cassell (hear and cheers).

W. SIMS, Esq., seconded the resolution, which was carried with much cheering.

HAWKSTONE-HALL, WATERLOO-ROAD.

On December 3, Mr. T. A. Smith delivered a lecture on Spontaneous Human Combustion. He began by describing various theories respecting combustion, and defined it, as chemical action, accompanied with the evolution of light and heat. He then exhibited a variety of experiments to illustrate the distinction sometimes made of supporters, and non-supporters of combustion, and showed that under ordinary circumstances, oxygen was concerned in every case of combustion. He explained the various methods by which fire might be obtained, by collecting the rays of the sun with a convex or plano-convex lens, by friction, percussion, electricity, galvanism, magnetism, and chemical action. Having thus explained the nature and production of combustion, he read a variety of cases of human combustion from Dr. Trotter's "Essay on Drunkenness," and other works; and as in all these cases, the victims had been in the habit of drinking large quantities of intoxicating liquors, he said it might serve to throw some light on these rare phenomena, if the nature of these liquors could be ascertained. He then, by several experiments, proved that all these liquors contained hydrate of oxide of ethyle, composed of highly inflammable materials, and which appeared to have rendered the bodies of these victims preternaturally combustible. In conclusion, he remarked, that whilst such instances of the fatal effects of intoxicating drinks were extremely rare, there were plenty of cases of every-day occurrence, showing the dreadful nature of these liquors—cases where they had destroyed property, health, domestic happiness, life, and even hope. He exhorted them to forsake these deadly drinks; to devote their resources and their talents to nobler objects; to seek the elevation of themselves and families, and to assist the Teetotalers in their efforts to promote the happiness of man, and the glory of God.

WESTMINSTER BAND OF HOPE.

The ninth monthly meeting of this interesting association of juvenile Teetotalers (in connection with the Wesleyan Teetotal Union) was held on Tuesday, the 10th of December, in the Temperance Hall, Prince's-place, Westminster. About one hundred adult and juvenile friends of the association sat down to a plentiful and cheerful repast, and in the evening a public meeting was held. The chair was occupied by W. SIMS, Esq., who added much to the pleasure of the evening by his kind and paternal observations. A number of Temperance melodies were sung by the youthful members, and many interesting recitations and addresses were also given by them, to the great satisfaction of all present. Mr. W. Tritton delivered a short address to the children, in which he impressed upon the minds of his young hearers the leading doctrines of Teetotalism. The special object of this association is to interest in the Temperance cause the children of the members of the Wesleyan Union, and those connected with the different Sunday-schools of the neighbourhood; and, during the last nine months, the secretary, Mr. Gardner, has received the pledges of about two hundred children.

HIGHGATE.

The second monthly meeting for the advocates of temperance, was held on Monday, December 9, in the Rev. G. R. Birch's room, adjoining the Literary and Scientific Institution in this place. B. Rotch, Esq., B.C.L., presided, and the Revs. H. Townley, G. R. Birch, and S. Hatch, J. Puget, Esq., and Mr. T. B. Smithies, took part in the proceedings. The room was crowded, and the many forcible statements made by the speakers, while they portrayed the evils arising from the "drinking usages of society," could not fail to have convinced the audience of the advantages arising from total abstinence. At the close, a temperance melody was sung, and several signatures were obtained.

READING, BERKS.

A Temperance Conference was held in this town, on December 21, which was attended by delegates from the neighbouring towns. The Rev. Doxsey, from London, and the Primitive Methodist ministers of the town, were among the number. In the evening, a public meeting was held, the Rev. E. Bishop in the chair. Addresses were delivered by Messrs. Doxsey, Taylor, Mules, Buckland, Kidgell, Rickman, &c. Votes of thanks were given to the Mayor for the use of the hall, to Mr. Doxsey, for endeavouring to promote an agency, and to the Reading friends for so kindly entertaining the delegates. Last month a lecture was delivered here by Dr. Matcham, on the Physiological Bearings of the Temperance Question. Many hundreds of publications have been circulated during the year, including the TEETOTAL TIMES, "The Working Man's Friend," "John Cassell's Library," and several Temperance periodicals and tracts.

IPSWICH.

An interesting demonstration in favour of the principles of the above society was given on the occasion of their recent annual festival. So large a number assembled to do honour to those principles (notwithstanding the excessively unfavourable state of the weather) that the Temperance-hall was not capacious enough to accommodate the whole number at one time, and it became necessary to have a second "tea making" after the first had been supplied. This state of things may be regarded as, in a great measure, the result of the able advocacy combined with the gentlemanly bearing of Mr. Simeon Smithard who has been successfully labouring for the last seven months as temperance town missionary; and who has done much to rescue the society from the obloquy and reproach which had undeservedly been cast upon it, in consequence of its singularly unfortunate connection with men who (as it is but too well known) ultimately proved worthless. Mr. R. Johnson being called to the chair, the Secretary read the report, from which we make the following extracts:—

"Open air meetings have been held weekly during the summer months upon the Common Quay, near the Pottery, at the entrance of the Norwich-road, and in the neighbourhood of this Hall. The meetings have been large, consisting of the middle and labouring classes, many of whom, but for these meetings in the open air, most likely would not have heard lectures upon teetotalism; some of whom were publicans, who, with the assistance of a mob, came to annoy and interrupt the meetings, but who, through the firm but forbearing conduct of the friends of temperance, at last withdrew their opposition, and they are happy to say that some of those who at first came to oppose, at last embraced the principles, and are now living in the enjoyment of the sweets of total abstinence. Nor have the indoor meetings been less distinguished for usefulness than those in the open air. This is apparent from the increasing attendance upon them, and the very great interest displayed in them. And it is fully evident that what has given an additional charm to these meetings has been the singing of temperance melodies.

"The next order of means employed by your missionary has been house to house visitation. This has been sometimes of a general character, embracing whole districts, calling upon the inhabitants promiscuously, speaking to them on the subject of temperance, and leaving with them a temperance tract. Sometimes they are of a more special kind, visiting such as have signed the Pledge.

"The result of these varied efforts has been a large addition to the temperance ranks; above 500 fresh signatures have been taken to the Temperance Pledge since the 1st of May, 300 of which are juveniles.

"The visit of our friend James Teare, and his constant zeal and undaunted courage as a teetotal advocate, has been attended with extraordinary success."

Interesting addresses were then delivered by W. D. Sims, Esq., Rev. J. Gay, and Mr. Smithard, who on this occasion took leave of the society, being about to remove to Devonport, to labour in the same cause. Mr. Frederick Atkin, from Gainsborough, the successor of Mr. Smithard, delivered a powerful address, in which he set forth the evils of the drinking usages of society, illustrated with facts and anecdotes. The business of the evening was interspersed with the recitation and singing of temperance melodies, and about ten o'clock the company separated, being highly delighted with the proceedings.

BIRKENSRAW, NEAR LEEDS.

The sixth annual festival of the temperance society of this place was celebrated last month. About 200 persons took tea, after which a public meeting was held, when addresses were delivered by Mrs. Jackson, Messrs. Howgate, Thornhill, Walmsley, &c. The society was formed about six years ago; and, though it was predicted that it would not last six months, it has become gradually larger and stronger. We have had several lectures from Mr. Lomax, of Manchester, and other advocates of talent, by which much good has been effected. We intend to persevere in the good work through the ensuing winter. W. H.

TODMORDEN.

The members of the Todmorden Temperance Mutual Improvement Society, held their first annual festival on the 7th ult. After tea, a meeting was held, presided over by Mr. James Whittaker. Several essays were read, and addresses delivered; interspersed with a variety of recitations. The meeting was interesting, and proved that the members had made rapid progress during the past year. They have a small library, and are using every means to improve themselves.

SELBY.

The Teetotalers of this place resolved upon holding monthly meetings during the winter months, to be addressed chiefly by working men. These meetings have been convened by means of attractive placards; they consisted chiefly of working men, who were addressed by several of their fellow-workmen, on the dreadful results of intemperance, and the blessings following total abstinence. A strong sensation has thus been produced through the town, and drunkards have been reclaimed and homes made happy. A specimen of the contents of the placards referred to is subjoined:—

"To the Working Men of Selby. It is an ALARMING

Fact that intemperance is the crying sin of the nation; it fills our goals with prisoners, our workhouses with paupers, and our asylums with lunatics, and is the cause of many an

ACCIDENT

Which, but for intemperance, would not have occurred.

FOUR

of your fellow-workmen have nobly volunteered, and will attend, on TUESDAY EVENING, in the VICTORIA ROOM, at Eight o'Clock precisely, to advocate the cause of Total Abstinence from all Intoxicating Drinks as the only effectual remedy for this great evil. These men for many years have proved by their

that Teetotalism has been a blessing to them, and that they have not but gained, by the adoption of Total Abstinence Principles."

LOST,

SHEFFIELD.

A meeting of the Friends of Temperance was held in the Town-hall, on Monday evening, Nov. 11, to take into consideration the practicability of building a Temperance-hall. Mr. Dalton occupied the chair. Several speakers expressed their belief that the Temperance cause in Sheffield had suffered grievously for want of a suitable place in which to hold their public meetings; and a resolution was passed that they should endeavour to raise £1,000, in shares of £1 each to be applied in the erection of a new Temperance-hall. The intended site is in the vicinity of the Roman Catholic chapel now in course of erection in Queen-street. The present plan describes the intended lecture-hall to be 47 feet long by 27 feet wide. Underneath the lecture-room will be four shops. Some of the promoters, however, are sanguine enough to believe that they will be enabled to raise more than the £1,000 and are wishful to build a hall of larger dimensions, capable of holding 1,000 or 1,200 people.

SETTLE, YORKSHIRE.

A report recently issued by the Settle Temperance Society states that there are about eighty confirmed drunkards and about 170 teetotalers in this place. They also state that there has been a great decrease of drunkenness on the Sabbath-day since the law respecting the closing of public-houses during the forenoon of that day came into operation; they recommend efforts to be made for its extension to the whole day, as there is more drunkenness (particularly among the working classes) on the Saturday night and Sunday than during the rest of the week.

HALIFAX.

On Saturday, Nov. 9, a number of teetotalers and their friends sat down to an excellent tea in the school-room at Patmos. A public meeting was held in the same place, when Mr. Ambrose Brook was called to the chair. Several addresses were given, melodies sung, and recitations gone through.

SCOTLAND.

SCOTTISH ASSOCIATION FOR SUPPRESSING DRUNKENNESS.—This association has recently circulated a letter among the clergy of Scotland, recapitulating the objects of its formation, and entreating co-operation in the work of reforming Scotland "from its present degraded position as the most drunken country in Europe." The committee suggest to every clergyman in Scotland the propriety of preaching a sermon against drunkenness on the last Sunday of the present year, at which a collection shall be made in aid of their funds, believing that Scotland has now the opportunity presented to her, through this association, of wiping off the "national disgrace." Upwards of 700 clergymen in every quarter of the country, it is added, have been already enrolled as office-bearers of the association.

ALLOA.

The Rev. M. McDonnell, of Alloa, delivered a lecture on Sunday evening November 10, in the Rev. Mr. Renton's church, on the Abstinence Movement, and in the course of an able and touching address demonstrated the crying evils of intemperance, and the bounden duty of all to join in doing what in them lay to remove the plague-spot of drunkenness from our beloved country; tracing from documentary evidence the alarming increase of crime referable to this national sin, and presenting many harrowing scenes of physical, mental, and moral degradation induced by this insidious foe. The appeal to others to join in the movement was characterized by earnestness and Christian charity. The church was crowded, and the audience listened most attentively.

IRELAND.

The second monthly meeting of the teetotalers established under the presidency of the Rev. James Roche, P.P., recently took place in the Temperance-hall, in Selskar. The chair was taken by Sir Francis Lehunte, who in very eloquent terms expressed the happiness he felt at once more meeting the teetotalers of Wexford, comprising the different distinct societies all united as one body in those admirable monthly reunions now established in this hall, under the auspicious presidency of their active and highly-respected parish priest, the Rev. Mr. Roche, whose acceptance of the office of president must confer great benefit and stability on their newly-established, or rather revived society (cheers). He felt every confidence that this revival of the temperance cause would be a healthy and lasting revival, and that we would show the example of casting off the blot of drunkenness from the national character, and endeavour to regain the glorious character for virtuous self-denial which this country had attained by the teachings of the immortal Father Mathew (great cheering). Irishmen (observed the worthy chairman) are now in the constant habit of frequenting every part of the world; if they go abroad as drunkards, they will tarnish the national character, and inflict an injury and a curse wherever they go; but, if on the contrary, they show themselves as sober, respectable characters, they will prove an honour to their country, and help to raise her in the estimation of strangers, while their good example will confer a benefit on society in the places they may visit (loud applause). I have brought with me (continued Sir Francis) a late number of the Illustrated London News, which contains the report of a very important meeting held in favour of temperance at the Theatre Royal, Drury-lane, which was presided over by Mr. Heyworth, M.P., and at which meeting a speech was delivered by an Indian Prince from North America, replete with good sense and good feeling, explaining the degradation and ruin inflicted on the poor Indians by the introduction of ardent spirits, or as they termed it "fire-water" amongst them, by white men calling themselves Christians, for their own base and sordid purposes, which ruined the moral habits of an innocent and fine people, and caused the destruction of entire nations, by the immoderate use of those poisonous stimulants. Sir F. Lehunte here read the speech of the Indian prince to which he had alluded, and continued to say that he was delighted to find that the exertions of the advocates of Temperance were being successful to a great extent, as may be instanced by the new regulations of the navy, in which the admiralty had established a very salutary change by now only allowing the use of spirits once a day at dinner, and allowing none at all to the young lads. Some of the oldest advocates of Temperance were admirals in the navy, who saw by experience the evil effects caused by intemperance amongst the seamen (cheers).

Dr. BOXWELL said: The first time I came here I told you an untruth, by saying that I found a glass of wine necessary at times when I was hard worked, which I have since found to be a mistake, and that I am not only as well but better without it at all times. When I made that statement I was a temperance man—I am now a teetotaler (great cheering); and I hope all here will follow my example, I cannot agree that stimulants are necessary: they are not so. I advise every one who takes the pledge to renew it every morning on his knees before his Creator, and at night return God thanks for having given him grace to keep it during that day.

Rev. W. MORAN said: I have long been a practical teetotaler, and I have felt sickened to see so little countenance given to the movement by influential persons; but as such persons are now beginning to attend, I hope to see a healthy revival (cheers). There is nothing so patriotic as teetotalism, as it serves to raise the character of our country, makes us more capable of using properly our civil and political rights, and causes numerous individual and social benefits.

Mr. D. DEVITT said: I am amongst the oldest teetotalers in Wexford. They feel it no disgrace, but an honour, to have to say that they kept the pledge, and I am proud to say that I have done so too. Mr. Devitt continued for some time, in very forcible language, and with considerable talent and humour, to enforce the necessity of teetotalism, and justly remarked, that as a man of the highest position in society will lower his character by being seen drunk in the streets, surely a poor man is much worse off by being seen in a state of drunkenness, as no one wishes to take a drunkard into his employment. He next stated that he had determined to try if he could do without the use of tobacco, although he had been now using it for fifty years: that in pursuance of that resolution he had not used a pipe for the last week.

Rev. WILLIAM MORAN: I am delighted to hear the speech of Mr. Devitt. With regard to the use of tobacco, it is my opinion that in nine cases out of ten it leads to drunkenness, that it brings people into idle and dangerous company; that it is altogether a useless and pernicious practice; and that the wasting of money on tobacco and whiskey, when so many are starving, is an absolute crime. Drunkenness led to every crime. One judge said, "that but for drunkenness he would have nothing to do;" and another remarked, "That all crime could be traced directly or indirectly to drunkenness." He had read of a Dissenting clergyman, who, in preaching against intoxication, advocated the moderate use of drinking. After he had done, a woman came to him, quite drunk, and said, "Your reverence and myself are perfectly agreed as to the moderate use of drink." He had also read somewhere the following suggestions for obtaining happiness:—"If you want to be happy for a day, get yourself shaved—if for a month buy a horse—if for a year get married; but if you wish to be happy all your life become a teetotaler."

Dr. BOXWELL: Gentlemen, as to tobacco, it is as poisonous as whiskey, only it is not maddening.

The CHAIRMAN: I have now a word to say to non-teetotalers; I strongly recommend them to take the pledge from your parish priest, or Father Moran, or from some other clergyman, and to those who have been so unfortunate as to break their pledge, I would say, renew it immediately; it is certainly a disgraceful thing to have broken a pledge, but it is more so to continue in such an evil course. Ireland was highly honoured by the high position she gained for herself by the almost universal practice of temperance and self-denial, and I hope you will show a good example by not only preserving your pledge as strict teetotalers, but by also combining all other virtues, and thereby shewing the full value of Teetotalism.]

VOICES FROM PRISONS AND PENITENTIARIES; respectfully addressed to the Patrons and Teachers of Sabbath Schools. London: John Cassell, 335, Strand.

This tract is well worthy of special attention, both from the importance of the subject upon which it treats, and from the manner in which the work has been executed. For some years past many of the Temperance Reformers have been urging the necessity of special effort in relation to the young, and many startling facts have been published from time to time in relation to Sabbath-school teachers and Sabbath-school children. The last place to which one would think of resorting to gather evidence of the temporal destinies of the children educated in Sabbath-schools is the Penitentiary, or the prison; and yet the pamphlet before us shows, by the most indisputable facts, that unless we go to these abodes of crime and misery, we shall form but a very poor idea of the many evil influences at work in society, robbing the school of its pupils, or destroying the fruit when it is ripening and ready for the Church.

This tract contains a mass of valuable testimony, collected with great diligence and care from the most trustworthy sources. It follows up the work which was so well begun by the indefatigable Mr. Smithies, the results of whose labours are given at length. A copy ought to be placed in the hands of every Sabbath-school teacher throughout the kingdom, as a careful perusal cannot fail to convince minds at all open to conviction that the drinking customs of society constitute the most serious impediments to the spread of education and religion.

Every paragraph of this tract contains matter on which the Sabbath-school teacher will ponder with thoughtfulness and sorrow. We can only urge the desirableness of giving it an extensive distribution. We know of no tract on the subject of temperance more worthy of attention.

INTEMPERANCE OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.—There are those who steep sermons in drink; they drink away convictions, and like the wounded deer, run to drink. The tavern bell, I fear, does more hurt than the church bell does good.—Watson, 1662.

TRACTS TO DRUNKARDS.—"You often gave me some tracts and advice when I was so tipsy that I could scarcely get in and out of my cart. I was miserable when I was sober. I am now dying, and have no hope." He found peace with God, and died in hope of heaven.—Wes. Tract Reporter, September, 1850.

SPEAK KINDLY TO DRUNKARDS.—"A friend was urging an intoxicated man to go home, but he resisted, and swore that he would not. 'My friend,' said a minister, who was passing, tapping him on the shoulder, 'it is a serious thing to be damned.' 'You are right, sir,' said a drunkard. He went home, and sought and found mercy, and joined the Church of Christ."—Wes. Tract Reporter, September, 1850.

MODERATE DRINKING.—Dr. Mussey says:—"We have no evidence that alcohol, in any form, or taken under any circumstances, or in any combination, is capable of being digested or converted into nourishment. There cannot, I think, be left a reasonable doubt that as much mischief to health results from the use of any kind of fermented liquors, as from distilled spirits, equally diluted with water. If I must drink any quantity of alcohol, in a specified time, I should think it best to take it in distilled spirits, rather than in cider, wine, or beer."—Report for 1838 of the Amer. Temp. Union.

A WORD FOR MYSELF—SIXTEEN YEARS A TEETOTALER.

[BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.]

A NEW YEAR is generally a time of reflection. How long have we lived? What have we been doing? What is the manner of our life and the state of our health? How long are we likely to live? Are we prepared for another world? These are questions which all thoughtful people ought to ask, especially when the various revolutions of time are reminding us that our days are hastening to a close. These thoughts have of late been rather forced upon the attention of the writer, by the fact of so many of his friends and neighbours having fallen around him just as 1850 closed and 1851 commenced; and, among other things, he was induced to review his own Teetotal life, and some things occurred to his mind which he thought would not be unprofitable if sent to the press.

About SIXTEEN YEARS ago I became a Teetotaler. As I have often said, previous to that period, the doctors had given it as their opinion that my nerves were so shattered, that nothing but giving up reading, thinking, and the ministry altogether, would afford any hope of recovery. My nervousness was such that I enjoyed nothing. I held tightly by both rails of the stairs lest I should fall from top to bottom; I expected every hour to drop down dead, and indeed suffered a living martyrdom. With a life, then, not worth six months' purchase, I commenced Teetotaler, and "having obtained help of GOD," have continued until this day, and have enjoyed as large an amount of bodily and mental health as any person in the kingdom. I am quite willing to compare notes with any individual in the world as to my exemption from pain and ailments of any kind during the sixteen years of my Teetotal history. I am also ready to examine with them my labours. I have studied for more hours every day on an average than I ought, and have to some extent put my health in jeopardy; I have worked hard with my hands, feet, and tongue, and have had, perhaps, more than a common share of the cares and anxieties of life; and yet I have never been ill, have required no medicine, and for the last six years and a-half have taken none at all. I may add that my spirits have been cheerful, and my labours and pursuits, which before were so perfectly irksome, have afforded me the highest pleasure.

Now this is a tolerable testimony, from a man whom the doctors had consigned to mental inactivity and a life of disease. And I deem it necessary to make it here, because I am no believer in the earthly immortality of Teetotalers. I do not think that we are entirely free from disease, or, at any rate, from the decay of nature to which all are doomed. I have, it is true, a firm conviction that total abstinence is the best medicine, that Teetotalers are more likely to escape disease than other persons, and that they have a greater prospect of a good old age. But still the life of every one must end, and, with many of us, may end soon, and it is best to be ready, that we may not be taken by surprise.

I have, during this period, seen a large number of my friends, neighbours, and acquaintances carried to the grave. Many of them appeared much stronger and far more likely to live than myself. Ministers, deacons, and tradesmen; the young, the strong, the healthy; men and women beloved, pillars of their families, of the Church, of their country and the world, have become low-spirited, nervous, dispeptic, paralytic, deranged, insane, or have died suddenly of apoplexy. If chemistry and physiology be right, the drink of these valuable persons was chiefly to blame. They had not only a host of exciting cares, but they would take stimulants, and thus overworked a nervous system which already was too much burdened with mental anxiety. The string was drawn too tight, the vibration was perpetual, the atmosphere was unpropitious, and at last the catgut snapped and the music of the instrument was gone. Others again of an inflammatory temperament would, in spite of every admonition, drink the living fire, and thus added fuel to the flame, and sent themselves prematurely to the bar of their Judge, literally rending themselves from their families, the Church, and their country, before half their work was done. We have lately seen the account of the death of one of England's most hopeful and valued sons. A man of first-rate talent; a minister of commanding eloquence; a labourer in almost every good work; a pillar in the Church; and an individual of whom any age and nation might be justly proud. His chief, perhaps, almost his only defect was, that he stoutly opposed the Temperance Reformation. He treated it with scorn, and sometimes launched at it the shafts of his ridicule. We have heard him do this on the platform. We were once at a public meeting of ministers, when a proposition in favour of total abstinence was made. Most present accepted the resolution with deference, or in silence, except two individuals. One of them, who held up a tremulous hand against it, was so nervous that he could not read a resolution which he afterwards had to propose. Stimulants had shaken his whole frame, and yet he took these poisons as his daily medicine, and was indignant and wrathful that any one should dare to advise him to abandon these banes. The other was our friend; and when the memorial from the Temperance people was introduced he exclaimed, "Here are these Teetotalers bothering us again!" and held up his hand against them. As I sat next to him I heard these words with my own ears, and saw the deed with my own eyes: and must say that I felt deepy pained, not for myself or our cause, but for the esteemed individual who was thus opposing a principle which would have prolonged his own days and usefulness. I knew that from his great mental labours he was living too fast, and that to him stimulants were death; and then and there I predicted what must follow unless he joined our ranks: and my friend is now buried, before reaching his sixtieth year! Just when his intellect was mature, when his character gave him an influence that monarchs might envy, and his manly eloquence fitted him for the noblest enterprises, he became nervous, and after lingering awhile left our sphere for the bar of GOD!

It is usual to talk of imbecility, derangement, insanity, and madness, as mental diseases; but we are very sceptical on this point. The soul is a divine emanation—a spiritual essence, into which corporeal ailments can never enter. The fever is in the brain, and not in the soul. The inflammation of the mucous membrane of the stomach, so often brought on by stimulants, and leading to madness, is an affection of the digestive organs, and not of the immortal spirit; and what we call derangement arises from the fact that the mind has no longer its proper tools to work with, and through which to develop its powers. Our souls would feel but ill at ease in the body of a turtle, an eagle, a mastiff, or an elephant; and a diseased frame is perhaps quite as unsuitable for our spirits to employ in their various operations; and, therefore, he who drinks these liquors worse than brutalizes his nature. We dare say that the death of our friend will be placed among the inscrutable dispensations of Providence. We may, perhaps, see advertised a series of discourses and biographies from the lips of our more popular moderation ministers, in which profound lucubrations on the obscure abyss of JEHOVAH'S arrangements will be dwelt upon in strains of eloquent sentimentalism; but our firm conviction is, that these effusions are quite out of place. People, and especially ministers, shorten their days by stimulants, and then irreligiously charge their deaths on the sovereignty of the ETERNAL! The ALMIGHTY, forsooth, has arbitrarily cut short their days! They would have lived long had not heaven envied us such piety and usefulness, and, to baffle our efforts to advance the cause of truth and religion, wafted them to the skies! This may be all very fine, very rhetorical, very sympathetic and pious; but if the diet of the individual were described, and the knife of the anatomist used, the vision would vanish, and the fact would come out, that the greater part of our distinguished men and eminent Christians destroy themselves by drinks that injure the digestive organs and the brain; and yet, at their funerals their mourning friends take an extra allowance of these murderous beverages to keep up their spirits!

It may be thought that I have wandered very far in these remarks; but, having suffered a martyrdom from indigestion and nervous excitement, having been near insanity and self-destruction from the moderate use of stimulants, having been restored to a cheerful and happy existence of sixteen long years by cold water, and knowing that others stronger than myself have died by the hundred through their folly in using poisons, it would be criminal to truth, to science, to humanity, and religion, to remain silent on this momentous subject. I may say that since I have signed the pledge, "a thousand have fallen at my side, and ten thousand at my right hand," through moderate drinking; and not a few of these have been most valuable members of society and of the Church of God. Some, by adopting the measures that I have adopted, have been restored to usefulness, and are now filling important stations in the Church. They had tried the old stimulating systems; all the resources of medicines, travelling, and watering-places, had been resorted to, but all in vain: the doctors told them that their activity must end, and that they must take their glass of sherry at eleven, their dinner-pill at one, their half-tablespoonful of brandy in a little cold water after dinner and after supper, and patiently wait their exit to another sphere! But, providentially for them and for the Church, they had courage enough to give up the pipe, the cigar, and every stimulant, and now they have a new hope of life and usefulness; and I am thus confirmed in my belief that sixteen years of health, labour, and pleasure have resulted from the abandonment of stimulants. I hold life with a very loose hand: "we know not what a day may bring forth;" but I pen these lines to vindicate Teetotalism from the charge of being injurious to health. To me it has been better than all the medicines and physicians in the world. I have often thought if I had applied to some able medical man, and by following his advice had obtained these healthful benefits, my case would have been a high commendation of his skill; or if such results had followed from the use of any popular medicine, every newspaper would have told the tale, and hundreds would have been spent in advertising it as a commendation of the medicine; but as poor Teetotalism has done it all, the matter is unheeded.

I have one word to say for my family. Our doctors have always told me that my wife has naturally a weak constitution; and yet she is stronger than ever I knew her, and has not taken a dose of medicine for nearly seven years. I have also six children; and during the same period there has not been a particle of any kind of physis in our house. As a family we are as healthy and strong as other people. We do not utter these words boastingly, for we rejoice with trembling. While I write, the seeds of disease may be latent. Teetotalers do not live for ever; and therefore we speak gratefully rather than vauntingly. TEETOTALISM has done this in my household, and therefore I can highly recommend it to others. My doctor's bills were formerly very expensive, and, added to the items for a due proportion of beer, porter, wine, and spirits, for eight moderate drinkers, made a large demand on my income. £30 would not go very far in supplying us all with a little, and yet this sum has now sent a child to Germany to be educated, and nearly covered the expense, and perhaps made her fortune. How many drink all the resources of their families! I know numbers who have treble my income, and not one-third of my comforts. The drink overwhelms all; and in not a few cases the parents drop prematurely into the grave, and the children go to the Union.

We advise all our friends, and if we had a voice sufficient, we would entreat all the world, to abstain. It is a sin against nature, against GOD, against ourselves, against the Church, and the world, to use intoxicating liquors. No man can take tobacco, snuff, and alcoholic drinks, and live out all his days. This declaration is not mere assertion, but fully borne out by all the evidence of chemistry and physiology. Nine-tenths of the cases of indigestion, liver complaints, dropsy, paralysis, apoplexy, and insanity, arise from these destructive drinks. We have sometimes thought that demons must almost envy the alchymy and the devilom which can convert barley, wheat, grapes, and apples, into a poison which shortens life, multiplies disease, robs men of their reason, inflames their passions, and drowns myriads in perdition. A religious brewer or distiller must be a prodigy in the estimation of Lucifer; perhaps one of the greatest wonders in the universe; for he professes to transact business with heaven, and yet fits men by thousands for the bottomless pit. Like Christianity, Total Abstinence must prevail; and we entreat our readers not to be the last to join its standard and share its blessings.

A DRUNKARD'S DEATH.—The colonel of a regiment was informed that one of his sons had run his sword through his body. On making inquiry, he found that he had sold his sword for liquor, which he had drunk, and then committed the fearful act.

THE GREAT DESTROYER.

Medical Recollections.

On coming to take up my residence in Liverpool a few months ago, I was struck with the great number of gin-shops, and other places for the sale of intoxicating drinks. I know not whether there is a larger proportion of temples dedicated to Bacchus in this town (compared with the number of inhabitants) than in others, but very sure I am that in all towns the consumption of intoxicating liquors very far exceeds the necessity for them.

Having been in extensive medical practice for fifteen years, in a country district, enjoying an unenviable notoriety for the drinking habits of many of the inhabitants, I have necessarily had numerous opportunities of witnessing in how many instances bodily suffering and sickness, domestic misery and poverty, premature and violent death, are the natural fruits of evil courses, the direct or indirect consequences of the indulgence of an unbridled passion for intoxicating liquors.

One of the first exhibitions I witnessed in Liverpool was a public procession of the temperance societies of this town, and the greatly-extended train of temperance disciples, who had pledged themselves to drive the Great Destroyer from their hearths and homes, forming, nevertheless, but a small proportion, I trust, of the whole number of lovers of temperance in this large town, afforded a pleasing contrast to the vast number of tempting facilities to the indulgence in drink offered at every turn.

To encourage such in the course to which they have pledged themselves, and to warn the intemperate against the mischievous tendencies of their destructive habits, I give my professional experience.

The small town where I commenced my professional career was remarkable for the fertility and agricultural wealth of the surrounding country, and for the great number of its freeholds, and hence, from the large amount of votes which it polled, it was considered to have great influence in the return of the member of Parliament for the division of the county in which it lay. But, unfortunately for its freeholds, the town was at that time celebrated for its fine ale, with which it contributed to supply the London market, and, more especially, its own consumption.

The favourite tavern was an old house, of no very great pretensions, where many of the farmers and tradesmen of the town and neighbourhood met every evening to "waste their strength" and drain their pockets; and many a broad acre has been commuted into drink, and swallowed in that front parlour.

On looking back on the subsequent history of the frequenters of that house—what a lesson to the intemperate! what a warning to the drunkard! and, at the same time, what a moral stimulus to the sober to avoid a destructive habit which is the great curse of this country.

What havoc has the Great Destroyer, drunkenness, made in the lives, the health, the happiness, the domestic peace, the political power, the hereditary freeholds, of that great neighbourhood!

Some have since committed suicide, and more have attempted self-destruction; many have met with violent deaths, and more have been the subjects of premature mortality and insidious decay; of "want and incurable disease (fell pair!)."

"Awhile with joy the scene is crown'd,
Awhile the catch and toast go round,
And when the full carouse is o'er,
Death puffs the lights, and shuts the door."

On passing near the house in question one morning, I observed two gentlemen drive up to the door, and overheard one remark to the other that he must taste the celebrated ale of ———, "for that a man was famous in that town according to the quantity he could drink without taking the cup from his lips"—a reflection implying too true a satire.

Very soon after commencing practice I was called up one night to an accident which occurred at this house. A tradesman from a neighbouring town had called in the evening, and after drinking deeply of the landlord's cheer, retired to rest, or rather "To short (as usual) and disturbed repose."

For who can hope to enjoy "balmy sleep" who nightly charges the "pure current of his blood" with copious draughts of the "leperous distilment?" He

"Murders sleep—the innocent sleep."

The man had retired to bed on the third story, but getting up in the night, and supposing he was walking out into the garden, had precipitated himself through the window with his bare head on the stone pavement beneath, a height of twenty-one feet. Some may think this was enough to wake him from his drunken sleep. The fall, however, had produced concussion of the brain. There was extensive laceration of the scalp, but fortunately no serious fracture of the skull; perhaps drunkards have thicker heads, or less brains than other people!

He lay in a state of unconsciousness for forty-eight hours (sensation and voluntary motion being suspended by the shock to the brain), but ultimately recovered. It is a curious circumstance that, exactly seven years before, a man went to bed drunk, in that same chamber, and, in his sleep, precipitated himself from the same window. He, too, recovered. I trust these narrow escapes were warnings to them!

THE HAPPIER DAY.

A response to the "Appeal for the Perishing Inebriate," inserted in the last Number of the TEETOTAL TIMES.

We have heard the oaths, the cries, and groans,

That come from the drunken throng;

Have heard the self-made maniac's moans,

And the selfish drinker's song;

Have grieved at the vice, and mourn'd o'er its sway,

And wished and prayed for a happier day.

We have been to the vile inebriate's home—

Sad scene of sorrow and strife;

Seen his child unfed, a vagabond roam,

And wept with his woe-stricken wife.

We turned from these sights in sorrow away,

And sighed and hoped for a happier day.

All this have thousands before us done,

But sighs and wishes are vain;

We must do something more, or never will one

Be saved from this guilt and pain.

Oh what can we be, do, suffer, or say,

To hasten a sober and happier day?

If we urge these men to shun the drink

That has been the cause of their woe,

Will they deny themselves, do you think?

Can we an example show?

Oh, sure if we act in this simple way,

We may faster advance the happier day!

We will try the plan, and press it on those Who, as yet, do not abstain;

All the good we'll join, and none will oppose

A scheme so benign and plain.

We will wish and work, and labour and pray,

And hope for, and help on, THE HAPPIER DAY.

THE INTEMPERANCE OF MINISTERS.—The Rev. Mr. Jay, of Bath, says, that in one month not less than seven dissenting ministers came under his notice who were suspended through intoxicating liquors. Thus, alas! priest and prophet are erring through strong drink; and yet, we are repeatedly told, intemperance is confined to the working classes.

THE TEMPERANCE REFORMATION AND MORAL STATISTICS OF HUDDERSFIELD.

The friends of temperance in this town have been aroused to activity and "love for their neighbour," seeing that such an amount of vice and profligacy prevail around them. They believe that intemperance is the most fruitful source of poverty, crime, and disease; and that it is annually consigning more human beings to asylums, jails, and penal settlements, than any other prevailing sin;—nay more, that it is destroying the bright prospects of the Church of Christ, for more ministers and members are sacrificed to the Church from this most awful and damning sin than any other source. Thousands of souls are lost to the Church every year from intoxicating drinks—some have to be expelled, others are crippled in the Church, while thousands more are prevented from entering, or die a drunkard's death. The testimony of one of the Wesleyan ministers is very striking, in which he says, that "this sin (drunkenness) is destroying more souls than all the ministers of the Gospel are instrumental in saving." The taking of intoxicating drinks produces fevers, drop-ics, consumptions, gout, palsies, and apoplexy, with many other diseases. Medical gentlemen of first-rate respectability in England have given it as their opinion, "That the most perfect health is compatible with total abstinence from all intoxicating beverages; and that persons accustomed to such drinks may with perfect safety discontinue it." The testimony of nearly 2,000 medical practitioners ought to have weight with the public. Like others in the profession, they live by the diseases of their fellow men; and yet disinterestedly testify against a practice which gives birth to four-fifths of the diseases. The Word of God declares "Drunkards shall not inherit the kingdom of God." With only few exceptions the persons guilty of this vice are chargeable with almost all the sins for which men shall be damned. "Every drunkard is a walking pestilence, a public nuisance, an enemy to God, and a factor for the devil." If this be the case, the duty of every minister of the Gospel and every professing Christian is plain. We profess to "love our neighbour as ourselves," and, doing so, we are individually bound to renounce and discountenance an evil which tends to ruin whole families; to destroy reason; to brutalize man, and injure him physically, morally, and mentally. We cannot escape from this duty, which devolves upon us in relation to this matter, as the following statistics will testify. They have been collected by Mr. J. C. Booth, who has been engaged by the committee of the Huddersfield Temperance Society as a town missionary. The committee hope that the sin of intemperance and its bitter fruits, thus made known, will induce many to weigh the subject thoughtfully and prayerfully, and be the means of convincing the religious community of the absolute necessity for a wider and more extensive temperance reformation in all our large towns. The population of Huddersfield is estimated at 30,000 persons.

In close connection with intemperance must be exhibited the frightful statistics of prostitution, which, ever since the days of Solomon, has figured as its intimate attendant and powerful ally in the work of human destruction.—(Proverbs, xxiii. 29—35.

In proof of the intimate relationship of prostitution and intemperance, here as elsewhere, the following extracts from the journal of the missionary are appended. They all strikingly evidence that intemperance is the most powerful supporter, as well as producer, of prostitution.

"In one of my visits to a house of ill fame, I spoke to three prostitutes, who had a large pot of ale on the table, of the importance of abstaining from intoxicating drinks, when one of them replied, 'We dare not be sober; if we were to abstain, we could not continue our present course. We know it is wrong, and we could not continue it without drink.'

"Some of the houses of ill-fame are kept in connection with public-houses, as an illustration of which I note the following:—I met with a man on his way from a public-house to a house of ill-fame, accompanied by a female, and all the arrangements respecting his visit were made with the publican.

"During 1849 there were 33 prostitutes taken up for drunkenness, and 25 for lewdness."

The very large proportion of crime resulting from the habitual use of intoxicating drinks is strikingly evident to all who take the trouble to become acquainted with the criminal records of our various prisons. To show that Huddersfield is affected in the same unhappy respect, the police report for 1849 is now exhibited.

From an examination of the above, it will be found that very nearly one-half are actually stated to be committed by publicans, drunkards, and prostitutes; and the missionary was informed by the police, that fully three-fourths of the whole—namely, 485, were the direct results of drinking and drinking customs. Does not this sufficiently bear out the assertion previously made with reference to the crimes engendered, and fearfully strengthened by intoxicating liquors?

That such is their uniform result, it may not be out of place to quote one or two passages from the charges of the judges of the land, with some statements of chaplains and others, placed in most eligible circumstances for obtaining correct information. Judge Wightman, in charging the grand jury at the Yorkshire Assizes, July 12th, 1849, said:—"A slight examination into the causes would show that intemperance is the chief source of nearly all of them. So long as the masses of the people could not enjoy a holiday without frequenting the public-house, and so long as they could not find any higher source of amusement than taking large quantities of intoxicating drinks—so long, he was afraid, there would be no abatement of crime. There was, therefore, great credit due to those societies who sought to benefit mankind by lessening the extent of intemperance." Judge Alderson, in passing sentence upon a prisoner at the Cumberland Spring Assizes, said:—"I wish you would agree to give up altogether this drinking, which produces all these mischiefs. You go to public-houses, and you stay as long as any person will give you anything to drink, taking away your understanding by putting the devil himself down your throat." The Rev. John Clay, Chaplain of the Preston House of Correction, says:—"The head and front of the direct causes of moral disorders is now, and it has been long, drunkenness. Men and women are led into further crime by the previous crime of their drunken parents. I have minutely examined the official returns by the gentlemen respectively superintending the Liverpool, Manchester, Salford, Preston, and Wigan police, and I find in the year 1846, more than 15,200 persons appeared before the magistrates charged with drunkenness, and 10,000 more accused of breach of the peace and assault offences, implying drunkenness in almost every case." The Chaplain to Salford prison, in his report for 1849, refers to the case of a female who had been committed 78 times for drunkenness, at a cost of £64 16s. In our own town of Huddersfield, a female has lately been liberated who has been committed 27 times for drunkenness.

* Since the above was written, by the vigilance and activity of the police, 7 of these have been closed.
 † The average life of prostitution is only 6 years, after commencing their wretched career; but, allowing it to be 7, then 11 of the above will die annually.

The injurious influences which intoxicating liquors exert upon commercial prosperity must not be entirely overlooked. The number of public-houses, beer-shops, wine and spirit vaults, and breweries, is 160. From calculations made as to the probable amount of profit requisite to keep in action these places, it is believed that at least £54,288 is annually squandered upon intoxicating drinks in connection with their public sale. This statement is believed by many to be below the annual expenditure. To this sum must be added a considerable amount for "home-made beer," so popular here as in most parts of the North of England, and very probably a still larger sum for wines and spirits imported direct for private consumption. For the purpose of exhibiting what may, at a very moderate computation, be estimated as the amount actually spent on these drinks, the following calculation is appended:—

Estimating the population of 30,000 to be comprised of 6,000 families, averaging 5 individuals each, of which 400 may be reckoned as teetotalers, the expenditure is computed to stand thus:—

3,600 families, at 1d. each individual per day, amounts to the annual sum of ...	£27,300	0	0
1,000 ditto at 2d. per day ...	15,166	13	4
1,000 ditto at 3d. per day ...	22,750	0	0

To this must be added a considerable sum for the cost of the pauperism and crime produced by the use of Intoxicating drinks. The annual amount of the Poor Rate is about £6,000; and if to the portion of this, directly traceable to Intemperance, be added the expense of criminal proceedings flowing from the same source, it must at once be evident that £70,000 is the lowest sum which can be named as the direct cost of these useless drinks. If to these items were added the cost of disease produced thereby, and the loss of time spent in their consumption, and which if better spent might be productive of improved mental and physical health, it is highly probable that nearly one hundred thousand pounds is thus annually wasted.

The sum paid for labour on every description of article in large consumption is an interesting inquiry to the labouring classes, and should be to them at least a prevailing motive in the appropriation of their means. It is now known that the amount paid for labour in the manufacture of Intoxicating Liquors is an exceedingly small per centage on the cost. Not more than sixpence in the pound is paid for wages in their production, whilst in the manufacture of useful articles a very large proportion of the cost price, has to be spent in labour. In the manufacture of Woollen Cloth, one of the staple trades of our own neighbourhood, it is calculated that no less than 12s. in the pound is paid for wages—and a further sum of 5s. to the tailor on making it up into useful articles of clothing.

The sum spent in Intoxicating Drinks will average £1 16s. 2d. per head per annum, for the whole population of Huddersfield, £30,000;—for prostitution, 6s. 8d. per head;—

for religious purposes, only 4s. 9d. per head. For every twenty shillings expended in the furtherance of the Gospel of Christ, there is £7 11s. 3d. expended in Intoxicating Drinks. Well may the Christians of Huddersfield be awakened from their lethargy! Clergymen, ministers of every denomination, and professors of religion, think on the statements; ponder well the statistics now given; they are not overdrawn, nor coloured to serve a purpose. Will you not (to use the words of a living author) abstain from luxury, and lend the aid of your example, to discountenance this monster crime, and monster misery? It is in the power, and is it not the duty, of the whole Christian church, to do much to stop this evil, which sends more persons to the mad-house,—the jail,—the hulks, and the gallows—more bodies to the grave, and more souls to perdition, than any other that can be mentioned. Can the Church of Jesus Christ be in earnest till it is prepared to make this sacrifice? We say, no.

A CALL TO EFFORT.

INCENDIARISM, crime, ignorance, and pauperism abound in Suffolk! What is the cause? One leading cause is strong drink plentifully used. Drinking is the order of the day, in nine cases out of ten. Abstinence is the exception. There are few teetotalers in these parts of Suffolk, and no meetings for months together. The spark is expiring. Bury St. Edmunds is a large and beautiful town, of, say, nearly 14,000 inhabitants, and by no means behind other towns in ancient charities and modern efforts of science and even religion; and there is a temperance cause also, and a beautiful room in which meetings used to be held, but so torpid are the friends, that after a residence of four months I have not heard of a meeting of any kind, nor do I hear of one in contemplation. Alas! as to temperance I have removed from the torrid to the frigid zone, and am in danger of being frozen to death, too, without the aid of alcohol to facilitate the action of the cold. In the meantime the malt-kilns, brew-houses, spirit-merchants, public-houses, beer-shops, and street-walkers, are plying their daily trade to furnish inmates for the spacious goal, the hospital, and the two work-houses; and they are successful also. Alas! since the last temperance meeting held in this town, how many sober people have become drunkards? How many drunkards have past to their account? How many wives and ragged children have had to mourn, and have loudly cursed the man's drunken habits? With what an enormous expense have drinking habits saddled this town? How desperate have been the efforts to sustain the cause of religion and benevolence, though money has flowed freely for drink? Who is faulty? Christians, philanthropists, abstainers, arise, and work, for the night of death rapidly approaches! Sin sweeps onward! Souls perish! God is angry! The judgment is coming! Abstainers help, lest shame cover our guilty faces.

A THIEVES' CONFERENCE.—At a meeting of thieves held in Edinburgh, the other day, the question was put—"How do you lay plans for each day?" One of them replied, "Oh, we'll tell you that. We often meet each other, and go away to some public-house, and sit and drink for a while." "You all drink pretty freely of course?" "Oh, yes, we can't do without drinking."—Scotch Press Newspaper, 9th Feb., 1850.

EFFECTS OF DRINK.—An old man, sixty-nine years of age, with silvery hair, says—"I have had both my legs broken through intemperance. I once rented a farm with twenty head of cattle and a team of horses. My wife died ten years ago, and then I got into low company, and began to drink. I have four children, who have all turned their backs upon me; but they would very gladly receive me again if I would but give up drink."

THE TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATIONS IN EXETER-HALL.

WE invite special attention to the report of the meeting held last month in EXETER-HALL, and also to the notice of the meeting to be held in that Hall on Monday next, the 3rd instant. At the last meeting the Hall was well filled, and admirable testimonies were furnished by a number of healthy-looking and intelligent-looking men, as to their ability to discharge all the duties of their trying occupations without any aid from unnatural stimulants. They testified, in addition, to numerous physical, intellectual, social, and moral benefits which had accrued to them from their adoption of the total abstinence principle. Their testimonies appeared to be received with unmingled satisfaction and delight by the large audience, and it was only left to us to regret the almost entire absence of two classes of persons who ought especially to have been present, and to whom respectful invitations were sent by the Committee, namely,—EMPLOYERS, whose interests are identical with those of the Employed, and whose welfare depends so very materially on the sobriety of their men, as connected with industry, ingenuity, and trustworthiness; and MINISTERS OF RELIGION, who ought to be foremost in every good work, and who should embrace every opportunity of making themselves acquainted with the condition and character of the working classes, who, if sober, would assist greatly in filling their places of worship, and in increasing the number of their church members.

The Meeting to be held on the 3rd instant is likely to prove one of deep interest. The veteran Temperance Reformer, JAMES SILK BUCKINGHAM Esq., has engaged to preside; and the Rev. THOMAS SPENCER, A.M.; the Rev. NEWMAN HALL, A.B. (from Hull); the Rev. WM. FORSTER (of Kentish-town); and the Rev. G. W. M'CREE, will address the audience on the subjects named in the advertisement on our first page. The Committee confidently expect a full meeting.

The Committee find it necessary to repeat their appeal for FUNDS. At present they are full ONE HUNDRED POUNDS short of the amount required for the fulfilment of their engagements; to say nothing of other important movements they are anxious to carry out. As these large meetings are known to operate powerfully upon various parts of the kingdom, as well as upon London, it is hoped that those who regard the Temperance Movement as intimately connected with the prosperity of the general community, will promptly render the Committee the assistance they require.

A subscription of FIVE GUINEAS has been received from Messrs. SPALDING and HODGE, Drury-lane, and ONE GUINEA from the Rev. W. W. ROBINSON, A.M., incumbent of Christchurch, Chelsea, which were omitted in the list recently published.

TO SUBSCRIBERS TO THE TEETOTAL TIMES.

Some of our subscribers have sent us ONE SHILLING as their subscription for the TEETOTAL TIMES for the ensuing twelve months. As the subscription for the Stamped Edition is 2s. per annum, they can, of course, receive it but for six months. We shall be obliged by their forwarding the remainder of the year's subscription.

CONFERENCE OF TEETOTALERS RESPECTING VISITS TO THE GREAT EXHIBITION.

It is intended to hold a CONFERENCE of the friends of Temperance from various parts of the kingdom, in the TOWN-HALL, LEICESTER, on Tuesday, February 11, at two o'clock in the afternoon. The meeting will be open to all known friends of the Temperance Movement. The following subjects are among the most prominent to be discussed:—

1. The practicability of appointing a certain week during the Great Exhibition for the visits of the Teetotalers from all parts of the kingdom.
2. The time and the best plans for giving public effect to the Demonstration.
3. The best arrangements for the conveyance of the Temperance visitors, and their accommodation in London.
4. The propriety of appointing a deputation to wait upon his Royal Highness Prince Albert, to ascertain whether his Royal Highness would be willing to receive an address from the Temperance visitors to the Exhibition, or preside over a public meeting to be convened in London at the time agreed upon.
5. The propriety of suggesting the formation of a more general union of Temperance Reformers; and if considered practicable, to appoint a provisional committee to prepare a draft of constitution.
6. The appointment of committees in London and the country, for the carrying out of the arrangements of the Demonstration.

Parties intending to be present, or who have any practical suggestion to offer, are requested to communicate before Monday, February 3, to the Secretaries of the Temperance Society, Office, 12, Belvoir-street, Leicester.

THE WORKING CLASSES AND THE MISAPPLICATION OF MEANS.

It is a matter of familiar knowledge that some of the best-paid workmen are the most intemperate; and in trades where wages are high the greatest amount of intemperance is found, and the largest number of drinking usages prevail. These usages are more imperative than law. No despot could inflict fouler wrong upon his subjects than these infatuated workmen inflict upon each other in maintenance of their drinking customs. It is no unusual thing for a man who earns £100 a year in times of sickness to suffer great distress and have recourse to the parish. Dr. Scott Alison gives a most melancholy picture of the highly-paid collier population of Tranet; and Dr. Ryan gives a very similar description of the same class, the colliers at Ayr. Dr. Scott says—"A man and his wife, and perhaps two children, may earn 40s. per week, if industriously employed during that time." And what is said of this population?—"If a stranger went into the house of a collier, he might exclaim, 'What extreme wretchedness and destitution!' when in fact on the Saturday they had received 30s., which before the Tuesday had all been squandered." He adds—"Filth is more frequently evidence of depravity than destitution. Indeed where the wages and means are evidently scanty there is frequently considerable cleanliness." We might go into the manufacturing districts generally and find very often families where the whole earnings do not average above 14s. or 15s. per week, with a tolerable share of comforts; while the well-paid artisan is squandering his wages at the public-house, and his house bears all the marks of squalor and destitution. In 1846 there was no less than 200,000 men employed upon the construction of railways. The wages varied from 3s. 6d. to 5s. and 6s. per day. When properly employed good wages are an essential element in the improvement of the working classes; but in the case of these men there was abundant evidence that without proper habits high wages are an evil rather than a good. The cases were extremely rare where any deposits were made in savings' bank, or any reserve kept by the men. There seemed to be an utter insensibility to the use of money, and their excesses became so outrageous as to call for Parliamentary inquiry. If we look from them to the poorly-paid agricultural labourers, we find a great relief. Out of 228,798 depositors in the savings' bank, 29,020 were agricultural labourers in 1826, and the number is now materially increased. In 1829 the Exeter savings' bank numbered 2,072 agricultural labourers and husbandmen, with a total amount of £70,688 as deposits. This difference may be attempted to be explained in various ways, but the true solution is in the difference of habits: one class takes to the provident-fund or savings' bank what the other spends in the public-house. Our poor-rates—nearly six millions per annum—our benevolent institutions, our prisons,—all furnish a mournful commentary upon the fact we have quoted in a previous article, that the working classes spend upon beer and spirits alone above £26,000,000 per annum. We say nothing of the loathsome vice, the moral disorder, the guilt and misery lying beneath these figures.

A KAFFIR KILLED BY STRONG DRINK.

The following is an extract from the Graham's Town Journal of the 26th of last October:—

"Fort Peddie, 24th October, 1850.—Many of your readers will be sorry to hear that Kosani, alias Kaffir Jack, is no more. His death is the more to be regretted as it was caused by drunkenness. He had been at Fort Peddie, and, as usual, could not keep away from the Canteen. On Monday evening he was proceeding to Buck Kraal, but from his intoxicated state fell down near a bush (about a mile distant from the Police-station) to rise no more. His wife remained with him a considerable time, but being drenched with rain, and finding all her efforts to rouse her husband unavailing, she repaired to Buck Kraal alone. Early the following morning a search was made by the Kaffir police, and poor Jack was found a corpse."

What sad reflections arise from this short narrative! I knew Kosani well; he had heard me preach the Gospel at the Wesleyan Missionary Station, Mount Coke. The missionary failed to convert him, but the drink of the missionary's countrymen has killed him. Oh! mournful inconsistency, that the same nation should send out Bibles and the Gospel, and yet countenance, in almost every possible way, both by legal license, and habitual use in social life, that most severe of all scourges, strong drink, whose master is Apollyon, the destroyer of the human race. This is a terrible drawback from the advantages of our colonization; we carry abroad with us our drinking customs, and spread misery along with our civilization in barbarous lands. Alas! for my country! Were she purified from this abomination at home, she would be a fit instrument to send forth the Gospel of salvation to the ends of the earth. Poor Kosani, in Kaffir land, has fallen a victim to the customs of drunken England—customs held in honour by drink-loving Englishmen in Africa. I know that this will be accounted severe language, but truth always appears severe to those who have no mind to yield to its power. Men do not like to be thought lovers of drink: hence their stomachs are always out of order, and they shelter themselves behind the effeminate plea of taking it medicinally. But if they had no more love for drink than they have for jalap, we should see and hear very, very little indeed of the medicinal use of either inebriating wine or brandy.

TWENTY REASONS FOR TEETOTALISM.

A FEW weeks ago the Committee of the Bolton Temperance Society offered a premium, consisting of "JOHN CASSELL'S LIBRARY," in twenty-four volumes, for the best "Twenty Reasons why I am a Teetotaler." The candidates were to be bona fide juvenile Teetotalers. Twenty-seven papers were sent in for adjudication. The one selected by the adjudicators was subjoined. It was written by THOMAS ISHERWOOD, aged seventeen:—

"Twenty Reasons why I am a Teetotaler."

"1. I abstain because experience proves that intoxicating drinks are not necessary to the enjoyment of health and happiness. 2. Because their use is not only unnecessary, but positively injurious. 3. Because the purchase of intoxicating drinks, and the loss attendant upon their use, entail upon the country an expenditure of not less than one hundred millions sterling annually, which, if usefully employed, would do much to benefit the world. 4. Because the manufacture of these drinks occasions the destruction of forty millions of bushels of wholesome grain, besides vast quantities of fruit, which would be better employed in feeding the hungry. 5. Because by the use of these drinks multitudes of the youth of our land are seduced from the paths of virtue to those of vice—from vice to crime, shame, and ruin. 6. Because the sad experience of those who have gone before us proves clearly that perfect safety is to be found in abstinence alone. 7. Because the habits which characterize the youth have a mighty influence on the after-life of the man. 8. Because the season of youth is far too precious to be wasted in the low, degrading pursuits of the ale-house or the music saloon. 9. Because our time and money will be better employed in the pursuit of that knowledge which will give culture and nobility to the intellectual powers with which our Creator has endowed us. 10. Because beings born for immortality should not unnecessarily clog themselves with that which will retard their progress onwards and upwards. 11. Because, while we wish to be safe ourselves, we desire not to injure others by setting them a dangerous example. 12. Because we wish the world to be better and not worse for our having lived in it. 13. Because it is more patriotic to abstain from than to support or countenance that which is the greatest curse of our own native land. 14. Because the time will soon come when those who are now youths will have to take the place of those who are now fathers in the State, and they will then be better able to contend successfully with the difficulties of life if they now abstain. 15. Because we have no wish to live to please ourselves only. 16. Because we are anxious to unite our efforts, feeble though they are, with those who are nobly struggling to stem the destructive tide of intemperance which is desolating our fair country. 17. Because we believe it is more in accordance with reason and the will of God that we should abstain. 18. Because we believe that we shall have better health and more wealth if we abstain. 19. Because we believe that we shall better answer the chief end of man if we abstain from intoxicating drinks. 20. And the last reason why juveniles should be teetotalers is, that there is no reason why they should not."

THE DISPUTE SETTLED.—A dispute happening the other day between a baker and a female customer, respecting a half-quarter loaf, the lady affirmed that it was impossible for her to be chargeable with two loaves, as her husband was drunk on the preceding night, and that on such occasions he could never eat on the following day.

TEMPERANCE BETTERING THE CONDITION.—At a meeting of the Lauceston Board of Guardians, when the names of the paupers were called over, it was asked, "Where is such a man?" It was answered, "Oh! he has become a teetotaler; you will see no more of him."

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

EXETER-HALL, LONDON.

On Monday evening, January 6, a meeting of the advocates and friends of temperance was held in Exeter-hall. It was announced by handbills that several hard-working men would attend, selected from the following occupations—gas stokers, glassblowers, brickmakers, compositors, brass-founders, fellmongers, shoemakers, gardeners, &c.; and that they would demonstrate, from their own experience, that entire abstinence from strong drink is practicable in connection with the most arduous toil, and promotive of health, comfort, independence, and political, social, and moral elevation. The large hall was well filled, the majority being of the working classes, male and female—fathers, mothers, and their children.

JOHN CASSELL, Esq., who was selected by the committee to fill the chair, in consequence of his well-known exertions to promote the elevation of the working classes, expressed his great satisfaction at seeing such a numerous assembly as was convened on this occasion. This was a meeting to advocate temperance on the basis of total abstinence. He called himself a working man, and he had tried the temperance system for fifteen years past, winter and summer, both as an operative and as an employer; and he never had worked harder than he did now. Indeed he could get through his work, mental and physical, much better without the aid of any kind of intoxicating drinks (cheers). Were he to dwell on the vast advantages of the teetotal system, he should engross all their time. Teetotalism was productive of the greatest possible social and moral advantages to the working classes. He then proceeded to show the evils of public-houses, which led to the degradation of the men's children, the profanation of the Sabbath, and to all kinds of misery. The drunkards spent most of his money in the public-house and gin-palace, and inflicted great injury on his family and on his fellow-workmen. These men generally were industrious when sober. And look at the vast moral advantages of sobriety, which led men to purchase books, thereby indirectly giving labour to paper-makers, bookbinders, and compositors, &c., while their social feelings became elevated (cheers). Thus, if they looked on it as a labour question, it was one of vast consequence. If the working man bought clothes and useful articles instead of squandering his money in "blue ruin," he benefitted not only himself, but the community at large. Let the teetotal system prevail, and see what a different race of men we should then have (hear). Those who would address the meeting that evening would demonstrate the miseries they had endured when they were drunkards; whereas now they were most useful and respectable members of society,—their children were educated, and their position in society was that of intellectual and happy beings. They had the evidence of millions in America, England, Ireland, and Scotland, of the inestimable blessings of temperance (cheers). He would not go further, as he had on his list the names of nine working men who would address the meeting, and demonstrate from their own experience, that entire abstinence from strong drink was practicable, in connection with the most excessive toil. There was one point, however, to which he would beg to call attention. They were to have a great gathering in that great temperance house, the Crystal Palace. He called it the temperance house because the Commissioners of the national undertaking had determined that persons contracting for the supply of refreshments should not be allowed to sell any intoxicating liquors in the building; and, moreover, as if out of respect to them (the teetotalers), the contractors for refreshments were compelled to supply (gratis) an abundance of filtered water to everybody who should solicit the crystal drink in the Crystal Palace. Now they would have a great many teetotalers, hard-working men, and their wives too, coming up to London to visit the great Exhibition. He wished to give a good reception to their teetotal friends; and he was anxious that when these hard-working men came to London, every facility should be given them for cheap lodgings, for they could not go to boarding-houses or hotels. He was desirous that local committees should be formed for the purpose of obtaining the names of teetotal housekeepers who could grant accommodation to these working men. These men might be furnished with tickets which would secure them a reception at a moderate rate on their visit to London on that glorious occasion. He himself was doing all he could to further this plan, and he trusted that the teetotalers would unanimously put their shoulders to the wheel to carry out this great social object (cheers).

Mr. GROVE, a coal-whipper, said that teetotalism had been a glorious thing to him and his family. He had been a coal-whipper for many years, and remembered the time when they were called the "White Slaves of Wapping." Then the system was that the publicans employed all the coal-whippers, and the man who drank the most rum, or gin, or beer, received the most work to do; and then they had none of them any time to improve their minds. But, thank God, it was not so now, for great improvement had taken place. Here he described the gloomy vault in which he received his first engagement; it was in the house of a publican, and men blackened with their work were sitting there and smoking their pipes, and made it look more like a smuggler's cave than anything else. He had been told before he became a coal-whipper that he would earn 6s. 9d., and even sometimes 18s. a day. He had thought if he could earn so much that he could afford to drink a little, but he soon found that three parts of his earnings were to go to the publicans (hear). He went one day to a publican to get employment, but did not succeed, and at the time a ship's captain, a worthy pious man, was standing at the bar, and he asked the landlord why he (Grove) had not been at work, to which the publican replied that he was too respectable a looking fellow to be a coal-whipper, and would not drink enough (hear). The speaker then proceeded to describe at length his career as a drinking man until he became a depraved drunkard. He soon pawned and lost his clothes, and became dressed in rags and tatters; he lost all thoughts of going to chapel, and went anywhere on Sunday evenings where he could get a pipe. The lies that he and his fellow-drunkards told their wives about the wages could not be numbered. His children grew up bigger drunkards than their father. And so it was among them all. Father and son then went to the beer-shop and incited each other to drink. One Sunday evening he went out to look for his children, and he found his eldest son at a public-house almost choking from intoxication. He took him home, and laid him down to recover himself; but he came home on Sunday again drunk. These sights of the children growing up in the ways of their father was the occasion of his becoming a total abstinence man. At first he was ridiculed by his mates after taking the pledge; but he had made his determination, and went on steadily. Here Mr. Grove described the advantages in detail which had accrued to him and his family from his change of habit; how they had obtained more clothes, and raised themselves in respectability of station. He found that he could do his work much better now, and felt as if he was fifteen years younger than he was twenty years ago. His eldest son signed the pledge shortly after he had done so; then six of his children and their mother; and finally their grandmother was so delighted with the good effects which she had witnessed that at the age of 88 she signed the pledge and kept it till she was 95, at which age God was pleased to take her to Himself. Mr. Grove then told the meeting several anecdotes of drunkards and their reformations, and of whole families having one and all taken the pledge and been converted to the system of total abstinence, after having been reduced to severe misfortune and almost destitution by the intemperate habits of the father, which the sons had been too apt to follow. He concluded by exhorting all present to follow such admirable examples, and so secure to themselves inestimable advantages (cheering).

Mr. TANNER, a brickmaker, next spoke. He had adopted the principle of total abstinence nearly eleven years, and continued it. But if he were to describe the details of his drinking career before that, he should not be done till Saturday night. He had been once a drunkard, and had suffered much from it; he was in the most miserable position, often working from four in the morning till eight at night, living upon nothing but the small loaves and strong beer of the publicans. At other times his meals were a loaf and a little tea, and he was obliged to sleep under a shed. But he now came before them a comparatively independent man (hear). Before he took the pledge his home and his wife and children were miserable, and all his clothes put together were not worth the day's pay of a soldier, 13½d. To talk about working men not being able to do without drink was nonsense. He was now a better man and a much stronger man than he was in those days when he drank; and before he took the pledge of total abstinence he was sometimes two or three days without food. During the last three years he had worked hard enough, but it was not work of the hand, but of the head (cheers).

Mr. HARPER, compositor, delivered a very eloquent address. He had never been a drunkard himself, but he had derived manifold advantages from his adoption of the total abstinence system. The chairman had spoken of the occupation of a compositor as involving but little manual labour; but the fact was that compositors had much heavy work in connection with that of the head. They had to lift heavy forms of type, and to go frequently up and down long flights of stairs; and, on the whole, their employment was fatiguing both to body and mind. They had also frequently to work through the night. But he was convinced that the use of strong drink, so far from assisting, would materially impede and injure them (hear). He then addressed three classes of characters—the teetotalers, the moderate drinkers, and the drunkard; and the two latter characters he described, by forcible illustrations, as in imminent danger, and the teetotalers as being the only persons who could work effectually for their rescue. Mr. Harper was much cheered.

Mr. WEST, a skinner or fellmonger, followed: When he first took the pledge he was not a drunkard, he had never been one, but was on the road to become one. Since taking the pledge he had enjoyed uninterrupted good health, and he had been a teetotaler for twelve years. If working men of any class could be said absolutely to require strong drinks, he should say it was the skinnners and tanners; but a great many of them had found out, to their great advantage, that they could soak the hides of animals without necessarily also soaking their own hides (laughter). He did better in his work without drink than with it; and he could appeal to his employers whether he had ever lost a day's labour owing to his total abstinence. He had greatly improved his circumstances. He had also been instrumental in abolishing the compulsory fines and footings which had, for years, operated so oppressively upon working men in his trade. He pointed out to the working men present the numerous advantages which would result from their adoption of teetotalism, as to their physical, mental, social, and moral condition, and concluded an animated address amidst the cheers of the audience.

Mr. HALL (from Northampton) a currier, said he could not, like some of the speakers, say he had never been a drunkard, for he was one for many years, and the habit was to be traced to his family having sent him when a child to the public-house for the luncheon beer. He had been taken home drunk before he was fourteen years old, and this was attributable to nothing but the example of the intemperance of his parents. They used to take him for a walk every Sunday for three or four miles, and they would call at almost every public-house on the road, so that, instead of being educated as at school and chapel, he was brought up, as he might say, in the public-house (hear). That was at the time of the battle of Waterloo, and he had continued the course of drinking up to 1840, when upon a particular occasion in an alehouse the idea struck him—why not stop here and adopt a better principle? He left the public-house and went to a temperance meeting in the neighbourhood, and signed the pledge when in a state of intoxication. That would be eleven years ago next July. He was now in respectable circumstances as a master tradesman. He was also an accredited member of a Baptist Church. A carrier's work was hard, but he found he could do it better without the stimulant of strong drink than with it. He concluded by strongly advising parents not to send their children to public-houses for the beer for their meals; for that, as he had told them, was the original cause and foundation of his own habits of intemperance (cheers). Mr. Hall had come to town at his own expense, from a desire to benefit some in his own trade by his testimony.

Mr. JOSEPH PALMER, of Hackney, costermonger, said that one of the most unpleasant tasks a temperance man had to perform, was to state, as a reclaimed drunkard, the details of his experience. He commenced drinking when very young; having been taught by his parents, in the first instance, that a small portion of home-brewed ale was necessary and good for him. As he grew up he thought, like many other lads, that it was honourable to fight for his king and country, and so he entered himself on board a man-of-war, and there he was taught to believe that he would never become strong, and never be able to kill people, without taking a portion of intoxicating drinks. Up to 1818 he continued to drink in what was called moderate quantities. Up to 1822 he drank when on shore in large quantities, and when at sea in small quantities, and sometimes drank nothing at all. In 1822 he met with an accident on board the ship and was compelled to go into the hospital. After his discharge from the ship he thought he must have a wife, and a pretty character to be sure he was to take care of a wife when he could not take care of himself (laughter and cheering). Up to 1840 he continued in the habit of hard drinking. But let them mark the gradual way in which that was accomplished. At one time he had shuddered at the idea of being a drunkard, but before many years he became an inveterate drunkard, and had lost good situations through drinking. He became a regular degraded and disgraced character in Hackney parish, pointed at with scorn by some, and cared for by none (hear). Some people thought that they could cure drunkenness by punishing the drunkard, but it was no such thing. No one had suffered more than he had from the habit of drinking. He had once had his skull fractured in a row by the staff of a police officer, he had his ribs broken, and on another occasion he had been injured by a quart pot thrown at him in a quarrel. He had also been injured by fighting with a man much heavier than himself. He had, in a word, suffered a martyrdom by joining in the drinking practices of this country (hear, hear). It had been said of him that it was an impossibility he could be kept from drink unless under the care of Dr. Wakefield, in the House of Correction (laughter). Ah! that was no laughing matter, and they little knew how painful it was to his feelings to make these disclosures (cheers); but he did so for the benefit of those who heard him, and as an example and warning to them, if any of them had not taken the pledge (cheers). Why, when he drank he robbed his wife of her domestic happiness, and made her life a misery. However, he went on in this way up to the 10th of August, 1840. Up to that time he had heard little of total abstinence. After a debauch, in which he had been drunk on the Saturday, the Sunday, the Monday, and the Tuesday, on the last of those evenings he fell out with a pot companion. Words ensued and he struck him. There was a temperance meeting by a fortunate chance then holding in the neighbourhood, and at this moment something strange struck upon his mind, as he saw the blood trickling from the wound he had inflicted, and it appeared to him as if Almighty God had said to him "Thus far shalt thou go but no farther." (hear, hear.) He said to his companions, "Let me go." They asked "Where?" and he answered, "To sign the teetotal pledge." They offered him beer, but he said that beer was what had made him suffer what he had, and he would have none of it, and he went at once to the teetotal meeting drunk as he was—and there was their old friend Dr. Oxley—(cheers)—and a pretty character he (Palmer) looked at the time with an old jacket on, which it was a libel on a decent jacket to call by that name, and an old cap which he would not now pick up in the street. Talk of liberty! He had regular out-and-out liberty then—liberty for his elbows, and for his knees, and his shoulders down to his very shoes, he had liberty everywhere, and in a word he was a regular out-and-out publican's victim (cheers). He signed the pledge then for three months, and after he had put his name in the book, he said to the chairman that he was determined to go without intoxicating drinks for three months, and if he found that abstinence did him any harm, he would come and tell the teetotalers that it had done so. But he did not wait even the three months over, for he then began to read, to think, to learn and inwardly to digest the subject, and six weeks after he had put his name to the pledge he became a teetotaler upon principle and had remained so ever since (cheers). He felt ten years younger than when he was a drinking man, and he now spoke in the presence of his wife and three children, who were not far off, and there sat a regular teetotal wife (cheers). His old companions had told him he would die under the teetotal system, but he had not felt as if he was going to die; but on the contrary, was stronger and in better health; and all he could say was, that if he was to die, he should have at least this comfort, that he should die sober (hear, hear, and cheering). He concluded by earnestly exhorting all present to regard the gin-shop light as the beacon which warned the mariner of rocks and quicksands, and danger; by strongly advising them all, if they wanted to stop drunkenness, to combine together in the resolution to buy nothing, no article whatever—of the publicans—not even ginger-beer, or a bit of tobacco, or a cigar, or anything else that was even innocent in its effects (cheers).

Mr. MURRELL, a gardener, proclaimed himself to be a teetotaler of ten years' and a-half standing, and if there was any man present who had been drinking intoxicating liquors for that period, and who was a better looking man than himself, let him show himself (laughter). In reference to the hardships which he had endured, he had once slept for six weeks on a dunghill at Woolwich, and only got up to do the office of a washerwoman by washing the only shirt he had. At length he took the pledge; he went to reside with his aged mother; and the first week he went there he brought home 5s., the next week he added another shilling, the third week he brought home all his wages, amounting to 18s. His mother took the pledge at eighty-eight years of age, and kept it till ninety-one, when she died. The three years he lived with his mother were indeed happy years. He had married a teetotaler, and exhorted every one to do the same. Let every one sign the temperance-pledge, not only for his own sake, but for the sake of the human family.

Mr. NIXON, a glass-blower in the employ of Apsley Pellett, Esq., said that as a young man he had not contracted those habits to which others had been exposed. He was, however, proud to say that he had signed the teetotal pledge. The speaker alluded to the very demoralized condition of the glassblowers some years since, when they were regarded as a slavish and contemptible body of men—nay, as everything that was bad. Drunken habits pervaded the whole body; and it had been said in the trade that they might as well attempt to sail a ship without water as a glassblower carry on his trade without intoxicating drinks. But now total abstinence was making progress among them (hear); and there was not a factory in the three kingdoms in which teetotalers were not to be found. The system of paying "footings" was put an end to. Out of 27 delegates present on one occasion, 17 were teetotalers; and teetotalism was rapidly increasing. The glassblowers had established a publication, or magazine, and, out of the contributors, 17 were teetotalers. The best men in the trade were teetotalers.

Mr. BUTIEX, ironmoulder, stated that he was one of the oldest advocates of the teetotal system in the Metropolis, and the very first of the iron moulders who declared for the system (hear). It had since then made great progress among that class, and he rejoiced to say that the abominable and oppressive system of fines and footings was done away with in his trade (loud cheers). As it regarded his own experience, he was taught to believe that, unless he drank strong drink, he could not become a strong man or a good workman; and when he determined to break off and become a teetotaler, he was assured that he would soon die; but he had been more than thirteen years a teetotaler, and it had not killed him yet (cheers). Some working men had scarcely clothes to their backs, and that had been his own predicament before taking the pledge; and now he had a comfortable home, and a little library for which he would not take £20. Let working men know their own real value, and assert it by their conduct. It was all stuff and nonsense for men to say that they could not get through their work, however heavy, without beer. If iron-moulders could do well without it, how ridiculous it was for men, watchmakers for instance, who had to handle the immense wheels of a watch (laughter) to pretend they could not work without drink (hear). Besides, they had no money to spare. Where were their wives and children to go when they fell sick or died, when they had drunk all their means away, and had made no provision for them? (hear, hear.) There were no almshouses built for them, and this should be a lesson to working men to take care of their earnings and save. When the "pale face was turned to the wall" where were the widow and children to go? He had a son in the meeting, who was fourteen years old on Christmas-day, who did not know the colour of rum! Was it wrong thus to bring up a boy? For himself, he was in receipt of a better income than most workmen; but to what was this to be attributed but to the practical adoption of the total abstinence principle? By such means his fellow-workmen would be enabled to provide for their families (cheers).

Mr. W. SPRIGGS moved, and Mr. E. GRIFFITHS seconded, a resolution of thanks to the Chairman, which was carried with cheers.

Mr. CASSELL duly acknowledged it, and announced the next meeting in that place for Monday, February 3rd.

A large quantity of tracts, explanatory of the principles of Teetotalers, kindly sent for that purpose by R. D. ALEXANDER, Esq., of Ipswich, were circulated throughout the meeting.

HARP-ALLEY, FARRINGTON-STREET.

The anniversary festival of the Total Abstinence Society of the above place was celebrated on Tuesday evening, January 7, in the large room, known as the "Druid's Hall," Farringdon-street. A large number partook of tea, after which a public meeting was held, when the hall was filled. BENJAMIN ROTCH, Esq., presided. His address consisted chiefly of an appeal in behalf of seamen, a reckless and improvident, yet a brave and useful race, who only needed to be freed from the love of strong drink to be truly blessings to their country. He adverted with pleasure to recent regulations in the Navy, by which a very large portion of the evil was likely to be removed. The meeting was also addressed by Dr. Oxley and Messrs. Taylor, Townley, Green, Spriggs, &c. The proceedings of the evening were enlivened by the excellent vocal performances of an amateur band, under the superintendence of Messrs. Tisdall and Campbell, to whom thanks were very cordially tendered, on the motion of the learned Chairman.

FITZROY-HALL, MARYLEBONE.

An interesting meeting of the members and friends of the Fitzroy and Marylebone Teetotal Association was held in the above place on Thursday evening, December 26th. Mr. G. Miller, the treasurer, presided. A poetical address, written by Mr. O'Neil, was recited by Mr. Watson; after which, tea and its accompaniments were plentifully supplied to a large company. After tea, the evening was occupied by several gentlemen, who delivered addresses and recitations; and the Cambrian Amateur Harmonists, who sang several pieces in Welsh and English. Mr. Watson delivered an address on "Music in connection with the Total Abstinence Movement;" Mr. Miller, on "The Social Aspects of Teetotalism;" Mr. Roberts, on "The Traffic in Strong Drinks;" Mr. J. P. Draper, on "Teetotalism—three of its characteristic features;" Mr. J. W. Green, on "Charity." The proceedings, which extended somewhat beyond the usual hour, appeared to give great satisfaction.

On Tuesday evening, the 31st ult., the usual weekly meeting commenced at eight o'clock, and closed at half-past nine; Mr. J. P. Draper presided. At ten o'clock an experience meeting commenced, when Mr. Roberts presided. The relation of experiences by several of the members was continued till the clock had struck twelve; when the old year was concluded and the new year entered upon by the singing of an appropriate hymn.

WESTMINSTER.

A meeting of the City of Westminster Band of Hope was held in the Great-hall, York-street, on Friday evening, January 3. Though the evening was very unfavourable, in consequence of heavy rain, the attendance was good. George Cruikshank, Esq., presided. He intimated that some friends had rallied him upon the attention he paid to his new "hobby"—Teetotalism. He admitted that it was a pleasure to him to engage in its advocacy, but he denied that he regarded it as anything like a pastime; he took it up as a serious and important matter,—a duty imposed upon him alike by the common requirements of humanity and the injunctions of Christianity; while the good that resulted from it afforded him ample encouragement. Several of the children recited short temperance pieces, and sang some temperance hymns. Mr. W. Harper delivered an address—"The Gin Fiend and the Ragged School;" Mr. J. W. Green, on "The Sabbath School, Prisons and Penitentiaries;" and Mr. Duffy, on "The Angel of Truth, and the Moral Millennium." Mr. Duffy also delivered a short address to the children. The honourable secretary, Mr. J. H. Esterbrooke, stated that the Band of Hope was gradually increasing in numbers and efficiency, in that district, a large portion of which had for many years been notorious for vice and wretchedness.

HAWKESTONE-HALL, WATERLOO-ROAD.

On Tuesday evening, December 31, a meeting, presenting more than usual attractions, was held in this place. After tea, &c., had been abundantly supplied, a poetical address, written for the occasion, was recited by Mr. J. W. Green. The chair was then taken by George Cruikshank, Esq., and, after a brief address, a beautiful overture was performed by the gentlemen of the Surrey Quartette and Quintette Society. Various appropriate sentiments were spoken to in the course of the evening by the Rev. Dr. J. Burns, Mr. Irvine White, the Rev. J. Doxsey, &c.; and a choice selection of temperance songs and glees were sung in excellent style by ladies and gentlemen who had very kindly volunteered their services on the occasion. A young lady, daughter of one of the members, elicited great applause by her performances on the grand piano. The entertainments of the evening were concluded by an exhibition of dissolving views and other subjects, by Mr. Cox. The company did not separate till the bells of the neighbouring churches began to strike up their merry peals, reminding the inhabitants that the year 1850 was about to close, and the year 1851 to commence.

DOVER.

The annual meeting of the members and friends of the Temperance Society was held on Monday evening, Jan. 13, when a demonstration of working men in favour of the principles of total abstinence took place. The meeting was numerously attended. W. Horsnail, Esq., occupied the chair, and was supported by the Rev. S. Briggs, and other gentlemen. The society is in a state of progression, while the influential names which appear upon its subscription list argue well for its future prosperity. Among them we notice those of both the hon. M.P.'s for Dover, E. R. Rice, Esq., and Sir George Clark, Bart., also the Mayor (S. Finnis, Esq.), and other gentlemen. The meeting was addressed by several working men, reformed drunkards, who contrasted their present position with that which they occupied when under the influence of intemperance. One fly-proprietor detailed how, by an adherence to total abstinence principles, he had, during the last nine or ten years, become possessed of a business upon which he had expended some £200 or £300, and at the period he signed the Temperance pledge he was in a state of the vilest destitution.

DELPH.

The sixteenth annual soiree of the Delph Temperance Society was celebrated on the 3rd of January. 230 persons sat down to tea, during which a musical band played. After tea the meeting was addressed by Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., M.P., Peter Seville, Esq., Rev. Enock Mellor, A.M., and others. In the course of the evening a selection of music was given. The proceedings elicited much applause.

SELBY.

The Teetotals here have had another of their Working Men's Demonstrations in the Victoria Room; Mr. R. Morrell in the chair. The room was well filled, and great interest was excited by the simple, yet forcible, speeches delivered by gardeners, shoemakers, woodmen, and porters, on the blessings of total abstinence from tobacco, as well as from intoxicating drinks. The chairman furnished some valuable statistics respecting the cost of these articles used by the working classes. At the close of the meeting 200 copies of Mr. Baines' "Seize the Crisis" were distributed. Were such meetings to become general throughout the country, they would give a great impetus to the Temperance Movement.

R. MORRELL, Sec.

SCARBOROUGH.

The cause of Temperance still continues onward in this fashionable watering-place. The committee are working with redoubled energy in behalf of the good work. Mr. Hodgson, from London, has been engaged as town missionary, and his "work of faith and labour of love" have been happily rewarded. Since his arrival upwards of 300 persons have subscribed to the total abstinence pledge, many of whom had been inveterate drinkers for years, and whose families were reduced to misery and want, but who are now frequent attenders at the temperance meetings and places of worship. Mr. Grubb has also been engaged for three nights to advocate the temperance question in the Hall of Commerce to crowded audiences. A society has also been established at the village of Falsgrave, about a mile from Scarborough; and although this place contains but 200 or 300 inhabitants, there are five public-houses and tea-gardens for the sale of intoxicating liquors, with one place of worship. The Temperance standard has here been planted; the village bell has announced the time of meeting, and the school room is crowded weekly. Addresses have been delivered by Mr. Hodgson, Messrs. W. Craven, Barrow, Tindall, Weddle, and others, and a lecture "On the Evils of Intemperance" by Mr. C. Meadley, of Scarborough. Upwards of fifty villagers have administered to the pledge, and a lively interest has been created. Mr. Hodgson has also been instrumental in reorganising the Band of Hope in Scarborough, and numbers of children have registered themselves as members. Temperance melodies are nightly introduced, and received with every mark of approbation. A small monthly publication is issued by the society, entitled "The Temperance Visitor," for gratuitous circulation.

ROTHERHAM.

About a fortnight ago the workmen in the employ of Messrs. Guest and Chrimms, brass-works, Rotherham, together with their wives, and the young persons employed in their works, to the number of upwards of one hundred, held one of their social tea-meetings in the New Assembly Room. The workmen employed in the establishment have introduced a custom which deserves being better known and more extensively adopted, and which is, that when one of the workmen takes to himself a wife, the event is celebrated by the whole of the workmen and their wives having tea together at the works, or some other suitable place, when a present of some useful article of furniture is made to the young housekeepers, raised by a subscription of their fellow-workmen, aided by the firm. On the present occasion the above goodly number sat down to tea, and on the repast being concluded and the tables removed, vocal and instrumental music was introduced, and some favourite pieces were excellently given by Messrs. Taylor, Newsum, Myers, S. Eskholm, and others, which soon brought the hour of nine, at which time it was arranged the presentations of furniture to the newly-married couples should take place.

Mr. Guest having been requested to undertake this duty, spoke to the following effect:—"The very pleasant duty I am now requested to fulfil, will need but few words from me. I can truly say, however, that it is a pleasant thing for me to have to do. The custom you have adopted deserves the warmest commendation and support. There are customs mixed up with manufacturing arrangements, which I cannot think were, on their first institution, intended to be the instruments of oppression, injustice, and cruelty, they have since become,—but which, however, with the drinking usages of the country, can now only merit the strongest reprobation of both employer and employed, and in the utter abolition of which they cannot too earnestly co-operate. Of course, I allude to footings, fines, &c., which until recently had become a source of most cruel, heartless, and unjust robbery to which workmen could possibly be exposed by each other. Thank God, this wicked system is fast passing away—becoming one of the dark enormities which were. The custom now here adopted stands out in bright contrast—it is a retrieving of that which is good of the old custom—and I confess myself one of those who love old customs, so long as they are, if not altogether wise, yet innocent. In this instance it is both innocent and wise. Here employers and employed can meet together as one family—whose interests are identical—for the purpose of showing a kind, considerate feeling towards those who have taken upon themselves new duties, and entered into new relations with each other; and it is with a feeling of true gratification that I now present, in the name of your fellow-workmen, to you, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Eskholm, this half-dozen chairs and fender; not because you are not competent and determined by the earnest industry of your own hands to obtain for yourselves these and all other necessary articles, in due time to make your home comfortable, but as a manifestation of kind and fraternal feeling towards you on the part of your fellow-workmen; giving you, at the very threshold of your entrance into married life, an assurance from them of sympathy with you and yours, which is calculated to cheer and support. At the close of every day's toil these articles will silently tell of this kind regard; and when you are at your daily avocation, as your wife moves amongst them amidst her household duties, and, I may add, her household cares, she will feel that her husband is associated with, and working amongst, those who have given evident proof that they are disposed to aid, not injure—to promote, not destroy, comfort. With these views, I have also the pleasure of presenting you, Mrs. and Mrs. Scott, in the name of your fellow-workmen, with this clock, dressing-table, and looking-glass, feeling assured you will estimate them, not at their intrinsic value, but as tokens of regard and good-will, which it would be difficult to over-estimate; and I pray that you may all of you live long to wisely enjoy them."—Mr. Chirimes then presented each of the four persons with a handsome purple morocco-bound Bible, observing that "in doing so, he presented them with that which was worthy of their highest regard. The Bible was the word of God—it was also the word of life; whilst it showed man his awful fall, it also showed the effectual remedy for that fall; and he trusted they would each read it, till they had made that remedy individually their own."—A handsome dessert was immediately afterwards served round, and the remainder of the time so spent, as to ensure that the evening's amusements should involve no bitter morning reflections.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.

A soiree of the Westgate Temperance Society took place in St. John's National School last month. Upwards of 300 persons sat down to tea at the table, which were presided over by eighteen ladies. After tea Sir Walter Colverley Trevelyan, Bart., High-Sheriff of Northumberland, was called to the chair. The hon. baronet expressed the gratification he felt in being invited to preside over so pleasant a company assembled for the promotion of one of the greatest reforms of the age. From many years' experience, he was convinced that Temperance societies were well calculated to promote the happiness, not only of individuals, but also of the community at large. They were well acquainted with the fact that intemperance was a frightful source of vice and misery. The jails, the hospitals, and the workhouses were filled with its victims. Officers, both of the army and navy, had informed him that the use of intoxicating liquors was the cause of the greater part of the punishment inflicted in these professions. He concluded by urging that it was the duty of every philanthropist and Christian to aid the Temperance cause, and trusted that the number of members of the society would be considerably increased. The Rev. H. W. Wright, incumbent of St. John's, related his experience as a clergyman in this town. He mentioned instances of intoxication which had occurred under his notice in persons at some of the most solemn ordinances of the Church. Mr. Forster, secretary of the society, read their report for the past year. The Temperance cause was steadily progressing. Addresses were also delivered by the Rev. W. Ayre, of Morpeth, Mr. H. Dickinson, Mr. J. Benson, the Rev. Robert Shepherd, incumbent of St. Paul's, Newcastle, Mr. Whitehead, Temperance missionary, and Mr. R. T. Bell. The national anthem was sung, and during the evening various pieces of music were performed in a very efficient and pleasing manner.

SUNDERLAND.

On Tuesday afternoon, the 2nd of December, we held our annual tea meeting in the Athenæum. The large room was decorated with several loyal and temperance banners. A considerable portion of the provisions was given by warm-hearted friends to the cause. About four hundred persons sat down to sea, and evidently enjoyed the repast. The Rev. T. White supplicated the Divine blessing upon the meeting. While the tables were being removed for the evening meeting, the Museum on the premises was kindly thrown open for the inspection of the company; and, while the grave students of natural phenomena were engaged there, several hundreds of gayer folks were being electrified with laughter in another large room on seeing a variety of grand, grotesque, and comic dissolving views, exhibited by Mr. Robert Cameron, lecturer on astronomy. The chair was then taken by our noble and generous friend, Edward Backhouse, Esq., jun., who opened the meeting with a few pointed observations. Mr. T. S. Hodgson, the Rev. John Parker, T. Orton, Esq., surgeon; Mr. Spencer Hall, Mr. John Benson, of Newcastle; Mr. W. W. Brown, a fugitive slave from America; and Mr. John Hills addressed the meeting, which addresses have never been surpassed for elegance, beauty, and interest, on any former annual soiree. Mr. Bales conducted the singing of several melodies. Mr. W. Harty and Mr. J. Walton thanked the ladies for providing and superintending the tea. To express their sympathy for Mr. Brown and his coloured brethren in fetters, and to show their utter abhorrence of 'the atrocious inhumanity of American slavery and the late slave bill, the meeting unanimously and enthusiastically carried the following resolution, which the society hopes will be passed in every temperance meeting in the United Kingdom:—"That this meeting views with painful feelings the proceedings of the National division of the Sons of Temperance, in the United States, in excluding from their Temperance Association our coloured brethren. This meeting, therefore, feels bound to enter into Christian protest against so cruel and unrighteous an interference with the liberties of those whom, by every principle of humanity and religion, we are bold to recognise, as the children of that God who hath made of one blood all nations of men." And would further express its warmest sympathy with our injured brethren, and a hope that the day may not be far distant when, through Divine help, their bonds shall be broken, and slavery, that foul stigma upon the character of the American people, shall be for ever abolished." Two memorials have been presented to the worshipful the Mayor, and the justices of the peace for the borough of Sunderland—one from the Sunderland Total Abstinence Society, the other from the Sunderland Society for the Protection of Young Females and for the Prevention of Prostitution;—praying that the number of houses licensed for the sale of intoxicating drinks may be reduced, and that no additional licenses might be granted.

SCOTLAND.

BALFRON.

It is pleasing to learn that the friends of the Temperance Reformation in Balfron, both adult and juvenile, continue, by example and precept, their efforts to leaven the community in their locality with a correct estimate of the folly and ruin of seeking enjoyment in the use of intoxicating beverages. On the morning of New Year's day, a little after ten o'clock, the flag of the juvenile abstainers, bearing the inscriptions, "May the Balfron Band of Hope prosper," and "Let Temperance flourish all the world over," was raised in front of the parochial school-house. In a brief space thereafter more than 120 young and happy creatures of both sexes, clean and decked in Sabbath-day attire, were marshalled under the banner, and, preceded by sweet music, walked in procession down the principal street of the village to the large hall of the Ballindalach-school, which had been kindly granted by A. G. Jeffrey, Esq., J. P., for their accommodation. Under the guidance of their leaders, the party, in all the buoyancy of youth, passed the forenoon in various amusements, and at three o'clock they separated for dinner. In the evening the Adult Society held their annual soiree in the Free Church; the Rev. John Fairlie, president, in the chair. After tea the meeting, which consisted of considerably more than two hundred, was repeatedly addressed by the chairman, and Mr. Shaw, from Kirkintilloch; and in a succession of pathetic and humorous appeals, Mr. James Stirling, "the old man eloquent," edified and delighted the numerous and attentive audience. Here again the Band of Hope afforded a charming variety to the entertainments of the evening by the beautiful manner in which they sang a choice collection of the Temperance melodies.

A DRUNKARD REFORMED.—An old man, who was for many years a great drunkard, surprised his minister one day by calling on him, well clad, clean, and sober, and saying he wished to know when he should come to the class-meeting, as he had now become sober, read his Bible, and wished to "lay hold on eternal life," by obtaining through Christ pardon of his sins.

ATTACHMENT TO DRINK.—One of the monarchs of Bamba, in Africa, resigned his right to the crown rather than submit to be removed from the Portuguese settlements, where he had ample opportunities of indulging his fondness for intoxicating liquors.

OUR ENCOURAGEMENTS.

BY BENJAMIN PARSONS.

FROM nearly all parts of the country we receive testimonies respecting the success of our cause. Sixteen years ago it was said that we should not hold on for six months. It was boldly proclaimed, that before that period most of us would be dead. So great was the dependence upon these poisons, and so general was their use, that it was asserted that mankind could not live without them. Premature death was in every case to be the inevitable result of total abstinence. And then it was also affirmed that the love of strong drink was so inveterate that it would be impossible to induce mankind to abandon the liquor. But the Teetotalers having cleared their heads of the fumes of alcohol, and having braced their nerves with cold water, were not daunted with these predictions and forebodings. On they went in spite of all, and, as a consequence, have already achieved a glorious victory. They soon perceived that they had truth and religion on their side, and therefore were certain that their principles would triumph. Chemistry, physiology, history, and scripture, all came to their aid, and intrenched them with a bulwark that nothing could move or surmount. If any of our friends are cast down, we would remind them of the present encouraging aspects of our cause,—

I. OUR EXPERIMENT HAS SUCCEEDED WONDERFULLY.

When persons talked of iron roads, and travelling by steam, the thing was laughed at. It was indeed admitted that steam was very powerful, but it was said, that though the wheels might run round, yet they would remain in the same place, and not go forward: but the experiment has been tried, and now we perceive that they not only run round and go forward, but that we can fly with greater safety behind the fire horse, at the rate of eighty miles an hour, than we could formerly when drawn by the best foaming steeds at the rate of ten. In every enterprise experiment is everything, and when once we have succeeded, we have a great fact to tell which silences gainsayers. Teetotalism is now a glorious FACT, attested by myriads of successful examples. No man or woman in any rank or station can say that it will not answer, because we have living proofs to the contrary. Persons of all ranks, trades, professions, climes, sexes, ages and constitutions, have tried the system, and have done so with unspeakable benefit to themselves in every respect. We have laid down a railway to health, prosperity, comfort, intelligence, national greatness, and religion, and we are now travelling by "express" to our destination.

II. WE HAVE FOUND OUT A HOST OF BROTHER AND SISTER TEETOTALERS WHO HAD TRAVELLED THE ROAD BEFORE US, AND WHO GIVE US THE RIGHT HAND OF FELLOWSHIP.

It is not unusual at the close of a meeting to receive a friendly shake of the hand from some hale individual, who says, "I have been a total abstainer for the last thirty years," or perhaps, "for all my days." We were not aware until we began that we had such a host of forerunners in this good work. On examination we also found numbers who never avowed themselves. Multitudes of women never tasted the poison. Doctors also, until we began, often preached total abstinence to their patients. The wives and children of drunkards were generally obliged to be teetotalers, although many of them worked hard, had little food, and not an earthly comfort to keep their spirits up. We found that it was not true that strong drink or wine was a necessary of life, because, in our own country, thousands from caprice, from disease, from medical advice, or from want, abstained. Other nations also greatly aided us by their shoals of Teetotalers. We found that in the torrid, the temperate, and the frigid, zones, there were crowds quite as strong and healthy as we who had never seen beer, wine, nor spirits. Ancient history likewise told some glorious tales quite "ad rem." Scripture especially testified in our favour. Adam was a Teetotaler. Samson, the strongest man; the Nazarites, the most devoted of men; Daniel and his brethren, the healthiest of men—aye, and men of the best principle; John the Baptist, the great Reformer,—were all members of the Total Abstinence Society of Antiquity which Adam commenced in Paradise. Good old Moses and Joshua led nearly two millions of Teetotalers through the wilderness into Canaan. We have no reason to think that Pharaoh was over-bountiful with his wine or strong drink to these poor creatures while they were slaves, and for forty years after they all abstained in the wilderness. Water was their only beverage. We have thus found that our Society, in every age and country, has had multitudes of staunch members. We are, then, a noble brotherhood and sisterhood, as old as Adam.

III. WE HAVE SHOWN THAT THE BIBLE IS NOT A TEXT-BOOK FOR DRUNKARDS OR MODERATE TIPPLERS.

Our opponents began to belabour us most mercilessly with the Scripture. Strong drinks had infatuated them, they had blinded their eyes, and lost their critical acumen to such an extent that they trampled Hebrew, Greek, their mother tongue, facts, and logic in the dust. They said that "good wine" meant wine more than usually poisonous! Such was the learning of the pot-house, the decanter, and the beer-barrel. In fact, nearly all Scriptural expositions in reference to wine smelt of the bottle. To talk of joy arising from "the increase or growth of corn and wine," meant to destroy the healthy properties of the latter substance by converting it into a poison, and then to decrease it by drinking! They could not find a Teetotaler in the Bible, until we showed them the Israelites in the wilderness, Samson, Elijah, the Nazarites, and John the Baptist. They thought that the good unfermented wine allowed at the Jewish feasts, and the stupefying and maddening poison which "stung like a serpent," and "bit like an adder," were the same! To have the heart cheered by looking at the growth of the vine, or drinking its nutritious juice, was to use a vile poison which always induced depression and lowness of spirits! Wine put into new bottles to prevent fermentation was, forsooth, very strong port and sherry, although no such wine could be made in those days! And Timothy's innocent wine, which was truly healing and medicinal, was a vile compound that destroyed the digestive organs! Such was the learning with which we were assailed, which, to render it more affecting, awful, or laughable, was charged with a due proportion of sanctimoniousness. But these spirited and spiritual critics, who owe so much of their learning to the inspirations of alcohol, are becoming rather sobered, and some are admitting the truth of our positions. Signing the pledge does wonders in opening a man's eyes. At any rate we have vindicated the Scripture from the charge of commending and sanctioning the use of poisons!

IV. WE MAY TAKE A LITTLE ENCOURAGEMENT FROM THE FACT THAT OUR OPPONENTS ARE BECOMING VERY SORE AND ANGRY.

The general course of public opinion in England is—1. Banter and ridicule. 2. Anger. 3. The matter is looked at rationally. 4. The principle is pronounced good, and, 5, adopted. We have passed through the first process pretty well. We allowed the men who lose, to laugh, and either did not notice them, or laughed again; and now they have moved on to the second stage. It is amazing how sore and bitter some ministers and churches are becoming. We have seen several Teetotal ministers avoided by their brethren because they would not drink, nor sanction the murderous habit of drinking poisons. We have known pulpits shut against Teetotal ministers; the deacon was a brewer, several of the members were in the wine and spirit trade, and not a few seat-holders kept little pot-houses. The hearers were literally too spiritual to admit such a carnal being as a cold-water man to the rostrum. Some of our friends in the ministry have found out that Teetotalism is morally vicious! and some religious persons declare, on their honour, that it is worse than drunkenness! We have seen a great deal of "anger, malice, and all uncharitableness," vented against these same advocates of true Temperance—in fact, passion has often run so high that reason has been dethroned. But the feeling augurs well. Men that have truth and right on their side may always be calm; while, on the other hand, one of the most mortifying things in the world is the misery of having to advocate a bad cause with bad weapons, and to be daily exposed for the folly. It tells well for Total Abstinence that its opponents have never yet produced a single argument that has had the least foundation to stand upon. If we are rightly informed, one of its late assailants talked a great deal of nonsense, wrote a foolish book, and then ran from his country. No one who reads his tract will wonder at his flight.

V. OUR FRIENDS ARE INCREASING.

Numbers the last year have joined our ranks and signed the pledge. We are very much in want of some good Teetotal statistics for the whole country; it would then be seen that our progress is very great. We have attended many meetings during the past year; and there has been scarcely one in which we have not had an increase of signatures. It is true that some have fallen away, but there is hardly one of these but has borne witness in our favour. Some candidly confess to us that they were better in every respect when they abstained from these poisons. They had better health; laboured with less fatigue; had more of the comforts of life; more peace of mind; and they acknowledge and regret the weakness that led to the abandonment of so valuable a principle. And those who do not thus admit their error, give to the world a practical exemplification of the advantages of Total Abstinence. We can say to all our friends and foes, "Come and see." Look at this man as a drinker, a Teetotaler, and then a drinker again. While he was with the moderation folks and the drunkards, his house was comfortless and homeless, and himself was a bane to himself and society. But when he came to us, his character, his prospects, and his health improved. We made him a husband, a father, a valuable citizen, and he was not "far from the kingdom of God;" but our opponents persuaded him to drink, and now he is good neither for time nor eternity. These are facts that speak, and make us many friends. It is seen that we are doing good where all other agencies fail, and though we do not convert men, yet we put them in the way of being converted. Never had we more friends or fewer foes than now.

VI. THE DOCTORS ARE COMING ROUND TO US.

There are numbers of medical men who did not sign the document put forth by the Temperance Society who nevertheless acknowledge that we are right, and, as far as health is concerned, are their greatest enemies. It is allowed that an overwhelming host of moderate people are sickly or diseased, or laid up, or dying or dead, through what is termed by some the temperate use of these liquors. We are certain that the deaths from moderation greatly out-number those from drunkenness, and our doctors are fully aware of this fact. How can a man be healthy if his digestive organs are out of order. Without digestion the body cannot be sustained. And then nothing so soon produces a diseased brain and an irritable and deranged mind as a distempered stomach. Paralysis, palsy, apoplexy, and insanity are of frequent occurrence from the use of these stimulants. The nerves are shaken; the blood so corrupt that it cannot heal a wound or nourish the frame; the liver unfitted for its functions, the lungs and kidneys for their work; and as a consequence, people die before their time. Our medical men are fully aware of these facts. To deny them would be to impeach their knowledge of physiology and pathology. Some, it is true, stand by the old stimulating process and kill more than they cure; but these assassins by pill, potion, and strong drink, are decreasing very fast, and a new order of men is coming on the stage who understand more of chemistry, nutrition, and nosology, and many of these allow that we are right; and though they drink to gratify themselves or their patients, yet they dare not condemn our principles. The future historian will have to record that among the thousand benefits which Teetotalism conferred on the world, it was not one of the least that it induced the medical profession to reconsider their practice, and conform to the dictates of science in their treatment of disease.

VII. OUR MEMBERS ARE BECOMING DAILY MORE AND MORE CONFIRMED IN OUR PRINCIPLES.

The first week is often the most trying time in the history of a Teetotaler, especially if he has been in the habit of drinking rather freely or regularly; but the longer he abstains, the more his appetite decreases. Perhaps even for the first year the look was fascinating, and the smell of the liquor tempting; but after a while the odour becomes offensive, and thus every year finds him stronger and stronger. We may congratulate ourselves that we have now a noble army of veterans in our cause who have borne the burden and heat of the day. Some have abstained for seven years, some for ten, and some for sixteen. They have been assailed from every quarter. The first and greatest foe they had to conquer was their own appetite. Then they had to endure the temptations, to bear the taunts, and, in some cases, to suffer the persecutions, of friends and foes. Among others, the doctors did all they could to work on their fears, and draw them from their steadfastness. But they have overcome all, and are at present the bulwarks of true temperance. We may therefore glory in these as a tried body of Teetotalers whom nothing has been able to move, and to whom the world will owe an unspeakable debt of gratitude. Could we muster these veterans on some Teetotal Waterloo, we should present such an army as the sun has never before shone upon, and one which is destined not to devastate the earth, but to be a messenger of mercy to the people of every clime. For we feel assured that total abstinence, like the gospel, and as an handmaid to Christianity, will eventually visit and bless every human being.

Our review of the past, encourages our hopes for the future, and animates us with the determination to proceed in our holy crusade against strong drink, as the enemy of GOD, and one of the worst foes of man.

TEETOTALISM AND THE "SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION."

It is now more than twelve months since a number of important statistics were collected, proving that a large majority of the youthful criminals confined in various jails in the country had been—some of them for a considerable time—scholars in Sunday-schools, and that most of these had been led into crime through our national drinking customs. These statistics were carefully forwarded to the officers and principal members of the Sunday-school Union, and to others—superintendents, teachers, and patrons of Sabbath-schools,—with a respectful request that they would seriously consider the subject, and inquire whether the importance of strict sobriety had been sufficiently enforced upon the children. How were these communications received? So far as the Committee of the Sunday-school Union are concerned, the motives of the gentlemen who published the statistics were impugned, and they were even accused of insinuating that "the only result of the teachers' labours had been to train up the profligate, the drunkard, and the thief;" the correctness of the statistics was disputed; the fairness of the inferences drawn from them was denied; and all consideration of the Temperance question was refused, on the ground that "the Sunday-school Union was formed for no such purpose."

The subject was, however, forced upon their attention by some statements made by the Rev. Professor Finney in a sermon addressed to members of the North London Auxiliary to the Union, and by some letters which appeared in the British Banner; and, still more immediately and directly, by the publication of the pamphlet entitled "Voices from Prisons and Penitentiaries; respectfully addressed to the Patrons and Teachers of Sabbath-schools." And, at length, after ruminating upon the subject for rather more than twelve months, some notice of it is taken in the "Union Magazine for Sunday-school Teachers," for the month of February, under the head "Review of Books." The article is little more than a transcript of the letter by Mr. WATSON, the Secretary of the Union, which appeared a short time since in the British Banner, and also in the "Voices from Prisons;" with some additional mis-statements and misconceptions, and with anything but a frank acknowledgment of the truth of the averments, and a solemn determination to act better for the future. Upon this brief article we make a few remarks, though the case has already been fully met in the pamphlet on which it animadverts. Let us, first, state that a copy of the "Voices from Prisons" was sent to every officer and member of the Sunday-school Union, immediately on its publication; that copies have been forwarded also to superintendents and teachers in various parts of the Metropolis and the kingdom; and that from Bristol alone three thousand five hundred copies have been circulated. So that not only have the truthful "Voices" been heard throughout the kingdom, and the "lame and impotent conclusions" of the officers of the Union listened to, but this most important proposition has been placed before many thousands,—"That no rational hope can be entertained of the extension and permanent success of Sabbath schools, or of a revival of the work of GOD in Christian churches, TILL THAT ATTENTION IS GIVEN TO THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION WHICH ITS IMPORTANCE DEMANDS." That this proposition is treated with contempt by the officers and organs of the Sunday-school Union, we have proof in the review before us.

The reviewer styles the statements "contained in Mr. Finney's sermon, and repeated in the pamphlet," an "unfounded attack on the Sunday-school Union." We deny that the statements are an "attack" upon the Union, vulnerable though its conductors have made it. Affectionate caution, and earnest remonstrances, are founded upon the statements; but the preacher of the sermon, and the writer of the pamphlet, so far from attacking the Union, speak of it with high respect, and express fervent wishes for its permanence and efficiency. But, even if it were an "attack," how can it be said to be "unfounded," when the foundation of it was before the preacher and the writer at the very moment it was made? And what is the statement which the reviewer calls an "attack?" It is, "that the Sunday-school Union does not favour the Temperance Movement; that some of its most influential members are engaged in the traffic!" And are not these FACTS? Curiously enough, the reviewer says, "there is not any foundation for the statement that the Sunday-school Union does not favour the so-called Temperance Movement." And in the very next sentence he says: "This body has no feeling towards it, either of favour or disfavour!" Which of the two sentences contains the truth? And, if the latter, what comes of the charge against the sermon and the Voices? And, "to make assurance doubly sure," and to fix and fasten the charge upon itself, the reviewer proceeds to justify the conduct of the Union, on the ground that the advocacy of temperance is "a matter which is beyond their sphere," and that "they are combined for a specific object." Why we always supposed that the "specific object" of Sunday-school training was to teach children to "live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world;" and if so, how can they speak of the inculcation of temperance as "a matter which lies beyond their sphere"—as "a matter which does not properly belong to them"—as a matter "towards which the body has no feeling either of favour or disfavour." Why this is "the very head and front" of the charge we prefer against them. We say that the inculcation of strict sobriety is a matter which does "properly belong to them," as much so as the inculcation of righteousness and godliness; that it ought to be "within their sphere," and that to say that they feel towards it "neither favour nor disfavour" is just to expose themselves to the curse pronounced on Meroz. But the reason of this neutrality or opposition is explained:—"We object at the outset to the use of the word 'temperance' by those who mean by it 'total abstinence.' We give no opinion as to the propriety or otherwise of such total abstinence; but, whether right or wrong, it is a very widely different thing from temperance, which assumes a partial use of the thing in respect to which it is exercised. It is a great hindrance to correct reasoning to describe by the same term things which so materially differ." So the conductors and patrons of the Old Temperance, or Moderation, Society thought and preached; with crowned heads, nobles, bishops, clergy, magistrates, naval and military officers, &c. &c., at its head, and thousands and thousands of pounds at its disposal; and after teaching the fallacious doctrine for about seventeen years, they "brought their noble to ninenpence, and their ninenpence to nothing," till they are and their remembrance has almost ceased from the land! Profound theologians these! well worthy to be entrusted with the religious education of our rising youth! And yet, can the reviewer tell us in what respects total abstinence and temperance "so materially differ?" or in what respects total abstinence from intoxicating drink is "a very widely different thing from temperance?" Surely these sentences must have been written under the inspiration of some fluid more potent than that obtained from springs and fountains! "Temperance assumes a partial use of the thing in respect to which it is exercised." Does it? Do the teachers of the Sunday-school Union so teach in reference to other virtues? We think that honesty consists in total abstinence from fraud and theft; that righteousness and godliness require total abstinence from unrighteousness and ungodliness; and that temperance consists in total abstinence from all the causes and practices of intemperance; and we could as soon allow a man to call himself righteous, honest, or godly, while indulging in "a partial use"—a partial practice of theft, injustice, and ungodliness, as we could allow him to call himself a temperate man while he makes even "a partial use" of the drunkard's drink. "Temperance" is one of the graces of the Holy Spirit—one of those virtues Christians are earnestly exhorted to "add to their faith;" and we can as easily admit of a partial use or cultivation of "courage, knowledge, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and charity," as a partial cultivation or exercise of "temperance." It is this doctrine, that "temperance assumes a partial use" of strong drink, that is daily swelling the ranks of drunkards—that is daily rendering the exertions of Sabbath-school teachers of comparatively small avail. It is this fatal allowance of the partial use of an insidious and destructive poison, which every now and then drags down Sunday-school scholars, teachers, superintendents, deacons, leaders, ministers, and church-members, from their high eminence, and plunges them, degraded and disgraced, into the abyss of drunkenness and ruin. We know that human nature is fallible, and that "Old Adam often proves too strong for Young Melancthon;" but in proportion to the weakness of human nature, and the force of those temptations to the use of strong drink, which the drinking customs of the country present, should be the clearness and frequency of those teachings which may strengthen the youth, and weaken the force of the temptations to which he is sure to be exposed. Let the Committee of the Union, and the teachers of Sabbath-schools adopt and inculcate the Scriptural view of the subject, and they may depend upon it that they will be much less frequently assailed by "Voices from prisons and penitentiaries." Such places will be more thinly tenanted, at least by their pupils, while their schools and the Churches of CHRIST will receive numerous additions.

"Without a local habitation or a name,"

But having thus accounted for and defended the hostility of the Union to the Temperance Movement, the reviewer proceeds to quarrel with another statement made by Mr. Finney, namely, "That some of the most influential members of the Union are engaged in the traffic." He says: "From the positive manner in which this assertion was made by Mr. Finney, no one would be prepared for the statement, that not one of the Officers or Committee of the Sunday-school Union is engaged in the traffic referred to." Here is something bordering closely upon equivocation. If the reviewer means simply, that no member of the Committee of the Union—the Committee meeting from time to time in Paternoster-row—is engaged in the traffic, then we say that neither we nor Mr. Finney asserted that there was; but if he means to deny that not any members of the Union, not any superintendent, or any teacher of a Sabbath-school in connexion with the Union, has anything to do with the traffic, then we have no hesitation in giving him the flat contradiction. With him we believe "that Mr. Finney meant just what he said," and that Dr. Campbell's correspondent in the British Banner meant just what he said, and that the real truth is, as stated in the "Voices from Prisons," that this is the secret of the dislike manifested by hundreds of Sabbath-school teachers and superintendents to the Temperance cause, and "the reason why Sunday-schools furnish the ranks of the drunkard with their quota of victims."

"But," says the reviewer, "what was the name of the man which Mr. Finney said he had right before him, and who furnished him with the statistics he then quoted? We should then be able to judge whether he, too, was so ignorant of the nature of the constitution of the Union." Why, we thought everybody concerned in this question knew by whom those statistics were collected and arranged. If the reviewer had read the "Voices" with any attention, he would not have found it necessary to call out for "the name of the man." The gentleman who supplied those statistics knows well the constitution of the Union, and its secret as well as its more public movements; and we are quite sure that he will unite with us in the fervent wish, that the "reviewer" and his informant will henceforth pay a more reverent regard to the divine command, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour."

One word as to another point. The reviewer complains that though some months ago certain questions were put to Mr. Backhouse, of York, up to the present time no reply has been received to the communication. This has been sufficiently explained in the "Voices from Prisons." The fact is, that the statistics did not emanate from the York Temperance Society, but from Mr. T. B. Smithies, of London; the York Society merely sent a copy to the Committee of the Union in the hope that it might induce them to consider seriously the Temperance question, and not with the intention of raising quibbles, or of having questions framed which the framers must know could not, in the very nature of things, be answered. As to copies of the letters addressed by Mr. Smithies to the keepers or chaplains of prisons and penitentiaries, they were furnished with the statistics, and were reprinted in the "Voices." And as to the names of the prisoners, and of the schools in which they were taught, how is it possible they can be obtained, when the criminals, after suffering imprisonment for limited periods, are at large all over the country, and when many circumstances might prevent them from giving real names, even if they could be again collected? But the Sunday-school Union do not need—we question if they really desire—any such demonstration. It is a fact they cannot deny, that the drinking customs of this country interfere most mischievously with Sabbath-school operations; and we again assure them, that till they determine seriously to consider the subject, and to act as it becomes true Christian philanthropists, it will not relieve them from their responsibility to plead that they are "combined for a special object"—that "this matter does not belong to them,"—and that the Temperance Movement is "a matter which lies beyond their sphere."

The reviewer proposes to return to the subject. What he has further to say we shall hear, we suppose, anon. In the meantime we shall continue to utter our "Voices," the third edition of which is just published.

DRUNKENNESS AT ELECTIONS.

THE disgraceful scenes of drunkenness and riot which have recently been witnessed at borough elections for members of Parliament, have been the subject of marked animadversion in the public prints, in private circles, and in the House of Commons. The report of what took place at the election of one of the present members for Stockport is fresh in our recollection; but that "beer-barrel" affair has been greatly outdone at St. Alban's, and still more recently at Falkirk. The scenes transacted at these places—especially the latter—can only be regarded with undisguised loathing. What will the people think of a House of Commons, some of the members of which are elected under such frightful circumstances? The Standard of Freedom of Saturday last calls upon Teetotalers in the following terms:—

"The advocates of entire abstinence from intoxicating liquors do well to hold their public meetings, and to urge the adoption of their practice upon those who attend their tea-parties and their assemblings on gala-days; but unless they act more on the aggressive than they have hitherto done, the giant foe will obtain the mastery. How is it that they can suffer such disgraceful scenes as have occurred within the last three or four weeks, in connection with borough elections, to pass without distinct and emphatic notice? Why have they not called special meetings, and adopted petitions to the House of Commons to institute immediate inquiries into the scenes recently enacted at St. Alban's, and more especially at Falkirk? In reference to the latter burghs, the local papers state that the majority of the public-houses were thrown open—that whiskey was as cheap as ditch water—that colliers and miners flocked to the attraction in immense numbers and got drunk by the hundred—that fights and brawls ensued—that drunkards, male and female, were lying in all directions, exposed to the most fearful danger—that a large portion of the mob became so furious and excited that they repulsed the police, chased them bleeding and bruised off the street, smashing windows, and committing outrages so fearful that the aid of the military was obliged to be resorted to. In short, as Mr. Cobden remarked in the House on Thursday night, 'more violence, more drunkenness, more bloodshed, and more mortal combats, had taken place in that insignificant burgh than had occurred in the whole of France during a general election among six million voters.' It was the opinion of that hon. gentleman that such burghs should be utterly extirpated from our electoral system. Into that question we do not now enter; but we do call loudly upon the friends and promoters of Temperance to unite in petitions to the House of Commons, praying that inquiries into these proceedings be immediately instituted, and that such measures be taken as shall bring the abettors of this drinking system to condign punishment, and prevent the repetition of such disgraceful occurrences for the future."

The Watchman newspaper, the organ of the Wesleyan Conference, has the following powerful comments:—

"At the election for the Falkirk burghs, whiskey has been not less diligently applied than ale was at St. Alban's, and with equal power for the desecration of the general morals. Men and women, drunk and dirty, raging, reeling, quarrelling, and tumbling—some stretched helpless on the street—some, outside the town, lying in the ditches—some with their heads in the hedges, some with their feet—this, with shouts, mobs, and now and then window-breaking, seems to be our staple garnish for an election. It is humiliating in the extreme to find such scenes enacted amongst us on any pretence. It is more humiliating still that all this public mischief is wrought through means of proceedings connected with the public service. And our shame grows intolerable when we hear the comments of our neighbours. There are the French, who lay little claim to elevated morality, but are highly tender on matters of decency. They point to such scenes as those of St. Alban's and Falkirk with undisguised loathing. They can bring to the poll every adult male; they can return a whole house of Assembly, or can elect a President of the Republic, men of all ranks voting by the million, and throughout the vast sweep of their territory no eye will be offended with one scene of indecency, of drunkenness, or riot. When that unequalled elective struggle, which placed Bonaparte where he is, took place, they said boastingly: 'And all these millions voted, without as much drunkenness, confusion, or violence as would take place at an English election for a single burgh.' Would that French boasting could always find such legitimate ground. It is a question which all statesmen, all ministers of religion, all members of Parliament, and all good citizens should carefully study. How is it that a far more excitable people than the English conduct elections with great propriety, and without detriment to morals, while, with us, an election is a pest to the town in which it occurs? Lord Carlisle, in his lecture on America, describes an election in that country as a very uninteresting affair. Would that we could present a quiet air and an orderly street to the eye of a stranger, in our British towns, on the most exciting day of the year. Our statesmen must feel this stain a sore abatement of the pride of their position. Our representatives must surely feel some discomfort in the thought that many of them have waded into the senate through rivers of ale or whiskey, ay, and in some cases through those rivers streaked with blood. Ministers of religion must feel that it is a terrible calamity to a town, to be periodically visited with a ceremonial, during which the reckless think it praiseworthy to indulge, and the reputable think it patriotic to tempt. A remedy must be sought. We do hope that some one, suitably impressed with the national plague and shame to which we are now subjected, will present us with a plan, by which the day of an English election, instead of being a struggle to debauch the largest possible number of voters, shall be a sober test of the wishes and convictions of the electing body."

Let the Watchman unite with us to inculcate the practice of abstinence from "whiskey," "ale," and all other intoxicating drinks, and such disgraceful exhibitions will no longer offend "strangers," "statesmen," "representatives," or "Ministers of religion," either in Falkirk, St. Alban's, or Stockport.

THE SHAPCOTT FAMILY.

This far-famed family have recently visited our town, and given two concerts at the New Hall, London-street. The family consists of fifteen children. Their scholastic advantages in youth were very limited, and their leisure hours from business have been devoted to the cultivation of music, under the direction of their father, the result of which has been most successful, for as performers on the Sax-horn they are very clever, and their concerts in all parts of this and other counties have been of such a character as to acquire for them a fame equal, if not superior, to many who have been conspicuous in the musical world. The attendance on the first evening was large, and comprised many highly respectable families, who were delighted with the entertainment afforded them. On the second evening they again received a fair amount of patronage. The Shapcott family have for years adopted the principle of total abstinence from alcoholic beverages, and Mr. Shapcott takes advantage of the intervals to address the company, and advocate the cause of Teetotalism.—Reading Mercury.

THE TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATIONS IN EXETER-HALL.

THE meetings which have been held during the present series have evidently exerted a very salutary influence, not only upon the Metropolitan Societies, but upon societies in various parts of the kingdom. The feelings which animated the early Temperance Reformers, and which there was reason to fear had become almost dormant, have been rekindled, while new societies and new instrumentalities have been called into operation. The PUBLIC PRESS has been employed, in reference to those meetings, to an unexampled extent; the importance of the Temperance Movement has been acknowledged on all hands, and many eminent patriots and philanthropists of the day—as will be seen from our list of subscribers—have cheerfully lent their pecuniary aid, from a conviction that Teetotalism is a most important pioneer to social progress. But much remains to be done.

The meeting held in Exeter-hall on the 3rd ult. was one of peculiar interest, and the report of it, which will be found in another part of this number, will, we think, be read with pleasure and profit. The next meeting is to take place on the evening of Monday, March 3, when G. W. ALEXANDER, Esq., whose exertions to promote Universal Freedom, Peace, and Temperance, have secured for him the esteem of all genuine philanthropists, will preside; and the Rev. BENJAMIN PARSONS, THOMAS BEGGS, Esq., Rev. R. GRAY MASON, and Mr. D. G. PAINE, will deliver addresses on the following subjects:—

“The universal adoption of the practice of entire abstinence greatly promotive of the physical, intellectual, social and moral prosperity of the community.”

“The chief hindrances to the progress of the Temperance reformation.”

“The encouragements to persevering exertion.”

Other meetings are to succeed this; and the Committee have still before them the importance of making some memorable demonstrations in the Metropolis during the Great Industrial Exhibition. The precise character of those demonstrations has not yet been determined; much will depend upon the amount of the funds entrusted to the Committee, and upon circumstances which may take place between the present time and the months of June or July, when it is supposed the great influx of visitors, both from various parts of the United Kingdom and from abroad, will take place. It is certain that these “demonstrations,” in order to be “memorable,” must be of a character worthy the Metropolis of the world, and worthy the great and noble Temperance cause. Hence the necessity of UNITED DELIBERATIONS and UNITED LIBERABILITY.

Some gentlemen have announced their intention to hold a Conference in the Lower-hall, Exeter-hall, on the evening of Friday, March 7th, at seven o'clock, “for the purpose of receiving suggestions as to the kind of demonstration in favour of the Temperance principle that may be at once desirable and practicable.” To this meeting it is stated, in the notice we have received, “Members of all societies in London will be admitted, on presenting a certificate of membership from their respective secretaries.”

The COMMITTEE will gladly receive any communication upon this subject, and also any contributions towards carrying out the object proposed, as well as for the completion of the series of meetings in Exeter-hall.

LODGINGS FOR TEETOTAL ARTISANS AND OTHERS DURING THE INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION IN HYDE-PARK.

On Monday evening, February 17, a special meeting was held in the Fitzroy Temperance Hall, Little Portland-street, for the purpose of receiving from JOHN CASSELL, Esq., some particulars as to a plan which he had projected for the Registration of Houses in the Metropolis, in which lodging, board, &c., might be provided for the accommodation of visitors to the Great Exhibition, with an especial reference to Teetotalers. A number of the secretaries and most active members of various Metropolitan societies attended, and, after taking tea, Mr. W. SPRIGGS was called to the chair. The business of the evening having been briefly introduced,

Mr. JOHN CASSELL said that he was anxious to promote a registration of houses suitable for the accommodation of visitors to the coming Exhibition, because he felt assured that it would contribute greatly to the comfort of the working classes generally, though, on the present occasion, his reference would be chiefly to Teetotalers. Her Majesty's Commissioners had intended to undertake such a registration, but found themselves unable to carry it out. No doubt there would be a mighty influx of visitors to the Metropolis. He believed, however, that there would be ample accommodation for all, if householders and others were but furnished with facilities for making it known. Persons in what were called respectable circumstances, and many of the middle classes, would go at once to boarding-houses, taverns, and similar establishments, but the working classes would be left to do pretty much as they could. There was reason to fear that many of the flaming professions made to benefit them would prove comparatively vain. The railway companies, for instance, professed to do much, but the rates they had hitherto named for the transmission of persons to London, were higher than those usually charged for excursion trains. He thought, too, that Her Majesty's Commissioners had not duly considered the resources of the working classes, or they would not require each individual to pay one shilling for every visit; he (Mr. Cassell) thought persons of that class ought to have three or four admissions for one payment. As to accommodation for lodgings, however, he had thought it well to propose a plan for a general registration. He had at first proposed to appoint a committee, and several members of Parliament had expressed their willingness to act in that capacity; but on consideration, finding that it would involve pecuniary responsibility, and partake of the character of a commercial speculation, he had resolved to take the whole responsibility upon himself, accepting the kind offer of the gentlemen to whom he had referred as PATRONS. For the accomplishment of his plan he proposed to have 100,000 forms delivered to as many householders in the Metropolis and its immediate vicinity. In order to secure comfort to persons of various habits, he proposed to divide the registration into three classes:—1st, general, for persons irrespective of any peculiarity; 2nd, for persons of religious habits; and 3rd, for Teetotalers, that they might not be subjected to annoyance from persons returning at all hours in the night from taverns, saloons, &c. He had recently attended a conference of Teetotalers at Leicester, and from what he heard there, as well as from other sources, he believed that 100,000 Teetotalers might be expected to visit London, and perhaps in one week. Surely if any class of mechanics could afford to visit London on such an occasion, it was Teetotalers, who saved money by turning their backs upon public houses, and abandoning the drinking customs of the country. He was sure that the Teetotalers of the Metropolis would do all they could to make their brethren and sisters from the provinces comfortable, and for that purpose he was anxious to have a distinct registry of the houses of such Teetotalers as could provide accommodation.

The more minute details of Mr. Cassell's plan were then explained; and, after some interesting conversation, the following resolution was proposed by Mr. W. TWEEDIE, seconded by Mr. CARRAGAN, and carried unanimously:—

"That the members of this meeting having heard from Mr. Cassell the plan of Registration of Lodgings for Teetotalers who may visit the Metropolis during the Exhibition of 1851, approve of the same, and resolve to exert themselves in their respective localities to give it due effect."

Mr. CASSELL having introduced to the meeting ALEXANDER REDGRAVE, Esq., one of the Secretaries to the Executive Committee for conducting the affairs of the Exhibition, who had kindly favoured the meeting with his presence, the whole company united in tokens of respect, which Mr. Redgrave acknowledged in courteous terms, expressing the pleasure he felt in the proposed arrangements, and his belief that the object at which Mr. Cassell aimed would be accomplished.

The particulars of the Plan of Registration will be gathered from the advertisement in another column. We believe that the Secretaries of Teetotal Societies in the Metropolis will shortly be furnished with the requisite forms, which they will communicate to the members at the public meetings, and urge their being filled up and returned to the office with as little delay as possible.

ALLEGED LIBELS.

SOME months ago, a new Independent place of worship, Horbury Chapel, Kensington, was opened with the usual ceremonies. A large party, consisting of ministers and others, dined together under a tent on some ground in the vicinity. Mr. E. Tisdall, a zealous, but not over discreet, Teetotaler, fearing a repetition of drinking customs such as he had observed on similar occasions, circulated handbills, urging those assembled to abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors. His advice and cautions being disregarded, Mr. Tisdall instituted a somewhat strict inquiry, and, finding that not only was wine, &c., plentifully used at the dinner, accompanied by somewhat humorous remarks upon his "cautions," but that, after the ministers and company had retired, the servants and attendants made themselves merry with the remnants of drink left in the decanters and barrels, he caused some large coloured drawings to be executed and exhibited, and some descriptive pamphlets and handbills to be circulated, with woodcuts engraved from the above-named drawings: on these were printed, in capitals, "Disgraceful scenes (inside and out) at the opening dinner of Horbury Chapel, Kensington. Dedicated, without permission, to the following ministers of religion, who, by their presence, sanctioned, encouraged, and perpetuated the use of that which, from its nature, must produce ruin of character, constitution, and soul." Then followed the names of several eminent ministers, including Drs. Harris, Morrison, Campbell, &c. The juxtaposition of the engravings and these names led ordinary spectators or readers to conclude that those rev. gentlemen were the persons intended to be represented as having committed the excesses of which complaint was made. It seems that these large coloured drawings have been exhibited in many places where they were likely to be noticed by the friends of the ministers named; and also along the most crowded thoroughfares of the Metropolis. Many persons, Teetotalers, personal friends of Mr. Tisdall, and others also, remonstrated with him on the injustice and impolicy of the course pursued by him in this matter; and resolutions were passed in committees condemnatory of his conduct, and urging him to withdraw the offensive libels. He was proof against all such entreaties and remonstrances, and the result has, to our knowledge, been injurious to the Temperance Movement, of which, notwithstanding, we believe him to be the sincere and generous friend. At length, however, the strong arm of the law has interposed to put down the nuisance. Mr. Tisdall's agent in the matter was brought before the magistrate at Bow-street, Mr. Henry; and subsequently Mr. Tisdall himself as the principal; two cases of obstruction to the thoroughfares were fully proved; Mr. Tisdall was fined £2 for each offence, with costs; £4 4s. was immediately paid, and the offensive paintings were impounded, to be forthcoming as evidence, should the aggrieved parties judge it proper to institute proceedings for the libel. We trust sincerely that no more such exhibitions will be made.

On this subject the Standard of Freedom, of February 22, remarks as follows:—

“ Our police reports contain the records of a case, the particulars of which we greatly regret. We take so deep an interest in the progress of the Temperance Reformation, as one destined to work out perhaps the most important social revolution of modern times, that we cannot look with indifference on anything calculated to lessen its power and impair its efficiency. Such we take to be the necessary fruits of Mr. Tisdall's mistaken and distempered zeal. No righteous cause need enlist in its advocacy any but the fairest and most honourable means: and the errors committed by its friends, whose earnestness carries them beyond the bounds of discretion, whilst defensible on no principle of propriety or fairness, do inevitable damage to the interests they were meant to serve. The plain inference to be drawn from the placards borne by Mr. Tisdall's agents was, that the Christian ministers, whose names were printed, were directly implicated in scenes of licentious dissipation. We need not say that such an inference was utterly unfounded. Mr. Tisdall knew it to be so; and the obvious insinuations to which he gave currency, were as unmanly as they were unjust. We believe, indeed, that all who participate in the drinking usages of society, however moderately, do help to perpetuate the evil system out of which the usages of drunkenness grow; but we cannot but feel, that to represent Christian men who do not yet see as we do, as partakers in Bacchanalian orgies, is not a fair way of putting that great truth. We deem it our duty, on behalf of the Temperance cause, to repudiate the proceedings we refer to, whilst deprecating, as earnestly as Mr. Tisdall himself could do, the sanction which religious ministers and professors give to the use of intoxicating drinks.”

INTENDING EMIGRANTS WARNED.

The following extract from the letter of a recent emigrant to South Australia, may be useful:—

“ We left Plymouth on the 24th of October, 1849, in the ship Asia, with 128 passengers, sent out by Messrs. Hall, Brothers, London, and arrived, after a voyage of 118 days. She was well fitted up, the provisions excellent and plentiful; and but for one circumstance, we should have had a comfortable and happy voyage. After we had set sail a few days, I found, what till then I was entirely ignorant of, that we had on board a large quantity of ale, porter, rum, gin, brandy, and wine, which was sold to the passengers in unlimited quantities. The consequence was, that some of the people got drunk and created a deal of disturbance and mischief, both by night and by day. I write this, dear sir, hoping that when you advocate total abstinence, you will not forget to warn those who are disposed to emigrate, against coming out with those vessels which carry intoxicating drinks. There is nothing in the world would induce me to sail in such a ship again.”

It will appear from this extract that the writer is a serious and sensible man, and only complains of what all sober people must feel to have been a just cause of complaint. It may do good in more ways than one, to make the above public.—I am, &c.,

R. TABRAHAM.

Bury St. Edmunds, February, 1851.

A WRETCHED CASE.—A few months ago an unhappy man, in a state of intoxication, was picked up in one of the greatest thoroughfares in London. His body was so emaciated by want and disease, that it was found necessary to convey him to one of the hospitals, when “ the last enemy” soon claimed him for his own. That man once rode in his carriage; revelled in luxury; and excited general observation by the splendour of his appearance. He became intemperate, prodigal, impoverished, ruined. Oh! the evils of strong drink.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION IN EXETER HALL.

On Monday evening, Feb. 3, the third meeting of the series of temperance demonstrations in Exeter-hall took place. The audience was large and respectable, and the proceedings of the evening appeared to excite more than usual interest. At seven o'clock the chair was taken by JAMES SILK BUCKINGHAM, Esq., who, together with several ministers and gentlemen who entered the hall with him, was warmly greeted.

The CHAIRMAN said that the friends of temperance had met that evening for the purpose of promulgating their beneficial principles, in the hope that what was said might reach the hearts, not only of those present, but of multitudes who might see the report of what was advanced, so that beneficial results might follow. They were assembled at an eventful period. Soon crowds would come from all quarters of the globe, peacefully and as brethren, to exhibit various productions of art and industry, and to rival each other, not in arms, but in ingenuity, peace, and good will (hear). Why, on such an occasion, should not Temperance also assert its claims? (cheers.) The moment was auspicious; the public were engaged in many social and moral improvements, and in those movements the friends of temperance wished to take their part (hear). On the morrow, too, the Great Council of the Nation was to meet, and thousands of hearts beat with anxious hope as to what might be the measures then proposed, together with their results. Two topics would be almost sure to be brought forward—one the recent Popish Aggression, as it was termed, about which such strong feelings had been manifested; and the other the reduction of taxation, each party putting in their claim to such reduction according to their varying views and circumstances. He (the chairman) ventured to assert, however, that the claims of the Temperance Movement were far more important than either of those measures, or than both of them put together (hear). He held both the others to be important; but when he compared the results of the two former as to their influence on the bodies and souls of men and women, with the results of the latter, he regarded the former as but dust upon the scale (hear). The converts, or perverts, to Popery were but as a drop of the ocean, compared with the numbers who fell into the great gulph of intemperance, and were slain by the use of strong drink (hear). The Rev. W. Jay, of Bath, had stated that he knew of seven ministers of religion who in a very short space of time had been degraded through the use of strong drink. What comparison was there between entertaining unsound opinions on some religious points, and falling into the abyss of intemperance? Would that they (the friends of temperance) could get up a feeling against the usurpation of the great King Alcohol, as strong as has been excited against the Pope of Rome! (hear, hear.) King Alcohol had distillers for his cardinals, brewers for his bishops, and gin-sellers and publicans for his priests (hear). And then as to taxes. It was natural that those who felt should complain; but if all the grievances were put together,—the window tax, the taxes on paper and advertisements, on soap, on tea,—what would they all amount to compared with the seventy or one hundred millions sterling which the people of this country imposed annually upon themselves (hear). The light of a single taper did not differ more from the brilliancy of the noonday-sun than did the weight of national taxation from the sum spent in gin, beer, and tobacco, such a large proportion of which, as Mr. Porter had shown in his recent paper, was spent by the working classes (hear). The topics to be brought forward on the morrow, therefore, would be as nothing compared with the changing the customs of the people, and making them, instead of a drunken, a temperate nation (cheers). Looking at the present aspect of society, and considering what was done in various towns, one might be almost disposed to sit down in despair, the state of things appeared so bad, and so many fell day by day through the influence of absurd and wicked customs. Yet, when he looked back to times when things were far worse, he could not indulge in despair. It had been ascertained that, whereas, for the fifteen years previous to the commencement of the temperance reformation, crime had increased fifty per cent.

beyond the increase of the population, for the fifteen years subsequent to that period, it had increased but nineteen per cent. (hear.) Let them not rest till they had wiped away the remaining nineteen, and even run up a good score on the other side (hear). Never was there a time when there was greater activity on the part of the press. Not only had they numerous excellent temperance publications, but many general papers took up the question also. The cause which was formerly tabooed was now noticed in friendly terms; good reports of the temperance meetings appeared in the Times, the Chronicle, the Herald, and other daily papers, as well as in the STANDARD OF FREEDOM, the British Banner, the Nonconformist, and other weekly papers (cheers). In conclusion, the chairman said that preparations were making for large gatherings of teetotalers in the Metropolis in the months of June or July next, which would demonstrate to foreigners that England was by no means so drunken a nation as they had been led to suppose (cheers).

The Rev. THOMAS SPENCER, A.M., proceeded to address the audience on "The Drinking Customs of Great Britain the cause of vast physical, social, and moral evils, and Total Abstinence an effectual cure." If it were true, he said, that the drinking of strong drink was the cause of drunkenness, then ceasing to drink it must be the cure. It was plainly stated in "Paley's Moral Philosophy"—a book which was read at Cambridge, though gentlemen seemed to forget all about it when they left that place—Paley said, that it was best for a man to have a rule for abstinence, and that the more strict the rule, the more strict was likely to be the practice, and the less likely was he to yield to temptation. When a teetotaler was asked to drink, he could at once say, "No; I have a rule against it." But though Paley had thus taught, society still went on, galloping away to intemperance and ruin (hear). As he (Mr. Spencer) was travelling by coach lately, the horses took fright, and the driver and others pulled the reins in with all their power; still the horses went on. At last the guard called out, "Let down the drag." The drag was let down, it caught hold, and in a little time the speed of the horses was checked, and the carriage proceeded in safety. If the Government, when they saw the nation going furiously wrong, had taken the alarm, and had said to all persons, "Let down the drag!" the nation certainly would not have run to such riot (hear). Numerous physical evils resulted from the drinking customs of the country. Each individual could speak of what he himself, or his friends or neighbours had suffered. Nervous disorders, dyspepsia, gout, rheumatism, dropsy, and a long catalogue of diseases might be traced to that source. A perfect remedy was at hand—namely, total abstinence (hear). Medical men—such as Drs. Carpenter, Forbes, and others—had declared that persons could do without strong drink; and water was recommended, even for long journeys and hard endurances (hear). Destitution and poverty were owing to the same practices. Men who were on their way to beggary and the workhouse might, if they would but turn round, find themselves on the way to competence and happiness (cheers). If poor women and children were asked as to the cause of their poverty and sorrow, it would be traced to the self-indulgence of a man who spent his money in a place to which he would not take his wife and children. Why, if a man who drank two pints of beer a day would but lay by the money instead of so spending it, by the time he was fifty he would be worth £300; and, simply by denying himself that unnecessary indulgence, he might buy a piece of land, put a nice cottage upon it, have it comfortably furnished, and get a vote for a member of Parliament into the bargain (cheers). The usual charity of the day was to provide for poverty; the plan of teetotalers was to prevent it; not to be always pumping, pumping, but to stop the leak; and every other plan would prove a delusion (hear). Workhouses were provided, but why not act on the principle of rendering it unnecessary to go into them? (hear.) So if jails and lunatic asylums were visited, it would be found that a very large proportion of crimes and of madness resulted from the use of strong drinks. Then, as to social evils. This country could not afford to spend from fifty to a hundred millions a year for strong drinks; it could not do so and prosper (hear). Our social condition would be much better if that sum were set free and spent with the tailor, shoemaker, butcher, carpenter, book-seller, or other useful trades, and people endeavoured to live soberly, righteously, and godly in the world (cheers). Surely while men were building churches and chapels, they might spend five minutes to ask if there was any truth in what teetotalers said. It was in vain that such men resorted to the foolish fable about teetotalers putting temperance in the place of the gospel and religion (hear). The Bishop of London had worked hard to build churches; but he (Mr. Spencer) had looked into one of the churches in Bethnal-green, capable of holding 1,500 persons, and he found there only about seventy. Much was said about Papal Aggression; but they had to complain also of beer-barrel aggression (hear). Let men take up the teetotal principle, and then their churches and their chapels would be filled. Surely "the grace of God" had not "appeared" in vain, "teaching men to live soberly, righteously, and godly." They had begun at the wrong end; men must be sober before they could be either righteous or godly. And, as to education, it had been proved that large numbers of Sunday-school scholars turned out drunkards. The reason was, the teachers did not go the scriptural way to work; they taught the children to add to their faith virtue and knowledge; but they did not teach them to add to their knowledge temperance. He did not think that schools would ever do the good they ought to do till they taught the children total abstinence, and encouraged the formation of "Bands of Hope." (cheers.) Mr. Spencer then referred to the intended Great Exhibition. All sorts of fine things were to be shown there. He would make a proposition: Let all the priests of Bacchus—the distillers, brewers, spirit merchants, and publicans,—let them bring their choicest specimens of paupers, felons, and such like, and the history of their progress, and let the teetotalers bring forward also the result of their labours, and then let Prince Albert judge and decide between them; while some Elijah came and said to the vast assembly, "How long halt ye between two opinions? Here are the drunkards on the one hand, with their poverty, crimes, and wretchedness; on the other the teetotalers with their health, morality, and comfort; choose ye this day which ye will have!" (cheering.) There were many fine spirited young men among the drunkards; men of fine talents, who could sing, and so on, and hence they went into company and became drunkards. If the teetotalers could succeed in catching such men they might become happy and useful members of society. All lawful means should be adopted for that purpose. Let every individual do all he could to increase the number of teetotalers, and then their ranks would be doubled in a very short space of time (cheering).

The Rev. WILLIAM FORSTER next addressed the audience on "The duty of professing Christians to promote the Temperance Movement." He held it, he said, to be the mission of professing Christians to turn the world upside down. Ever since the fall it had been the wrong side up. Propensities, passions, and appetites had been uppermost and tyrannical, while reason, and conscience, and all that was pure and excellent, had been underneath and trodden under foot. Hence injustice, slavery, cruelty, and all that was evil, had spread like a tornado over the whole face of society. It was certain that the world in which such things prevailed was the wrong side up (hear). Among the many means to be employed for setting it right, teetotalism was not the least. Christianity had the means of securing its own agency, but that was impeding in its progress by the prevalence of vicious habits, and one of the greatest was individual intemperance (hear). And in proportion as that prevailed would Christianity be incapable of accomplishing its great end. If Christians would only look at the subject as they should, they would see that it was their duty to throw their whole heart and soul with all the force of a thunder-cloud into the temperance movement (cheers). It was the duty of Christians, as Christians, in their relation to Christ and to the Christian church, to engage in the temperance movement, and to promote it to the full extent of their power (hear). This he contended for, first, on the ground of sheer humanity. Of all other persons Christians should make the most strenuous exertions to do good. The example of their Great Master, the spirit of Christianity, the expectations of the world, the influence of the Holy Ghost, all laid them under the most complicated obligation, in every possible way, to secure the welfare of their fellow-men (hear, hear, hear). It was their duty to search out the causes of wide-spread evils, and to apply, at any cost, the most appropriate remedy. Of all the evils which could fall on an individual, a family, or a nation, drunkenness was the greatest (hear). It was prolific of ignorance, idleness, poverty, crime, and premature death. It withered all that was good, and fostered all that was bad in man. It ruined man in every possible relation, made him worse than a beast, and inspired him with the spirit of a fiend. Oh, if the Church would but look with an unprejudiced eye on the evils drunkenness inflicted on society and on churches, it would be stung with remorse at the thought of not arousing to put away the fearful evil! (hear.) To say that that was not its duty, was to say that in becoming Christians they ceased to be men; that they had less humanity than those who never believed in the name of Christ. It was the duty of Christians to join the temperance movement as one of the best means of putting a stop to the most fearful scourge of humanity (cheers). Next, it was the duty of Christians, because it was their duty to employ all possible means to give practical effect to the great idea of what mankind ought to be. This they must gather from the teachings of Jesus Christ and his inspired apostles. What would society be if it were in the state represented in the Christian system? Would there not be the universal prevalence of peace, sobriety, purity, and happiness? Would it not be a society quickened, invigorated, and directed by the spirit of Christianity? What would be the state of a world in which there was no drunkenness, idleness, theft, murder, crime; plenty, and no complaining; little sorrow and much joy; few children but what became men, and lived to a good old age; no jails or judges; no ships of war or armies; when all would be wise, humble, pious, and all that God would have men to be, so that he might look down on the world with blessings, saying, "It is very good?" (cheering prolonged.) Now, the Christian expected, and was bound to bring about, that state of things—to embody it in his person, and to promote it in others. But intemperance was the great hindrance; and Christians were bound to join the temperance band—to bring the mountain down and to exalt the valley, to make way for Christian truth (hear). Again, Christians were bound to spread their religion in the very form in which they had received it among their fellow-men. But intemperance was the greatest hindrance. What could they do with the drunkard? What could they do with even the moderate drinker? (hear.) With the man who was under stimulation, which made him look at things in their wrong colour and in a wrong light? Such a man might be impressed under the ministry of the word, but he would go home and take his brandy-and-water, and his convictions would be drowned (hear). That was the way that moderate drinking stopped the progress of divine truth in the minds of men. Thus the progress of Christianity was arrested. The drunkard, reclaimed, said, "I dare not join that Christian Church, for its members use strong drinks, tampering with which has nearly dragged me down to ruin." It was, therefore, the duty of Christians to join the temperance ranks. But it was said, why should we submit to such denial? Denial! what, to give up the use of strong drinks—of drinks which prevent men from having healthy bodies in sound minds? Denial! to desist from the use of that which debilitates the mind, sears the conscience, and pollutes the heart? Self-denial! ye spirits of mockery and derision, did ye ever hear anything so rich as this? (long cheering). Methinks I hear the roar of laughter roll through the regions of darkness when they hear such language as this. O ye self-indulgent, if not for your own sakes, for the sake of others we urge you to abstain. By all the evils wrought by intemperance—by the peace and happiness of families which alcohol is bent upon destroying if it can—by shattered nerves, and palsied limbs, and strength prostrated, and lives destroyed—by the unutterable anguish and despair of the lost, I invoke, I beseech you, in the name of the great Master you profess to serve—as followers of Christ—as the disciples of Him who sought not his own ease that he might save the lost—I call upon you to come to our help against one of the mightiest foes of our fallen humanity. But if you will not, we have yet one resource. O thou Fountain of knowledge, of righteousness, of peace, of happiness; thou source of all that is pure, and good, and holy; pour down on all that bear thy name the mantle of thy loving spirit! Let thy cross, thy self-denying spirit stand before their vision, that they may cast away their dream of self-indulgence, and account no sacrifice too great, that they may rescue those who are ready to perish, and sink into a drunkard's grave and a drunkard's hell! Grant this, O Lord Christ; and let all the people say, Amen! (An impression more than usually deep was evidently produced by the solemn aspirations with which the rev. speaker concluded, and he sat down amid the long-continued cheers of the audience.)

The Rev. NEWMAN HALL, A.B., of Hull, was the next speaker. He said he did not regret that the first occasion of his addressing a meeting in Exeter-hall was on the temperance cause, because he did not know of any cause more calculated to bless the world than that of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks (hear). Slavery had there been denounced, and ignorance deplored, and the sanctity of human life had been asserted, and the abolition of capital punishments pleaded; but in no form of ignorance, or slavery, or crime, was there so much of evil as in intemperance. The necessity of sending the gospel to distant nations had been urged, but what so withheld the Bible, corrupted the church, or obstructed missionary operations as the use of strong drink? (hear.) Teetotalism was the ally of all that was humane, philanthropic, and Christian, and had effected many great and blessed transformations. But the particular point on which he had to address them was, "the moderate use of strong drinks by the more influential portion of the community, a chief impediment to the progress of the temperance movement." His own temperance experience would, in some respects, qualify him to speak on that subject. He was once a moderate drinker, and for more than ten years he had totally abstained; and total abstinence had done him good physically, socially, and morally. To the lassitude and indolence of Monday, of which many ministers complained, he was a stranger. He had seen sober men become drunkards, but none of them could say that the example of their minister had led them downwards: he had seen drunkards become sober, and no impediment or stumbling block had been placed in their way by their minister (hear). He was once a moderate drinker, and had said, "I can do more good by taking a little and remaining sober, than by abstaining altogether." But he met with the late Mrs. Sherman; she urged him to abstain, telling him that she had prayed that he might become an abstainer. He made trial for a month, and that month's trial was more than sufficient to induce him to continue (hear). Some might say, "Are you going to maintain that moderate drinking is in itself sinful?" He did not say so—there might, possibly, be cases that might justify such use; but there was another principle laid down in the Bible: "All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient." All things were lawful, but circumstances might arise which would render it a duty to abstain. "But are we to give up the use of a thing because it is abused? There are gluttons, shall we therefore abstain from meat?" His (Mr. N. Hall's) principle was this—that when the evil resulting from the use of a thing is greater than the evil which could result from abstinence, it is a duty to abstain (hear). "Some men become gluttons, therefore I will abstain from food;" but abstinence from food would kill people. But say, "I will give up strong drink." and who will assert that that would occasion death? Medical men by thousands declare that strong drink does injury. The more a glutton eats the less appetite he has; but the more a drunkard drinks the greater is his appetite for drink. Show us a food that ruins men by its use—that brings thousands of families to poverty and destruction—and we will say with Paul, "We will eat no more of such food while the world standeth." (hear.) "But cannot I use drink without abandoning it altogether?" We shall never get rid of drunkenness unless we get rid of drinking. If we would rid the world of drunkenness, moderate drinking must be given up. You say "Your system is an admirable thing for the drunkard." Yes, it is; because if he takes a little he cannot stop. If, then, he is to be reclaimed and rescued, he must abstain. But suppose only drunkards abstained; as the decauter passed along the table of the moderate man, would it not place the reclaimed in difficulty at every step? We ought to remove every difficulty out of the way, and to give him all the encouragement we can. Then passing the bottle without using it will come to be a creditable thing rather than a reproach. Unless we abstain altogether we can do little good. Who is to convince the drunkard? The moderate drinker? No. The drunkard will say, "You do not abstain yourself." Your reply is, "Oh, but I know when to stop." But he cannot stop; and, therefore, if you refuse to abstain, you place the greatest obstacle in the way of his return (hear). We say, We abstain, and we say to him:—

"Taste not at all of the Circean cup;
He who drinks often at last drinks it up."

And whence comes the race of drunkards? Whence but from the ranks of moderate drinkers? It is they who supply the drunkards of the country. Moderate drinkers are the enlisting party, and they are the great hindrances to the spread of the temperance reformation. And what is moderation? who can define it? Is it a glass or a bottle? It is, in fact, what anybody chooses to make it—a sly road somewhere between a glass and a barrel (hear). In advocating moderation, men advocated drunkenness; what was moderation to one was drunkenness to another. Besides, how did the advocates of moderation know that those whom they persuaded to drink would stop where they did? They had sense and judgment to restrain them, but how many were hurried beyond the line, and sank to eternal woe? And for that moderate drinkers were responsible; they came under the influence of that curse—"Woe unto him that putteth the bottle to his neighbour." But his topic led him to speak of "the influential classes of the community." Influence arose from various circumstances, wealth, rank, power, talent, and so on; but there was no individual who had not some influence, and who was not bound to exert it for the good of those around him. But to speak of those who were conventionally termed "respectable" and "influential;" they were the persons of whom teetotalers sometimes said, that they were doing more harm than the drunkards. That was not far from the truth. A drunkard was a disgusting, a repellent object, a powerful teacher of total abstinence. But look into the snug, comfortable parlour; see the pious minister, the useful Sunday-school teacher, drinking their glass of wine. And who is that young man visiting them? He has just come from the country, and is told by affectionate parents to seek the company only of the good and pious. He does so, and what they do he thinks he may safely do; and then he has his glass at home and at other places; and then he is on the road to ruin. The very respectability of that party constitutes the greatness of the evil and danger (hear). The better a man is, the greater the evil he does, if he does anything that is wrong. The time of the day, so to speak, is taken from such men, and they ought to be very careful that they do not lead any wrong (hear). Mr. N. Hall enumerated other serious evils which arose out of the drinking customs of the country, and which should induce all who desired the welfare of the great Metropolis, and of the country generally, to abstain from them, and to use all their influence to abolish them. In conclusion he said, if he could not convince moderate drinkers to abstain on the ground of their own safety and happiness, he would yet urge them to do so for the sake of others. Let them no longer obstruct the progress of Teetotalism. Teetotalers were aiming to put out a fire; moderate drinkers were supplying fuel and pouring on oil, or were cutting the pipes which conveyed the quenching fluid. They were doing mischief, though perhaps they were not aware of it. As anxious to save the perishing, he asked their aid; let them not withhold it. In the name of humanity—in the name of philanthropy—in the name of JESUS, he asked it, he implored it (long-continued cheers).

JOHN CASSELL, Esq., referred briefly to the forthcoming Exhibition, and expressed his anxious wish that the teetotalers of London might be prepared to give their teetotal brethren and sisters who might visit the Metropolis a hearty welcome. It was his intention to obtain and publish such information as to suitable lodgings, &c., as would prevent teetotal visitors from being subject to any annoyance, and he hoped to receive all suitable aid from those teetotalers who had apartments to let (cheers).

The Rev. G. W. MCCREE delivered an address to the young men present, on "The connection of strict sobriety with their worldly prosperity—their mental improvement—and their moral greatness." This he did with much force and perspicuity, illustrating each position by striking examples. He showed that most of the leading men in all our great moral movements were temperate men. As a proof of the influence of sobriety to promote intellectual improvement, he exhibited the volume just published, entitled, "The Literature of Working Men," the articles in which he was given to understand were written chiefly by total abstainers (cheers).

Mr. NEWCOMB, of Leicester, moved, and Mr. E. GRIFITHS, of London, seconded, a resolution of thanks to the chairman, which was most enthusiastically adopted by the audience, and acknowledged in a short address from the chairman. After which the meeting, which was one of more than usual interest, broke up about half past ten o'clock. A quantity of excellent tracts, the gift of Mrs. A. Stephenson, of Ipswich, were then circulated through the meeting.

FAIR-STREET, HORSLEYDOWN.

The members and friends of the Temperance Association held their annual soiree on the 23rd of January. A numerous company assembled at the tea. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. R. BANNISTER. He said the sight of so many smiling faces was an effectual answer to the idea entertained by some persons, that men could not be happy without strong drink. He congratulated the committee on the success which had attended their labours. Mr. J. G. WATTS read a short poem composed for the occasion. Mr. T. A. SMITH answered some of the objections which professors of religion had sometimes made to the Temperance cause, and showed that the cause was in accordance with divine revelation, as well as with the great Book of Nature. Mr. ROSKELLY sang a series of verses in reference to the operations of the society. Mr. MOORE described the benefits he had derived from the practice of Teetotalism. Mr. T. A. SMITH said, that although all present seemed happy, and joy beamed in every countenance, yet they must not forget that at that very hour thousands were sacrificing property, health, and happiness, at the shrine of intemperance. How many poor children had that night gone to their miserable beds without food, and how many careworn wives were sitting by cheerless hearths, waiting the return of their intemperate husbands? The thought of these things should stimulate them to increased exertion. Mr. BRANDON exhorted all to persevere, and especially to direct their efforts to teaching the rising generation the evils of strong drink, and the blessings of Temperance. The CHAIRMAN offered a few concluding remarks, and a Temperance hymn having been sung, Mr. G. COX exhibited a series of beautiful dissolving views, illuminated with the lime-light, and concluded with a splendid exhibition of the chromatrope.

KINGSTANLEY, NEAR STROUD.

On Friday, Feb. 14, the Kingstanley Juvenile Teetotal Society held its first anniversary tea meeting in the British School-room. About 119 friends, juvenile and adult, sat down to tea. After which, Mr. C. GRIMES, of Stonehouse, was called to the chair, and a public meeting was held, which was addressed by the Rev. B. PARSONS, of Ebey, Mr. G. HANCOCK, of Eastington, and Mr. D. EVANS, of Stonehouse, together with other friends of the total abstinence cause. The treasurer, Mr. HILL, of Stonehouse, read a report of the proceedings of the society during the past year. There are at present about 75 members. The meeting was crowded, and passed off well, and at the close fourteen signed the pledge.

SELBY.

Last month the Teetotalers of Selby had another working men's demonstration in favour of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, which far exceeded all the others in interest, numbers, and speakers. The Victoria-room was crowded chiefly by working men, and the speakers (eight of them) for two hours riveted the attention of the audience, and twenty of them signed the pledge. Most of the speakers denounced tobacco almost as much as drink. One of them, who commenced smoking at ten years of age, had given it up to purchase Dr. Kitto's Pictorial Bible; another that he and his wife might be able to give a penny a week to a Christian church, of which they had both lately become members; and he stated that his home was as a heaven upon earth to what it was when he was a smoker and a drinker. Mr. MORRILL, who was in the chair, interspersed the whole with a number of statistical facts as to the cost of tobacco and drink to the working classes. The working men intend to hold two more such meetings shortly.

DEVONPORT.

Since the establishment of this society, in 1838, it has steadily progressed, and, aided by the valuable services of some of the truly great in the Temperance Movement (amongst whom may be mentioned John Cassell), it has now attained a position worthy of comparison with any philanthropic institution in the locality. A beautiful Temperance-hall has been erected. We have a missionary regularly engaged amongst us, and we entertain the sanguine hope of organizing in the three towns of Devonport, Stonehouse, and Plymouth (comprising altogether a population of one hundred thousand souls), a great Temperance League, and thus to enter upon a successful crusade against the drinking habits of society. S. C. HEARLE, Sec.

HULL.

A Washingtonian meeting was recently held in the Meeting-house of the "Central Temperance Society." Mr. G. THOMPSON, who was in the chair, gave some interesting particulars of his own life, both while he was a drunkard and after he became a teetotaler, which proved that misery and woe are the sure accompaniments of drunkenness, and that happiness and comfort are, to a certain extent, the accompaniments of true temperance. Messrs. Calvert, Lill, Ball, Holmes, Payne, Hill, Miller, Kelsay, Bolton, and Harper, all reformed drunkards united, giving their testimony in favour of Total Abstinence. Several members were added to the above society.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

THE BAND OF HOPE REVIEW; and Sunday Scholar's Friend. Nos. 1 and 2. London: Watson, Kirby-street, Hatton-garden.

THE formation of "Bands of Hope," that is, of bands of children pledged to abstain from "intoxicating liquors," is a very pleasing feature of the times. It proceeds on the well-known principle that "prevention is better than cure." It is alike encouraging to the promoters of strict sobriety, as it warrants the hope of a more sober population, and to the teachers and supporters of Sabbath-schools, as a grand means of enlarging the sphere of their operations, and of securing the efficiency and permanency of their teachings. Would that this latter class were more alive to a sense of its importance, and that a larger number of them, instead of placing obstacles in the way of Temperance Reformers, encouraged and recommended sobriety, both by precept and example! The little publication before us may go far to supply their lack of service. Its extreme cheapness will enable the friends of temperance to circulate it extensively, while its very attractive form will secure the attention of children at the same time that its instructive contents will inform and edify them. We have referred to its cheapness. When we state that it is well printed upon a sheet of good foolscap paper, that each number is ornamented with five or six good engravings, and that the price is ONE HALFPENNY per No., or, we believe, 3s. per 100, we need scarcely add that nothing short of an ardent desire to be useful to a large and interesting class of the community could possibly have induced the projectors of the "Band of Hope Review" to send it forth. It will require a steady circulation of at least ten thousand monthly, merely to secure them from loss. We are glad to find that a fund is forming to enable the proprietors to engage in an extensive gratuitous circulation. We recommend the publication most cordially to parents, Sabbath-school and Ragged-school teachers, and all the friends of youth; and we recommend it, too, to all our youthful readers. A trifling effort on the part of these various classes would soon raise the circulation to twenty or thirty thousand.

AN APOLOGY FOR THE PLEDGE. London: Charles Gilpin.

In this lecture the writer endeavours to show "the harmony of the total abstinence pledge with the customs of the country, and the common transactions of society; and its accordance with the Divine law, with the practice of Old Testament saints, and the precepts and practice of Christianity;" and his object in doing this is "the hope that he may be the honoured instrument of converting some one to the opinion—'That it is expedient, lawful, and necessary to take the total abstinence pledge.'" In the course of his lecture the writer touches briefly on the nature and properties of alcoholic beverages, and on the injuries which the use of them has inflicted on individuals, families, and communities; also, on the numerous advantages which are sure to result from abstinence from such beverages, and on the value of the pledge of abstinence as a means of preserving the consistency and safety of the person who takes it. The lecture is a useful addition to our temperance literature, and is well calculated to satisfy the minds of the scrupulous as to the propriety and utility of being pledged abstainers.

THE SEED AND THE HARVEST. By the Rev. JOHN HUME. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

THIS volume is a collection of anecdotes illustrative of the workings of the drinking customs of this country on the one hand, and of the salutary effects of total abstinence on the other. The elegance of its exterior, and the instructive character of its contents, will render it a most suitable and acceptable present to young persons. Those who advocate the Temperance cause in public will find these illustrations of great use to them.

THE LITERATURE OF WORKING MEN. With an Introductory Essay by Benjamin Parsons. London: John Cassell, Strand.

THIS is a most remarkable volume. It consists of the "Supplementary Numbers" of "The Working Man's Friend," from March, 1850, to February, 1851, inclusive. It contains about one hundred and fifty papers on various subjects, by individuals engaged in laborious occupations. These papers were written at the suggestion of Mr. John Cassell, who encouraged persons of that class to try their skill by the promise of small premiums, consisting of any books the successful writers might think proper to select, according to the amount awarded to them. This has been the means of circulating no fewer than two hundred and fifty volumes, including several of the first class of literature.

This volume is remarkable not only because of the variety of the topics, and the superior excellence of the majority of the articles, but from the fact that nearly the whole of the writers are teetotalers. Some of them have written expressly upon intemperance and total abstinence, and others have adverted to it incidentally, not forgetting to recommend abstinence from tobacco also. It is some recommendation, surely, of the practice of total abstinence by the working classes, to find that the only two volumes containing exclusively the productions of working men—namely, this volume and the "Sabbath Prize Essays," are written by men, the greater portion of whom have adopted that practice. Total abstinence, in addition to conferring bodily health, mental soundness, and social comfort, has taught men to redeem the time, and to cultivate their intellectual powers. It was the remark of a celebrated bishop, when walking arm-in-arm with a scholar of humble rank through one of the towns in the North of England—"There is no aristocracy in the world of letters." Let the principle of total abstinence from strong drinks but prevail, and this will be true to a still greater extent than when the above sentence was uttered. We recommend this volume to the perusal of all classes of our readers.

Advertisements, and articles intended for insertion, should be addressed to the Editor, 335, Strand, London; also, all orders for the Stamped Edition, with remittance for the amount, in postage-stamps, or Post-office orders, to John Cassell, as above.

THE TEETOTAL TIMES AND ESSAYIST may be had of B. L. Green, 62, Paternoster-row, London; Ward, 54, do.; Abel Heywood, Manchester; Kershaw, Leeds; Menzies, Edinburgh; Gallie, Glasgow; and all Booksellers.

TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATIONS DURING THE INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION.

As it is certain that a great number of Teetotalers from various parts of the United Kingdom, and from different quarters of the globe, will visit the Metropolis during the period of the Great Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations, it has been thought desirable that this circumstance should be made subservient to two great and important purposes—namely, the formation of a more systematic and powerful confederation of Teetotalers against the great foe, Intemperance; and, secondly, a demonstration of our principles and status before our countrymen and before the world. To decide upon the best mode of accomplishing these objects, especially the latter, several meetings have been held. In February last a meeting was held in Leicester, at which upwards of forty gentlemen, representing various large societies in England, were present. The general importance of providing suitably for some large gatherings of Teetotalers in the Metropolis was acknowledged, but nothing definite was determined upon, except referring the necessary arrangements to the consideration of a committee in London, who might correspond with secretaries, and other influential members in various parts of the country, and decide upon the necessary details. A committee has since been formed, and a general outline of proceedings has been determined upon, subject, of course, to such modifications as circumstances may require.

The first week in August appears to be the time which the majority of Teetotalers in the provinces have declared to be the most suitable for their visit to London. Taking this for their guide, the committee have proposed the following mode of occupying that period:—

MONDAY, August 4, at seven o'clock in the evening, an aggregate meeting in Exeter Hall, to welcome country friends to the Metropolis.

TUESDAY, August 5, a visit, in one body, to the Great Industrial Exhibition in Hyde-park.

WEDNESDAY, August 6, a public breakfast; after which a grand open-air demonstration, in Regent's-park gardens, or some other suitable place, to adopt a loyal address to Her Majesty, and to appoint a deputation to present it.

THURSDAY, August 7, a Juvenile gathering in Exeter Hall, in the evening.

FRIDAY, August 8, a steam-boat excursion down the Thames, on as large a scale as possible.

MONDAY and TUESDAY, August 11 and 12, a general Convention, or Conference, of the friends and promoters of Temperance from various parts of the world; to continue on Wednesday, if necessary.

As, however, bodies of Teetotalers will be visiting London during the whole period of the Exhibition, eligible buildings are to be sought out and made available for public meetings on the evenings of each day; the principal places of meeting in the Metropolis and suburbs to be included in this arrangement.

Several other important suggestions have been made, in reference to the circulation of tracts in various languages; the issuing of an appropriate address or addresses, embodying the origin, principles, and progress of the Temperance reformation; testimonials of respect to the originators and promoters of the Temperance Movement in America, and of Teetotalism in Great Britain; and, finally, a plan for the consolidation of the English Temperance forces in one great Union or League. On this latter subject we may have much to say shortly. In reference to tracts, some machinery is already in operation, and the proposition of our old friend, JOSEPH LIVESEY, of Preston, will be found in this Number. It will be seen, also, that Mr. J. REWCASTLE, Corresponding Secretary of the Newcastle Temperance Society, has made some important suggestions.

There is one point upon which several experienced and intelligent promoters of the Temperance movement have laid considerable stress, namely, the vast importance of turning the opportunities presented by this General Gathering to the best possible account. They deprecate all attempts at mere display. They recommend that, as the funds necessary for any extensive demonstration will be obtained with difficulty, they should be most carefully and judiciously expended. Neither from the most lengthened Procession, nor from the largest fleet of Thames Steamers, could any just idea be conveyed to visitors of the real benefits, social or moral, resulting from the practice of entire abstinence from intoxicating beverages.

As to the LODGING and COMFORTABLE ACCOMMODATION of Teetotalers during their visits to the Metropolis, we request particular attention to Mr. CASSELL'S plan of REGISTRATION, an outline of which was given in our last number, and the particulars of which may be learned from the advertisement in another part of the present Number. It would, of course, be extremely unpleasant to Teetotal householders to have lodgers addicted to drinking, smoking, and late hours; and equally so to Teetotal visitors to be disturbed in their sober and peaceful slumbers by individuals or parties coming in at, or after, midnight from taverns, saloons, &c. To obviate this unpleasantness, Mr. Cassell intends, in addition to his GENERAL REGISTER, to open a distinct Register for Teetotalers. In those cases in which Teetotalers having apartments or lodgings to let are willing to conform to his tariff—that is, to charge each visitor not exceeding 2s. for bed and breakfast—he engages to register their houses or lodgings free of all expense. In those cases in which higher terms are fixed upon, the charge for registering will be 2s. 6d., or if for the whole period of the Great Exhibition, 5s., which latter charge will secure the notice of all changes of lodgers or lodgings which may take place during the period.

It is hoped that our Teetotal friends who have lodgings to let will do all they possibly can to assist in completing the Register, and that, in the price they put upon their accommodations, they will make it evident to their Teetotal brethren and sisters who may visit them, that they are anxious to make them comfortable, rather than to gain as much as they possibly can by them. The majority of the Teetotal visitors will be of the working classes, who will have made some sacrifices in order to treat themselves and families with the trip, and it is of importance that they should return home impressed with high ideas of the urbanity and kindness of their Metropolitan brethren.

We understand that the secretaries and leading members of the Metropolitan Societies will be furnished with blank forms, which they will be requested to get filled up and returned to the REGISTRATION OFFICE without delay.

THE EXHIBITION TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION.

To the Editor of the Teetotal Times.

SIR,—I was pleased to notice the spirit which prevailed at the meeting of teetotalers for arranging a demonstration during the Exhibition, as reported in the last Saturday's STANDARD OF FREEDOM. And as suggestions are invited, I beg to hand you one or two which may or may not be thought worthy of adoption. Although I am not disposed to discourage a large display of numbers in the shape of processions, steam-boat excursions, &c., yet I think along with these there are means which may be used, perhaps humbler in their appearance, calculated to promote two most important objects:—First, a great diffusion of sound temperance information throughout the whole country, and perhaps to some extent throughout the world, by the agency of the visitors to the Exhibition; and secondly, the producing of a deeper impression upon the dark and drunken parts of London by the labours of the vast numbers of talented and powerful speakers who will be there on the occasion.

First. The diffusion of sound information it is true may be partially effected by large meetings, but how few comparatively out of the millions there are in London can be expected to attend the meetings, and especially of those who are as yet not teetotalers. And even those who do attend cannot be supposed to carry into the country, or into other countries, what they merely hear, so as to diffuse it widely abroad, half so well as if it were stamped upon paper, and thus assume a tangible and permanent shape. I should recommend, therefore, that the committee arrange for printing, in the cheapest possible way, some of the standard temperance publications, and provide facilities for bringing them into notice and into close contact not only with the teetotal visitors, but all others who could be induced to purchase. I think by an effort the country might be inundated with most valuable temperance information. Indeed a special address for the occasion might be drawn up; and if printed on the plan I will explain, could not fail to command an immense sale. Not a few writers now-a-days make efforts to obtain the prizes offered for the best essays. Suppose the committee requested their teetotal friends throughout the kingdom to prepare addresses, not for the prize of a hundred guineas, but for the purpose of presenting to the committee to print which they thought proper. One or more of these addresses might be adopted, or parts of each, as the adjudicators might decide. They should not exceed sixteen pages demy 8vo. I merely name these essays as suitable and appropriate, but by no means to supersede the issuing of any tracts or publications already in existence. On this occasion, in order to make a mighty effort, I would depart from the ordinary regulations of the trade. The price should be the mere cost of paper and machining, the composition to be paid for out of the fund, which, if limited to a few choice publications, would not be heavy. I cannot doubt but there are not a few teetotalers keeping shops or hotels in London, who would give their trouble in disposing of them in quantities for the occasion; and I am sure that our numerous friends from the country will make the arrangement public, and give, during their visit, all the assistance they can. The extraordinary cheapness is sure to cause an extraordinary sale. I presume that a pamphlet, sixteen pages demy 8vo., might be sold at about 2s. 9d. per hundred, which would be something more than ½d. each. The usual sized hand-bills, demy 12mo., might be afforded in sheets at 1s. 6d. per thousand. This is not mere theory, for I have a form of temperance bills ready set up, of which I send you a copy and the price, and which I am printing for the societies in this neighbourhood, fully bearing out the above calculation. All that the committee will have to do is, to pay for the composition, and the cost of this, they will find by calculation, will be but a small sum compared to the immense good which may be effected. The sale of these papers should not be confined to the week in August, but be kept up during the whole time of the Exhibition.

Secondly. We teetotalers ought to come to London not merely for pleasure, but to make ourselves useful. I remember that at one of the annual temperance conferences in Edinburgh, we had what we called a PERPETUAL MEETING in an open space adjoining High-street. We commenced at nine in the morning and kept it up till about nine at night. Having speakers from all parts of Scotland, and some from England, there was no difficulty in keeping the thing going. Passers by stopped in crowds as long as they thought proper, and thousands must have listened to the sound of teetotal who never heard it before. Now I would propose that the country talent to be brought to London next August, should not be dormant, or merely the best of it permitted to exhibit itself at some few large meetings, but that all the Londoners, and especially the worst portion of them, as far as possible, should have a chance of partaking of its benefits. It will be easy to get the names of those beforehand who are willing to deliver addresses. The committee alone can manage the details. Suppose there are 300 speakers, and these agree to deliver on an average three addresses each during the stay in London, you have 900 addresses promised (I think the number would greatly exceed this); then would not the best mode of turning those to the best account be to appoint meetings in doors or out doors, as the committee may decide, say in twenty places, or fifty if you think proper, every evening for a fortnight, or say double the number every night for a week, reserving the remainder of the speaking to be exhausted at one or two perpetual meetings, if such can be arranged? It may be well enough to have a few large assemblies in such places as Exeter-hall; but I would have most of them held where the greatest and most neglected sinners are known to reside. Such a chance will never occur again of bringing the most wretched parts of the metropolitan drinkers within the sound of true temperance, and I do hope our metropolitan friends will not fail to embrace the opportunity.

Instead of making the teetotal demonstration to consist chiefly in gala enjoyments and external display, I should wish it to embody such well-timed efforts as will tell powerfully upon the judgments, feelings, and consciences of the drinkers in London, and also to carry with it a flood of light into all the provinces, and to many of the dark corners of the earth. I would only add that should the printing project be adopted, my mite, £5, will be cheerfully given towards the expense. If the temperance friends think these suggestions feasible, I shall be glad to give any further explanation in my power.—I am, your obedient servant,

J. LIVESEY.

Bowness, Windermere, March 17, 1851.

SIR,—On looking over the periodicals for the past month I was rather disappointed at the little result proceeding from the Conference at Leicester on the Exhibition Temperance Demonstration; and yet, perhaps, they did the best thing they could do in committing the whole matter to a committee located where the demonstration must necessarily take place, and who must know not only the end of the details from the beginning, and on whom the responsibility of such details in their fulfilment must fall, but also the best mode of timing the project so as to be in agreement with other demonstrations of a kindred character which may be purposed to be held at the same time.

It is some months ago since the Newcastle Temperance Committee suggested to the Committee of the National Society, and a few other influential individuals, the propriety of holding a second Temperance Convention on the occasion of the Exhibition assemblages. The suggestion met the approval of the parties to whom we wrote, and a brief article appeared in the Standard of Freedom in recommendation; but no farther steps appear to have been taken. Having, since then, given to the subject some little more thought, I have come to the conclusion that these large assemblies scarcely admit of that deliberative character which is desirable on such important subjects, as the defining and fixing of principles, and the maturing of plans of organisation and operation. There are generally too many counsellors, and the discussions become too miscellaneous and rambling. Such large gatherings are better adapted to give effective enunciation to principles already fixed—fixed as it were by a general and common consent, and to give development and impetus to plans of operation tried and tested even in some humble sphere. They are therefore, in my opinion, more of benefit for their moral and social influences; such as bringing the friends of the Movement into personal acquaintance and fellowship,* and the giving an impulse to the public mind in the manner you have so effectively done by your large Exeter-hall gatherings, rather than for any practical business purposes. The latter can, or could be, better attained by a committee of a few ardent, intelligent, influential, and practical business men, than by any large assemblage; and the state of the Temperance cause in England—the position it has attained in an enlightened public opinion, the miscellaneousness of its operations, and the amount of misdirected and almost wasted energy throughout the country—appear to me imperatively to demand the calling together or the institution of some Corresponding committee to attempt the institution of some more efficient organisation and uniform mode of operation than at present prevails. In passing, I would simply express my willingness to co-operate with any one for such purpose.

For these reasons I would suggest the limitation of the Exhibition Demonstration to the following great public objects:—

FIRST. As this is to be an assemblage of the people of All Nations, and as the world is to be blest by the universal spread of Temperance, it affords a fitting opportunity to hold a large gathering to express a

* I append as a note that these social objects might be more easily attainable were some large room opened as a promenade, and some certain hours of the day and evening set apart for more special assemblage—a book being kept for the names of visitors, stating their localities in London. The holding of soirees would also promote this. I would also suggest to the London friends the opening a register of speakers from the country who might feel disposed to attend any of the numerous meetings that will no doubt be held during the period of the Exhibition. J. R.

world's gratitude towards the men of America, who were, in the order of Providence, the originators and pro-pellers of the Temperance Movement, doing full and liberal-minded justice to the germ and dawn of the principles of the cause, and to the men of America, by whose energy, ability, and munificence the cause was developed to the world. I should have such sentiments embodied in an address—making, if thought well, special reference to the worthies of the Movement, Beecher, Delevan, Frelinghuysen, and others, and I should select the speakers on the occasion from the various nations and islands where the Temperance standard has been raised.

SECOND. I suggest a like tributary meeting to the Men of Preston, who, by their self-denying, energetic action, first ushered into notice and eventually established the thorough-going, full-length principles of Teetotalism; if need be, marking with special reference the labours of Livesey, Swindlehurst, Teare, Cassell, Grubb, Whittaker, and others. We should thus do justice to the noble men of America, and the working men of England, who have been privileged and honoured through the medium of this cause to be such memorable benefactors to the world.

THIRD. I would suggest a public procession from some convenient place, not distant more than two or three miles, to a large public out-of-door meeting in Hyde-park, to adopt an address containing a brief and pointed digest of our principles and objects; and an energetic, exhortatory appeal to the Teetotalers of the world, to combine with invigorated powers and re-united sympathies, and by a reiterated pledge determine never to slacken in their efforts until the world be redeemed from drunkenness, and universal Temperance prevail.

These three catholic objects, I deem, would be befitting so great an occasion. They would mark the eras of the cause, its origin, its more perfect development, and its prospective advancement; and as they would require three days to give due effect to them, it would in all likelihood be as much time as other engagements and objects would permit. The expenses of the meetings, I calculate, would be fully met by collections; and the procession need not cost much, as all manner of regalia might be dispensed with, or only involved to the extent that any individuals or societies might be disposed at their own personal responsibilities.

Having made these suggestions and explanatory remarks, I respectfully submit them to the friends of the cause generally through the medium of your pages.—Yours, as an old fellow-labourer,

JAMES REWCASTLE, Corresponding Secretary.

Newcastle-on-Tyne, March 14, 1851.

THE TIPLER'S GLASS.

How small is the glass that with tremulous hand,
The Tippler upholds to his lips,
Its delicate stem by his finger is spanned,
And its brim he scarce feels as he sips.

Yet from this little glass, when held up to the light,
What monsters are seen to arise;
They sit on its edge, where they watch day and night,
To make wretched mortals their prize.

Though it looks so inviting, yet on its smooth brim,
Sits poverty, ragged and stern;
That with hard iron hand and countenance grim,
Sweeps away all a poor man can earn.

There, too, sits disease, with face sallow and wan,
And his eye-balls all blood-shot and red;
His body is shrunk, and his vigour quite gone,
And pain is distracting his head.

FALSEHOOD.

[BY DALMOGAND.]

We all hear a good deal about the mischievous qualities of alcohol, and I shall, for variety's sake, throw out a few remarks on another evil spirit—namely, FALSEHOOD. Distillers and retailers of the first-mentioned are often rigorously handled; and the distillers or retailers of falsehood should not be permitted to escape.

Falsehood is of a three-fold description. It may proceed from erroneous conviction, from heedlessness, or from intention.

Parties may utter a fallacy which they believe in, as when the Hindoo affirms that the foundation of our earth is a huge tortoise; or as when a man asserts that he likewise must have a tortoise to support him under the business of the day in the shape of a morning glass. If reflective inquiry could dispel their false belief, these self-deluders are certainly in fault. Then, persons may babble falsehood, or give currency to stories without even calculating the likelihood of their being true. Tale-bearing is an old-established, though by no means enviable, branch of business. How numerous the heart-burnings it kindles and perpetuates! Were schools for instruction to come, instead of schools for scandal, much of the world's moral gloom and social discomfort would be relieved. The rumour-spreader may urge in his defence, that, if the gossip be untrue, he did not make it; but with similar logic, the passer of base money might aver, that although he possibly had some misgiving as to the coin's genuineness, yet he was not the coiner. Let the tattler restrain his loquacity with the curb of thought, repeating daily for meditation the wholesome proverb—"Man has two ears, and but one tongue, that he may proportionally hear much and talk little." But it is to the third kind of falsehood—that from design—wherein the heart says one thing, and the mouth declares another, to which at present we shall particularly address ourselves.

I shall first refer to intentional falsehood in its variety. In fact, it is only a reference which can be made; for whatever time one looks abroad upon society, he seems sure of encountering some deceit, showing that the attempters stanchly believe in the gullibility of human nature. Thus, for the outside, we have recommended to our regard incomparable articles at unheard-of prices—yes, at a "tremendous sacrifice;" while for the languishing interior, we have staring us from every broadsheet humane announcements of infallible restoratives. Bacchus, with his blandest smile, invites all and sundry, "Come with me, and I will do you good;" and the simple are inveigled to their ruin, though a small amount of forethought would serve to furnish an enlightened "No!" Mammon, too, with brazen countenance, points to his treasure-mines as the soul's chief good, and credulous immortals dig away for glory. Certain tradesmen are in the habit of giving pledge after pledge that an article bespoken will be sent home by such a date; but despatch-day resembles in its uncertainty a strolling-player's "last," evening of performance. These promise-breakers, from familiarity with the vice, are apt to forget the ugly epithet to which they become entitled. Morality should not be locked up with the divested Sabbath raiment, but should be cherished by us as an every-day attendant, whether in the house or in the field.

Let us next view the subject in its inconvenience. Those who indulge in fibbing find themselves discredited when they strictly confine themselves to truth; and they at last discover to their cost that the untruthful man, even in a temporal light, is his own enemy. Social intercourse, without a certain portion of integrity in speech, could not be carried on at all; still, the most ordinary transactions are sadly mingled with the leaven of falsehood. Persons, for instance, go a-shopping, but on reaching the desired counter, seller and buyer confront each other with mutual suspicion, instead of confidence. Both stand in horror of being overreached—brother looks on brother but as lawful prey. When goods with their respective prices have been exhibited, does the customer secure at once the commodity if suiting, or, should the expense happen to exceed his expectation, does he lay it down and ask for cheaper? Very often the reverse. In the St. Giles's dictionary, "prigging," we are told, means appropriating more than belongs to one; and in the Scottish vocabulary, the term denotes the same spirit of petty plunder; for what is attempting to force the trader to an abatement of his needful price but a kind of robbery? Let the dealer state at once the precise figure he will take, and, spurning falsehood, abide by it; and let the higgler abandon this time-wasting, anti-virtuous appliance of the sereno. We find this nuisance practised among the lieges of King Solomon: "It is naught, it is naught, says the buyer; but when he is gone his way, then he boasteth." A brief consideration will demonstrate that lying is a round-about, disagreeable mode of performing life's journey; and it will pronounce at the same time as to the class of individuals requiring the longest memories.

We come now to regard a lying propensity in its mean-ness. Truth is the upholder of sterling dignity, and falsehood the subverter. The liar parts company with his self-respect, and forfeits the good opinion of his fellows. As among the lower animals the reptile holds a degraded place, so among the higher the skulking child of falsehood occupies a like position, being loathingly accounted a moral reptile. In one particular the human liar surpasses in dishonour the infernal, for, as it has been remarked by a certain writer, devils tell the truth to one another, otherwise the operations of that dark society would be arrested. A dishonest tongue, perceiving itself detected and mistrusted, often has recourse to unregarded protestations, but the speaking member found truth-loving generally obtains a respectful hearing. Travellers relate that barbarian tribes, though deficient in many things, are for the most part skilled in mendacity; to these, however, the Star of Bethlehem has not yet appeared. Why should the civilised rival the savage in acquiring the language of deception, and not rather study more carefully the grammar of uprightness contained in conscience and the Bible? In history innumerable lie-makers are registered, who continue to run the gauntlet of contempt through successive generations. They have gone to their account; but their deeds of baseness abide, like withered shrubs along the banks of Time. The historic page discloses lying representatives of every grade—from the beggar with his wallet, to the monarch with his diadem—and there seems slender probability that the race of fabricators will soon become extinct. Let neither of us, my reader, be seen perpetuating this evil, by indifference about the claims of truth; nor let us imagine that the aid of falsehood can lawfully remove any difficulty from our path; but reflect that, on the contrary, it will aggravate our hindrances. Let us not cast in our lot with earth's moral creepers, but connect ourselves with those who desire to sweep from off its surface all refuges of lies, that the glorious elevation of humanity may not be retarded.

And, lastly, let us consider falsehood in its sin. Of its being a violation of the divine requirement none may doubt, since throughout the sacred volume truth is held up as lovely, and insincerity denounced as odious. Think upon the instances of chastisement administered to the deceitful, and from the past infer the warning that similar manifestations of displeasure shall follow the un candid Here, perhaps, the liar may escape a signal judgment; but look beyond into eternity, and he will be marked enduring a melancholy exile from the Happy Land. On earth falsehood is the liar's heaven, but it shall become his hell. Falsehood cannot be viewed as of trifling amount; if for every "idle" word men have to answer at the great Assize, where can the deceiver stand but among transgressors of the blackest dye? The Judgment is no longer an abstraction, nor the Judge a phantom. Yet men deal in untruths of every kind, not contemplating the ultimate result—they scatter firebrands without number, and in the end are scorched themselves. Delight in falsehood is not contracted instantaneously. Like other vices, it proceeds from small beginnings, and, like them, when rooted in the system, proves very difficult of eradication—nay, it becomes more and more incorporated with the victim's nature, till the finger of derision points him out as an incarnate lie, and the reaper, Death, removes him.

Having thus sketched falsehood's more prominent characteristics, let us severally determine the relation we bear towards it, and manifest our abhorrence, not in word only, but in thought and deed. A sarcastic old-world philosopher has hinted that those who merely chant the praises of any virtue, are like instruments of music, which can utter melodious strains, although themselves entirely destitute of feeling. Let our expressions be the offspring of sincerity, and let it be evidenced by us that principle pervades all our doings, whether they be great or small. Neither the risk of misconception, nor the certainty of reproach, can warrant men in stifling or perverting their convictions; let straightforwardness be ever followed, and the matter left with HIM whose aid is promised. Parents should not, by wantoning with truth, tend to destroy their children, but endeavour to imbue their tender minds with a love for what is true, and thereby influence the conduct of their riper years. "Lying lips are abomination to the Lord; but they that deal truly are his delight."

I cannot conclude these observations without alluding to another phasis of uncanonour wherein the lips may or may not take part—I refer to falsehood of position. Men, for example, by increase of information, arrive at the conviction that a particular change of practice or avowed opinion is demanded; but they disregard their inward prompter, and jog on in the old rut, fancying thus perhaps to maintain a character for consistency, as if consistent error were a thing to glory in! It is surely not mean but noble, not reprovable but praiseworthy, for a man to declare that though yesterday he had misjudged, he will to-day, with changed convictions, change his course. What would be thought of the navigator who should persist in using an old chart, although admonished that a recent careful survey had proved it to be unsafe, and although a new chart, with the various points of danger, awaited his acceptance?

DRINKING CUSTOMS.

FELLOW WORKMEN, countrymen, and brothers, permit a "working man" to say a few words respecting the drinking customs of our shops and factories. You are well aware of the large amount of money spent in the workshops of England in the practice of "standing something" on birthdays, and paying "footings" on entering a new situation. There are many other fatal and degrading habits resorted to, such as "tossing" and laying "wagers" for intoxicating drinks, often ending in quarrels and drunkenness.

Fellow workmen, such debasing indulgences, evil influences, and soul-destroying examples, must be expelled from our shops, factories, and foundries, as alike injurious to character, body, mind, and soul.

We are at the present time loud in our cries, enthusiastic in our demands, for political reform, and very properly too; but we must, while asserting these claims, give some proof that we are worthy to receive what we are asking for, and that we can appreciate and value those rights and privileges when granted to us. If we are really in earnest for the welfare of ourselves and country, we must give up our drinking customs and become total abstainers from all intoxicating drinks. Begin, then, and act as men and patriots. Let the "glass" and "pot" pass you in your shops; fear not the leer of derision or smile of contempt that may be cast upon you; thousands of other noble hearts have gone through the same ordeal, but by being firm and resolute have come off conquerors.

Fellow countrymen, we must reform our shops, our homes, our inclinations, and habits; we must take a more active and energetic part in the elevation of our class, not trusting to governments or rulers. Awake then, and arouse from your lethargy; throw off the shackles of custom and self-indulgence; release yourselves from the bondage of drink; concentrate your energies for the elevation of the working classes; then we may look forward with joyful hearts to the "good time coming."

Barnsbury-road, London. G. J. WADMAN.

ONWARD!

A TEMPERANCE MELODY.

(Air—"Rose of Allandale.")

There's a cause requires our utmost strength
And all our care to rear;
'Tis the cause of happiness and health—
'Tis constant and sincere.
Its object is to redeem our land
From drunkenness and woe;
Then rally round our Temperance band,
And onward let us go!

'Tis the cause of freedom, wealth, renown;
The friend of age and youth:
'Tis the cause of Temperance alone
That leads us on to truth.
Let Sobriety, then, our motto be,
And Religion's paths to know:
Her ways are ways of pleasantness,
If onward we will go.

We pity all those who sneer and frown,
And those who wish us ill;
For the star of Temperance shall outshine,
And be triumphant still.
Strong drink hath caused our land to mourn;
'Tis the nation's bitter foe;
But Abstinence shall our glories crown,
So onward let us go!

Come, then, let us all, with one accord,
Do all the good we can;
And stay the tide of drunkenness,
And raise each fallen man.
Our isle will then be truly blest—
Our hearts with pleasure glow,
To find our labours meet success,
As onward still we go.

Scarborough, March, 1851. CORNELIUS MEADLEY.

MONEY EXPENDED BY WORKMEN.—At a large manufacturing establishment in London, as many as 300 persons are employed. Of these, 100 men receive each on an average £1 15s. for working five days in the week. They decline coming to labour on Monday, which they habitually make a holiday, and I was told thus lose 7s. each weekly. Besides this loss, I was informed that each expends no less than 7s. weekly for beer. The establishment in fact supports a public-house.

TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATIONS IN EXETER-HALL.

THE FIFTH of the present series of Temperance Demonstrations in Exeter-hall will be held on Monday evening, April 7, when addresses will be delivered by a number of speakers engaged in Laborious Occupations. A large attendance is expected. Our readers will do well to invite their acquaintances of the Working Classes, and also Employers and Manufacturers, to attend on that occasion, as, judging from the character of the speakers, we anticipate such a demonstration of the practicability and value of Teetotalism as may convince the most sceptical, whether Employers or Operatives, that its universal adoption would be a blessing to the community.

THE SIXTH and last meeting of the present series is expected to take place on Monday evening, May 12. As at that period many Ministers of Religion and other gentlemen will be in the Metropolis, the Committee will be greatly obliged to any of them who are Total Abstinents if they will send their names and addresses to the Treasurer, Mr. JOHN CASSELL, 335, Strand; as the Teetotalers of the Metropolis will rejoice to have the opportunity of giving them a hearty welcome, and of listening to their statements as to the progress of Temperance in various parts of the Kingdom.

As the funds still fall short of the desired amount, the Committee will be obliged by any further contributions, which may be forwarded to the Treasurer.

TEETOTALISM AND THE "SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION."

In our last number we called attention to some remarks in the February number of the "Union Magazine," in which the correctness of certain statistics published in the "Voices from Prisons and Penitentiaries" was impugned, and the force of the inferences drawn from them evaded. That number of the TEETOTAL TIMES was duly forwarded to the editor of the "Union Magazine," to the principal members of the Union Committee, and to some of the most influential supporters and teachers of Sabbath-schools in various parts of the kingdom. One result of this has been the circulation of another large impression of the "Voices from Prisons and Penitentiaries," and the receipt of letters from various parts of the kingdom, confirming our statements, and thanking us for our exertions; and another result has been, further attempts to invalidate our testimonies, to weaken the force of our inferences and advices, and to misrepresent and malign our motives. On the 27th of February there appeared a letter in the Patriot, by Mr. Charles Reed, of Hackney, which is scarcely worthy of notice, as the writer has been at little pains to make himself acquainted with the facts of the case, and as we took care to furnish him with the "Voices from Prisons," and with the last number of the TEETOTAL TIMES, which contains a complete answer to all his remarks and insinuations. We think that, "after a careful investigation of the proofs thus set forth, and looking at the sources whence they come," Mr. Reed will not say again, "I venture to question the accuracy of the figures, and to repudiate utterly the conclusions drawn from them." That he should dislike our conclusions was natural, but we defy him to disprove our figures. We thank Mr. Reed for the additional evidence he has furnished of the defective character of Sabbath-school instruction, from the report of the Surveyor-General of Prisons, on account of which we can almost pardon his want of candour and of truth, in saying that we accuse the Sunday-school Union "of aiding and abetting the vile drinking customs of the country." We scarcely expected that "our arguments would coerce teachers to abandon their present course of instruction, that the doctrines of Teetotalism might be prominently inculcated in our schools;" all we desire is that they should cease from their hostility to Teetotalism; that they should recognise it as a practice of utility and importance, and that they should give it that place in their instructions which is given to it in the Bible, and in the category of Christian virtues.

The learned Secretary of the Sunday-school Union has again come to the rescue. In the "Union Magazine" for March, he adverts to the statistics published in the "Voices from Prisons," and commences with this bold statement:—"The proposition they (the statistics) are designed to support, is, that the majority of Sunday-schools become criminals." The writer must surely have sent Candour and Truth on an errand to some distant spot, and have penned this and the following sentences in their absence! He proceeds thus:—"The author will say, 'Oh, no! I do not say that; I only say that the large majority of the criminals at present in the prisons of this country have been for a considerable time scholars in Sunday-schools.'" "It is true," continues Mr. Watson, "that such is the statement in words, but the impression sought to be conveyed, and which is received where these statements are accepted without examination, is, that these criminals are a fair specimen of the whole class of Sunday-schools."

We deny the truth of this representation in the most unqualified terms; such was not the impression sought to be conveyed; such is not the impression made in the quarters where the statistics have been circulated. We have laboured in Sabbath-schools too long, and have spoken and written too much in praise of the Institution, to believe, or to insinuate anything of the kind; and we defy Mr. Watson, Mr. Reed, or any one who has read the "Voices from Prisons," the addresses to Sabbath-school Teachers, which we have published from time to time, or our remarks in our last number—we defy any member of the Sabbath-school Union to substantiate such a charge as Messrs. Watson and Reed have preferred against us in the articles they have sent forth to the world.

To use the language of Mr. Watson,—"we can easily understand that the committee of the Union may not feel it to be their duty to sift this matter;" such a sifting would, we are fully aware, prove offensive to many patrons, superintendents, and teachers of Sabbath-schools. At the same time, we firmly believe that such a sifting would be salutary, and though it might cost the Union the loss of some supporters, it would add most materially to the efficiency of the Sabbath-school system. Should such be the result, our statements, which led to the "sifting," will not prove so "utterly valueless" as Mr. Watson intimates. Towards the close of the article in the "Union Magazine," the writer says,—“It sounds to us very like blasphemy to assert that the Gospel of the blessed God is not adequate to work out the deliverance of mankind from the evils introduced by sin, unless accompanied by a practice devised by man—a practice which, in its general application, it is very difficult to maintain by either the examples or precepts of the Scriptures.” It were hopeless to enter into arguments with a writer who thus speaks of Teetotalism, or who thus reads Scripture. Teetotalers are as ready to assert the power of the Gospel as any Union secretary can possibly be; but they know that drunkenness is a physical evil, and that it can only be cured by a physical remedy. That remedy—the only certain and infallible remedy—is total abstinence from the drink that makes drunken. We might as well expect the Gospel to expel the virus of poison, or to cure any of the diseases incident to the human frame, as to expect the Gospel to wean a man from the love of strong drink while he continues to use it. We could remind Mr. Watson of many of his acquaintances—persons of whose piety no one thought of entertaining a doubt—who have fallen irrecoverably in consequence of their love of strong drink; and the list we could furnish would include not only hopeful scholars, but teachers, superintendents, and patrons of Sabbath-schools. We can tell him that we know of many Teetotalers who have been reclaimed from habits of inveterate drunkenness without any aid derived from the Gospel or from the teachers of religion, and who have become sober, industrious, prudent men; and, on the other hand, that we know of many who, with high professions of religious enjoyment, have tampered with strong drink till it has cast them down and destroyed them. Among these were some who treated Teetotalism with contempt, as “a practice devised by man.” And as to the Scripture testimony, of which he appears to speak so slightly, is it not this? “They have erred through wine, and through strong drink are out of the way. The priest and the prophet have erred through strong drink; they are swallowed up of wine; they are out of the way through strong drink; they err in vision, they stumble in judgment.”

Our space forbids us to enlarge. We have the means of knowing that our efforts to promote inquiry have not been in vain, and, though the organ of the Sunday-school Union Committee in London questions the truth of our statements, and rejects our friendly counsel, we receive more courteous and respectful treatment from various friends of Sabbath-schools in the provinces. We conclude with a specimen:—

ESTEEMED FRIEND,—I have read with much interest the “Voices from Prisons and Penitentiaries;” the statistics presented are truly appalling, and should arrest the attention of all who are interested in the formation of Sabbath-schools. Instead of over-estimating the effect of intemperance on teachers and scholars, I believe a large volume of evidence might be compiled, could a sufficient number of disinterested persons be found in our various towns and cities, who would collect information on the subject. As it regards this locality, no influence can be compared with that of the drinking customs in frustrating the efforts of the devoted Sabbath-school teacher. How painful the retrospect! Some transported and imprisoned; many fallen into a premature grave; and others become most abandoned and vicious. Nor is this confined to the male sex; many of the degraded daughters of vice and prostitution have also been Sunday scholars; some of these have gone to an early tomb, and all to be traced to the demon Intemperance. It is also a fearful fact that those who have thus early strayed from the paths of virtue and moral rectitude, became proverbial for their profanity.

I would not for a moment infer that the labours of the pious teacher in any measure tend to these results, or that much good has not arisen from these schools;

but it certainly goes far to prove that there must be some deficiency in the present system, nor do I believe that the evil can be removed, or these valuable institutions be rendered permanently efficient till total abstinence principles occupy a prominent position in the instruction imparted.—I am, thine respectfully,

GEORGE PHILLIPS, Secretary of the Haverford West Sunday-school Union.
Haverford West, 3rd Mo. 17, 1851.

DRUNKENNESS AT ELECTIONS.

WE referred, in our last number, to the scenes of drunkenness and riot which were witnessed during the recent elections at St. Albans and Falkirk, especially at the latter place, and entreated the friends and promoters of Temperance to unite in petitions to the House of Commons, praying for inquiry into the subject, and the adoption of some remedial measures as to the future. We are glad to find that several such petitions have been presented, and that others are in the course of signature. We subjoin a copy of one which has been adopted by several Metropolitan Societies:—

“To the Honourable the House of Commons.

“The humble petition of the Members of the Temperance Society,

“Showeth—

“That your petitioners have heard with deep regret of the riotous and disorderly proceedings which took place at the recent elections of representatives for the boroughs, of St. Albans, England, and Falkirk, Scotland, and more particularly at the latter, whereby the lives and property of many of Her Majesty’s subjects were placed in imminent danger.

“That your petitioners confidently believe that such riot and disorder proceeded from the excessive use of intoxicating liquors, which, as your petitioners are credibly informed, were very profusely given to the electors and the populace by some person or persons having an interest in the elections which then took place.

“That as such proceedings tend greatly to tarnish the purity of elections, to expose large masses of Her Majesty’s subjects to loss and danger, and to subject our beloved country to the contempt of neighbouring nations, your petitioners humbly pray that your Honourable House will be pleased to adopt such measures as in your wisdom may be thought necessary to prevent such scenes in future.

“And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.”

THE GREAT DESTROYER.

Medical Recollections.—No. II.

How many bright hopes of domestic happiness have been blasted, and how many happy homes have been desolated by the indulgence of a passion for drink! The domestic hearth, which should have been the scene of innocent enjoyment and pure affection, of holy precept, powerful example, and family piety, has but too frequently been converted into the abode of riotous mirth and guilty revellings, of ungovernable passion and despised authority, of abject poverty and want, by the ruinous habit of drinking in one member only of a family.

A few days ago I observed a young couple walking down the street, and from their expressions of affection for each other, I judged they were newly married. On reaching a gin-shop, the pale-faced young man attempted to turn in, requesting his partner to wait a few minutes at the door for him; and never shall I forget the sudden cloud which passed over that pretty, and, just before, smiling and confiding countenance. She clung to his arm, and besought him, as for her life, to resist the temptation; but with a relentless obstinacy, which nothing but the cursed practice of drinking could impart, he broke from her, and entered the dram-shop, leaving her, with drooping head and tearful eye, standing outside the door, and long did she wait for her foolish companion. Methought I saw in her changed and hopeless countenance a sadful anticipation of the chilled affection, and comfortless home, and premature decay, and ruined character, which must result from such a habit, if unrestrained.

Some years ago I knew a labouring man, whose general character for honesty and industry secured him regular employment. He was in the habit, however, of spending nearly the whole of his week's earnings in drink on the Saturday night, whilst his wife toiled hard, and scarcely maintained her small family at home. Late one Saturday night he went home as usual, drunk. His wife reproved him for his ruinous excesses; he burst into a violent passion, snatched up his infant child, which lay asleep in the cradle, and dashing it to the floor, killed it! He was tried, convicted of manslaughter, and imprisoned for twelve months. During his imprisonment he was, of course, deprived of his accustomed stimulus, and confined to a diet of bread and water. On first seeing him after his release from prison, I was much struck with his vigorous appearance, the healthiness and clearness of his complexion, and the great improvement in the general expression of his countenance; but he soon returned to his former drinking habits, and I have since altogether lost sight of him.

A wealthy farmer, a few miles from the town where I resided, was in the habit of returning home late every evening, intoxicated, and was always highly incensed if his wife or daughter did not sit up for him, and unbolt the door immediately on his approach. One midnight he returned home intoxicated as usual. His wife, a very pious and excellent woman, was sitting up for him, but had fallen asleep by the fireside. Impatient of not obtaining immediate ingress on his return, in a fit of passion he thrust his hand through the window; a deep wound was inflicted across the front of the wrist by a piece of glass, the radial artery was divided, and before surgical assistance could be procured, he had bled to death! I recollect a precisely similar accident occurring under like circumstances to another gentleman: fortunately the surgeon arrived in time to tie the bleeding artery, and so to save his life; but the brachial nerves were so much injured, that the arm continued paralytic and helpless ever after. Such are the wages of iniquity! and such are some of the prolific fruits of habits of intoxication! and such are the dangers to which the drunkard exposes himself!

"Thou shalt be as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth on the top of a mast."

"Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babbling? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes?"

Liverpool, Feb. 25, 1851. T. E. RAWSON, M.D.

The Rev. William Wight, B.A., obtained of the magistrates of Newcastle permission to go over the jail of this town. To all the prisoners he saw, both male and female, he put this simple question:—"Suppose, when young, you had been trained never to taste intoxicating drinks—had taken a pledge to abstain altogether from them, and had been enabled to keep this pledge, do you think it is at all probable you would ever have entered this place?" With one exception, the whole unhesitatingly replied, "Sir, it is not probable we would."

WESLEYAN MISSIONS AND TEMPERANCE STATISTICS.

A SHORT time ago I attended one of our Missionary Meetings in the Islington Circuit, and was much pained by the oft-repeated cry of want of funds made by the Rev. J. Rattenbury. Having become a total abstainer from all alcoholic beverages, and devoted the amount thereby annually saved to the Mission cause, I could not refrain, on my return home after the meeting, from taking down from my bookcase the Minutes of Conference for 1850, the Missionary Report for 1849, and the Population Returns.

From these I found that, in 1841, the population of the United Kingdom was..... 27,019,558
That the money spent in 1849 in alcoholic liquors was not less than..... £60,000,000
The amount paid to the Government for duty alone in 1848 was..... £15,183,833
Giving an average of money spent by every man, woman, and child, in the United Kingdom of not less than..... £2 4 4½
The number of members in the Islington Circuit I found to be 1,648. Presuming that they (principally adults) spend no more than the above average (which, as it includes all the children in the nation, must be under the truth), it follows that they annually devote to intoxicating drinks the sum of..... £3,655 19 6
On referring to the Circuit Missionary Report, I found that, after various meetings, sermons, lectures, collectings, sales of work, &c., the Treasurer had received the sum of only.... £841 19 11
Leaving a balance against the Islington Circuit of..... £2,813 19 7

Pursuing this train of thought I inquired, How much could the united Wesleyan Societies accomplish, provided all the members would become total abstainers, and present the money thereby saved to the cause of Christ?

Referring again to the Minutes of Conference, I found the number of members to be three hundred and fifty-eight thousand, two hundred and twenty-seven, which, at £2 4s. 4½d. per member (as previously stated), would yield the noble sum of..... £795,304 0 0

This sum, if cast into the Lord's treasury, instead of being wasted upon needless liquors, would—
Supply one thousand Missionaries at £300 a year £300,000
One thousand Sunday-school libraries with new books, £20 each..... 20,000
Furnish help to 300 poor circuits yearly, £100 each 30,000
Pay horse-hire for 30,000 journeys of local preachers yearly, at 4s. each journey..... 6,000
Pay annually to the Worn-out Preachers' and Widows' Fund..... 10,000
Pay annually to the Local Preachers' Mutual Aid Association..... 10,000
Pay annually to Kingswood and Woodhousegrove Schools..... 5,000
Purchase thirty millions of tracts yearly, at 1s. per 100..... 15,000
Purchase one million of Bibles yearly, at 2s. each 100,000
Build 100 new chapels yearly, at £2,000 each... 200,000
Build 100 new school-rooms yearly, at £200 each 20,000
Pay to the Normal Seminary yearly..... 5,000
Present the children with one million copies of the illustrated "Band of Hope Review, and Sunday Scholar's Friend"..... 2,000
And leave balances in the hands of the various treasurers for "contingencies," amounting yearly, in the aggregate, to..... 72,304

Making up the total of..... £795,304
The amount actually raised for our Missionary Society, in 1849, was only..... 111,000

With these statements and figures before us, should we not tremble at our want of fidelity as STEWARDS of the talents committed to our trust?—T.—From the Local Preacher's Magazine.

TETOTAL OPERATIONS.

TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION IN EXETER-HALL.

The Fourth of the Second Series of Temperance Demonstrations in Exeter-hall, took place on Monday evening, March 3.

GEORGE WILLIAM ALEXANDER, Esq., who presided, said he considered that the Temperance Movement had, upon the whole, been of a satisfactory character. A few years ago the name of Teetotalism was quite one of ridicule. The number of total abstainers in any given place might seem small, but when he looked at the numbers that might be found in various parts of the world, he thought there was reason for the friends of the movement to be satisfied (hear). At least, there was enough to encourage them to persevere in their efforts. The movement took its rise in America, in consequence of the amount of intemperance which prevailed in that country. It might seem to some hardly necessary to insist on total abstinence as a remedy, but it was thought that so serious an evil required what might, under other circumstances, have been regarded as an extreme measure. And experience seemed to be on the side of those who had proposed that remedy (hear). Not only had the effort been successful for the reclamation of drunkards, but it had effected a considerable change in public opinion as to the nature and properties of intoxicating drinks (hear). If it were only on account of the number of drunkards which had been reclaimed, he should feel that a sufficient inducement to join the society, and he thought that a sufficient ground for any philanthropist or Christian joining it also (hear). He believed there was not a place in which drunkards had not been reclaimed. He might not subscribe to everything that was said by some of the advocates of the practice; but he believed that it was both wise and expedient to do all that could be done to abolish so fearful an evil as intemperance. It was the practice of the present age to try to prove all things; and he judged it wise to try the system of total abstinence. He looked at it, first, in a financial point of view. Men complained of heavy taxation, but they taxed themselves to a far greater extent. Sixty millions a year, at least, were expended annually in this country on strong drink, which gave an average of two pounds per annum to every man and woman in the United Kingdom, or an average of £10 sterling for every family (hear). The results were, that a large portion of persons occupied less comfortable houses than they otherwise would; they had no libraries, no books, and their children were uneducated. That was a specimen of the sacrifices made by many to satisfy an inordinate desire for intoxicating drinks (hear). But for that we should not see so many miserable back streets, alleys, and courts, with habitations unfit for any of the human race. Those evils, and the disease and loss of life which they occasioned, might be traced, in the majority of cases, to the love of intoxicating drink (hear). When he looked on public-houses he could not but regard them as the enemies of the physical and moral health of the great mass of the people of the metropolis; and the case was nearly the same in almost every town. Surely something ought to be done to stay the progress of so fearful an evil. The evil prevailed also in some of the fairest portions of the habitable world. He had lately spent some time in the West Indies, and there he found that intoxicating drinks were producing the same evils as in this country. He found also that the practice of total abstinence produced the same results there as in this country (hear). In the United States of America he found that the practice of total abstinence prevailed to a great extent, and was productive of considerable benefits. Indeed, the changes which had taken place were such as had rarely taken place in any country. There was scarcely any large company into which strong drinks were even introduced. In conclusion, the chairman said, that with whomsoever it might rest to advocate the principle, he hoped none of its friends would cease from labour till the country was freed from drunkards, and till the character of a drunken people ceased to be the reproach of the country (cheers).

Mr. D. G. PAINE began by observing that when a person contemplated for the first time a powerful machine, and marked the results of its workings, astonishment took possession of his mind. But when he was able to inspect closely the various parts of the machine, not only would his wonder cease, but he would rather wonder if such results were not produced. He referred to the steam engine, the paper-mill, and other machines, in illustration. Those results were so many displays of the connection between cause and effect. The same principle would be found in man's moral condition. We were apt to suppose that mind was moulded, and disposition fixed, subject to no law which we could recognise or which we could disannul. In proportion as we disregarded the connection between cause and effect, we should be at a loss to explain what took place in reference to the changes we observed in society. To bring those remarks to bear on the subject of the present meeting. A drunkard was a degraded and wretched being. He suffered greatly in himself, and was the cause of suffering to many others. But the drunkard must be regarded as the necessary result of certain agencies which were continually at work. The drunkard himself was the subject of various feelings and propensities, but the drunkenness was but the necessary result of proximate causes. The vice might appear in various forms, but the one grand feature was, that it was the sure consequence of the steady working of a gigantic machinery in constant operation. That machinery was, the dietetic use of strong drinks, and the customs connected therewith, first creating and then augmenting the appetite for its own use (hear). That was the motive power. When the infant stretched out its fingers for the sugary sediment of the father's glass—when the lips of the child smacked for it—then the motive power began to work. Then the whole course of domestic use brought it before the youth continually; drink was given to the washing-woman, to the dustman, to the postman, to the tradesman, to the visitor, to the minister, to all, and all that stamped worth upon an article which was already endeared to him by its own flavour (hear). When the youth left his father's house, his change of circumstances only tended to the accomplishment of the same end. Trade, politics, religion, were all connected with the use of strong drinks. Patriotism must be drunk with toasts; moral sentiments must be announced and supported with wine. Thus, from the very first sip, through all the usages of society, the machinery was constantly at work. But all that would be nothing if the drink were merely nice, like pastry and other articles of diet, first gratifying and then satiating the appetite. But strong drink produced an appetite for itself; and if that appetite only led to occasional repletion, as did excess of food, it might rouse the physician to action, but the moralist would not interfere. But the indulgence of the appetite for strong drinks led to results which were most afflictive and deplorable (hear). Mr. Paine here traced at some length the career of an individual drunkard in illustration. He continued, observing that the evil might be deprecated, and arguments might be addressed to the man, but still the fact stood out, that drunkenness was the natural consequence of the drinking usages of common life (hear). If that were the fact, then to sanction such usages was wrong; in the philanthropist it was impolitic; in the Christian it was impious (hear). He who encouraged by his example or his influence such usages, was guilty of unwarrantable presumption (cheers). If a parent cast his child into the water, and then prayed that it might not be drowned, would not that be impious? A parent professed to believe in God's ability to save his children, and yet he gave them that which tended, as its natural consequence, to their destruction. Was the parent then a believer in miracles? What right had a man to expect that in the moral as well as in the natural world there should cease to be a connection between cause and effect? (Hear.) Could he who sowed tares reap wheat, or he who planted thorns gather grapes? Then might the man who fostered the love of drink expect temperance (hear). What was the inference to be drawn from such statements? Why, that we had the means of arresting the progress of intemperance perfectly at our command. When a steam carriage was going along at the rate of thirty or forty miles an hour, it would crush the combined efforts of a hundred men to stop it; but if one man with one hand stopped the motive power, the train would soon be brought to a stand (hear). So, while intemperance mocked all our power, and laughed at all the efforts made to check it, it would, nay, it must, stop, if it were disconnected from the principle by which it worked (cheering). Till we disarranged the machinery of intemperance, it would continue to rush on, breaking the hearts and blighting the hopes of thousands and of millions. Another inference was, that those who had the means of arresting the progress of such a fearful machinery had a heavy responsibility resting upon them (hear). They could not prevent the effects of intoxicating drinks when taken, but they might make the custom of using them to be a still and motionless thing; they might put a stop to its achievements. And would they withhold such a power? Should the machine of intemperance be allowed to roll on, breaking hearts, and shattering intellects, and ruining fortunes? The object of philanthropists had hitherto been aimed at upon false principles; and their labour would still be in vain if they failed to aim their blows at the causes of evil. Let the temperance reformers, at least, aim blows at the causes of intemperance, and the country might yet be lighted up by the bright beams of moral glory—might yet become rich, and dignified, and happy (much cheering).

THOMAS BEGGS, Esq., began by observing that one of the grounds of his attachment to the temperance cause was simply that it aimed at prevention, while most of the other reforms of the day were merely palliative. He was glad the Chairman had referred to the wretched homes of the population. Before any great measure of good could be done for the people, attention must be paid to their physical wants. It was impossible to raise a moral, intelligent, and religious people out of a physically debased population (cheers). He would try to illustrate that, and he thought his illustrations would appeal to the interests of all, both rich and poor. He found that the people of London rejoiced in having 491 charitable institutions of one kind or another. 140 of them were hospitals for the treatment of various forms of disease. These institutions expended on the various objects connected with their benevolent missions about £1,764,733. We had beside nearly 9,000 establishments for the manufacture and sale of drink; and the share of the expenditure of drink—which had been estimated by Mr. Porter at £57,000,000—falling to the share of the population of London, would be about £3,000,000 per annum. Was it too much to say that, if we could get rid of the drink-making and drink-selling establishments, we might safely dispense with a great many of the hospitals and asylums? (applause). He was not satisfied with the way bills of mortality were made. They did not refer effects to their real causes. For instance, there were about 16,000 cases of deaths from typhus fever, and an equal number of deaths from consumption every year in London, and some would tell us that consumption was an English disease. The truth is, we had no more business with fever as an annual visitor—we had no more business with consumption—than we had with plague or cholera. If men would observe the laws of health, we should get rid of a vast amount of disease which our establishments were intended to cure. Who were the first victims of cholera when it came, or of typhus fever? notoriously the men and women who enfeebled their constitutions by intemperance of various kinds. On the appearance of cholera in a certain neighbourhood a poor shattered drunkard would be one of the first victims—and then it would be put down in the bills of mortality, killed by cholera—it ought to be, killed by strong drink (great applause). So with a great number of deaths. The drinking system injured the health of the people in another way—it wasted their means. If they spent their earnings in the purchase of assured physical comfort, and in paying the rent of better houses, they would suffer less from disease, and need not make their appearance at the poor-house. He would give them an instance of what was going on. In Bury, in Lancashire, with a population of 25,000, the expenditure upon drink, a few years ago, was £54,190, making £2 3s. 4d. for every man, woman, and child. This sum would pay the rent and taxes of 6,770 cottages at £8 per annum—a number more than equal to the wants of the whole of the population. And yet with this large expenditure upon drink the house accommodation was of a very poor and wretched description: at the very time of making the inquiries, out of 2,755 of their dwellings examined, only 1,668 were at all comfortable, and the cases in which three persons slept in one bed were 773; the cases in which four persons slept in one bed, were 207; and in a great many cases the people slept on rags and litter. This was by no means a solitary case. If time would permit he could show the state of some of the London parishes to be wretched in the extreme, and where vice and wretchedness were the most abundant, there prevailed in the greatest degree the drinking of intoxicating liquors (great applause). He then took the example of the London tailors. They were greatly to be commiserated, but the cure for the evil was not in the plans of Mr. Morgan or Mr. Owen, and he did not refer to it in any contemptuous manner. What were the facts? There were proved to be 23,000 tailors, with employment for only 15,000. The only thing that could help them was to create a demand for clothing. Let the £3,000,000 spent in drink in the Metropolis be turned into the channels of useful industry, and spent upon clothing and other useful articles, and that would create a demand; as a consequence, wages would rise, and we should hear little about distress and difficulty among those really able and willing to work. This argument would apply to the needlewomen. Let working men spend their money upon coats and other garments, and upon gowns for their wives, and articles of apparel for their families, and that would be helping the working classes. Every shilling spent in drink was so much abstracted from the fund out of which the labourer was sustained, and out of which he received his wages. He then referred to the intellectual part of the subject. Drinking men spent no money in books. Why, the population of Ashton spent £14,000 upon drink, and £2,000 upon education. We did not want cut and dried plans of education so much as we wanted a desire on the part of the people to be educated; and then we wanted the people to have self-control enough to give up every kind of indulgence, and spend their money upon the education of their children. He knew one working man who twelve years ago was despised by everyone; now he had a house of his own; and on calculating the other day, he found that he had laid out £20 in the course of a few years in books. That was the way to spread literature among the people (loud and long continued cheering).

The Rev. BENJAMIN PARSONS said it had been predicted that total abstinence would soon lay all who practised it in the grave; but he believed that the system was never so much alive as at present. He himself had been a Teetotaler sixteen years, and he considered that he was younger in constitution by twenty years than when he took the pledge (cheers). He should consider some of the hindrances which were presented to the more rapid spread of the practice. The old opinion was still alive, that alcoholic drinks were very good things. Strange that people had not yet read, in books of undoubted science, that alcohol was a poison. The only rational way of dealing with erroneous opinions was to talk and to write them out of people. Many still believed that strong drinks contained nourishment; yes, about as much in a pint of ale as would lie on the top of a man's thumb (hear). That hindrance, also, must be removed by exploding the error. Another hindrance was the belief that strong drinks were in some way useful as medicine. Hence people were always fancying themselves ill, and always physicking themselves (hear); and yet, though they took the physic, they were never well, but rather grew worse, and of course were spending their money in vain (hear). Their physicians were publicans and spirit-merchants, and they spent so much money on medicine, that they had hardly any left to purchase anything else (hear). Doctors were applied to; but they knew, or ought to know, that those drinks were much more likely to produce diseases than to cure them. He believed that God never yet made a man to whom strong drink would do no harm. Samson was raised up to be a saviour, and a prodigy of strength, and the use of strong drink was forbidden to his mother and to him. The doctors, therefore, needed to be educated before Teetotalism could greatly prevail (hear). Then old nurses stood in the way of the temperance movement. Even where doctors forbade strong drink, nurses would recommend it, partly, perhaps, that they might get a share themselves (hear). It would be a great blessing to the world if there were none but Teetotal nurses. Then the temperance cause was hindered by a number of ladies and gentlemen, non-medical, who yet pretended to much knowledge as to health and disease and medicine. Each had his or her nostrum, but most of them recommended some kind of strong drink. Then came the drinking customs. Almost every movement had strong drink connected with it, and many wise and eminent men had been brought to drunkenness in consequence of following those customs. Tradesmen sometimes admitted that Teetotalism was a good thing, but declared that without the use of drink they could not carry on their business profitably (hear). Commercial travellers found they could dispose of more goods, at a higher price, by treating tradesmen with strong drinks; and many sober tradesmen were taught to drink in that way. Then some females stood very much in the way of the temperance movement, though they, many of them, suffered most fearfully in consequence of intemperance, and though in consequence of their husbands becoming Teetotalers they were surrounded with domestic comforts. The influence of woman was great, and it was sad when that influence was exerted to uphold customs that were highly injurious, and the effects of which would be sure to fall upon their own heads (hear). It would be but a poor excuse to say that they only took a very little; their taking that little kept up the custom, and so perpetuated the evil (hear). Then objections were taken to Teetotalism because of the sanction given, as the objectors said, to the use of wine in the Scriptures; but such persons were always very cautious against using the passages in which wine was spoken of as an evil, and in which drunkenness was denounced. He would defy any of them to prove that port and sherry, and other fiery compounds, called wine by moderns, were ever recommended in the Bible (hear). Then many ministers of religion stood in the way of the temperance movement—some by downright opposition to it, many by their apathy, and still more by the encouragement which their use of strong drinks gave to the drinking customs. The conduct of such persons Mr. Parsons denounced in no very measured terms. He concluded by expressing the hope that these hindrances would, before long, be removed, and that with them would be removed the physical, political, moral, and religious evils which resulted from intemperance (cheers).

JOHN CASSELL, Esq., the treasurer, announced several donations which had been received since the last meeting, and informed the audience that further donations would be needed to enable the committee to carry out the whole of the projected series of meetings. A collection was then made; and the chairman being obliged to retire, the chair was occupied for the remainder of the evening by the Rev. W. W. ROBINSON, Incumbent of Christ Church, Chelsea.

The Rev. R. GRAY MASON, after stating the circumstances under which, fourteen years ago, he was induced to become a total abstainer and an advocate of the practice, proceeded to point out some of the encouragements to persevering exertions to promote its more general practice. The first ground of encouragement was, the soundness of the principle. The principle had stood the test of nearly 5,000 medical professors and practitioners in various parts of the world; they had declared that alcoholic drinks were never beneficial, but always injurious to persons in health; and experience and observation testified to the same truth. Houses were built, ships were navigated, the most laborious occupations were engaged in with success. As a proof that working men could do without strong drink, he referred to the fact that more drink was used after labour than during labour; and often more between Saturday night and Monday morning, than during the whole of the week besides (hear). Sir John Ross and the men who sailed with him declared that they stood the rigours of the climate of the North Sea better without strong drinks than with them. Sir C. Napier testified that soldiers who abstained from strong drinks were better in character and in discipline than those who used them. And the Government evidently acted upon that belief in the various regulations they had recently made in the army and navy, both as to rations of drink and canteens (hear). A second ground of encouragement was the character of the advocates of total abstinence. They had with them a host of men of intelligence, philosophy, patriotism, philanthropy, and piety (hear). Some advocated the principle on one ground, and some on another, but that various advocacy was suited to various audiences, and great good was the result. Mr. Mason pointed out, as a third encouragement to exertion, the nature of the success which had attended the advocacy of total abstinence. That success was both direct and indirect. It consisted not merely in inducing many to sign the pledge, but in the spread of information on many points intimately connected with the prosperity of the community. And so long as the advocates resolved to speak the truth in love, so long success would be sure to accompany their labours. He believed that the cause was making rapid headway; and if they could but persuade what were called moderate drinkers to abstain; if they could but convince them that the respectability of their character tended, if they used strong drink, to keep up the customs of drinking; if they could only have such men on their side, the cause would progress rapidly indeed. Mr. Mason concluded with a glowing description of the good which would be sure to result to individuals and to families, to the world and to the Church, from the general spread of the total abstinence principle, during which he was much cheered.

A resolution of thanks to the Chairman having been adopted with hearty cheers, Mr. ROBINSON congratulated the audience on having had an opportunity of listening to Mr. Mason, and concluded by exhorting them to pray that the Divine blessing might rest on the means employed; and that while they laboured to persuade men to drink of the natural waters, they and those for whom they laboured might all seek the living water which would make them happy in time and in eternity.

WESTMINSTER.

The brethren of the Westminster Tent of the Independent Order of Rechabitis, London Unity, held an attractive demonstration in the great hall, Westminster, on the 12th inst. Notwithstanding the unpropitious state of the evening, the building was crowded by an attentive and respectable audience. Br. J. McCurrey, C.R., presided, and was efficiently aided in the elucidation of the principle and objects of the benevolent order by Brs. J. Holden, C. Archibald, T. A. Smith. Br. J. H. Esterbrooke delivered a special essay to young men on the "Genius and Claims of Rechabitis;" the several addresses were cheerfully acknowledged. The "Temperance Sons of Harmony," assisted by some young ladies, sung several beautiful solos and choruses, which were enthusiastically applauded. The meeting was well sustained, and we hope the impressions made by the advocates will add to the importance and prosperity of this noble institution.

ROCHESTER, CHATHAM, &amp;C.

The thirteenth report of the Temperance Society of the above district states, that during the past year thirty public meetings, for the advocacy of Teetotalism have been held, which were, for the most part, well attended; and in some instances crowded. Upwards of 2,000 Temperance tracts and periodicals have been distributed; and 250 persons have taken the pledge of abstinence from strong drinks, many of whom were formerly in rags, but are now in comfortable circumstances; and others have not only bettered their condition, but have embraced the offers of mercy and salvation, and are now found on the road to heaven.

HASTINGS AND ST. LEONARDS.

In addition to lectures by Messrs. Burns, Perfit, Ripley, Campbell, Shapecott, &c., fifty-two addresses have been delivered during the past year, at the meetings of the Society on the above places. A great number of Temperance publications and periodicals, including the TEETOTAL TIMES, have been circulated, and a Temperance Library formed. Many erroneous impressions as to total abstinence have been removed; habits of true sobriety have been created; and many have been snatched from destruction, and restored to the paths of sobriety, virtue, and religion.

MIDDLESBOROUGH.

The last report of the Middlesborough Temperance Society stated that during the last three years 2,000 persons had signed the temperance pledge. Taking into consideration the moving character of the population, owing to the fluctuations of trade, and the many temptations to break the pledge, the committee have never counted upon the numerical strength of the society being equal to the number of signatures in their pledge-book. In order to ascertain the present numerical strength of the Temperance society, a thorough canvass of the town has been made for that purpose, through the agency of the tract distributors; printed forms were left at each house, with a request to fill in the names of all in the family who were Teetotalers. By this means we have obtained the names and addresses of 1,214 Teetotalers, viz.:—Men, 469; women, 368; children, 378. This number, out of a population of 7,000 to 8,000, must be considered highly satisfactory and encouraging, and an ample reward for all the labour that has been expended. When we further take into consideration that many are acting on the abstinence principle who are not pledged Teetotalers, we may fairly calculate upon one-fourth of the population as on the side of Total Abstinence. A large proportion of the 468 Teetotalers follow mechanical trades, and the following classification must be considered as valuable evidence as to the practicability of working men performing their various labours without the aid of alcoholic liquors; and peculiarly interesting to those acquainted with the men, and who have heard their public testimonies:—Sailors, 70; potters, 43; moulders, 27; labourers, 38; engine-wrights and fitters, 25; tailors, 19; joiners, 16; ship carpenters, 9; blacksmiths, 14; shoemakers, 13; enginemen and drivers, 9; puddlers, 9; chain-makers, 9; steam-boatmen, 10; bricklayers, 5; platelayers, 5; butchers, 6; bakers, 3; plasterers, 2; stonemasons, 2; painters, 2; printers, 2; trimmers, 2; firemen, 2; anchor-smith, 1; boiler-builders, 2; miller, 1; flax dresser, 1, weaver, 1; sawyer, 1; making a total of 349.

MANCHESTER AND SALFORD.

The "Temperance Advocates' Society" of the above district have just published a report of their progress for the half year ending on the fourth Saturday in January last. It states that that period has been one of successive triumphs. Lectures have been delivered by Mr. Grubb, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Lomax, Mr. Greig, Mr. Copway, and others. The meetings have also been well supplied with local advocates, several of whom are trophies of the Temperance principle. About 150 meetings are held weekly. Amongst those who have been induced to adopt the principle of Total Abstinence are to be found men and women, some of them from sixty to seventy years of age, congregated in the various meeting-rooms, for the purpose of learning to read and write, and their progress is marked by the eagerness which they manifest to take home a volume from the Temperance Library. Children once neglected are now cared for; and homes once miserable have become abodes of peace and comfort.

SELBY.

The fifth Working Men's Demonstration in favour of Total Abstinence was held in the Victoria-rooms, when eight of them testified their adherence to, and firm confidence in, the Total Abstinence principle to elevate the working classes, and proved that they could perform hard labour better without than with strong drink. The meeting was one of the most crowded and enthusiastic of this season. The chairman remarked that a young man, aged twenty, now spending 9d. per week in drink and tobacco, might with that small sum insure his life for £100.—The meeting was announced as follows:—

Working Men of Selby, this appeal is to you. Have you not known many a clever workman who has his money, his time, his character, his all, by the drinking of Intoxicating Beverages; have you not known many a man who has put an enemy into his mouth which has

LOST

OR

STOLEN

away his brains, which were worth far more to him than many

A VALUABLE PARCEL

which has been lost? Now, eight of your fellow-workmen will attend at the Victoria-Room, on Tuesday evening, the 25th inst., at eight o'clock, and will show you the folly and the absurdity of such a practice. You will also be told how a young man, aged 20, who is now spending 9d. a week in drink and tobacco, can insure his life for

ONE HUNDRED POUNDS

Working Men! adopt the Total Abstinence principle, and, depend upon it, you will not lose your

REWARD.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

We have just received the seventh annual report of the Ladies' Association for the Suppression of Intemperance. It states that during the past year 162 meetings have been held, 41 visits paid to schools, and 171 addresses delivered. Several of the meetings were held in the open air. As the result, 432 signatures have been obtained, exclusive of a great number taken at meetings, and registered elsewhere. Upwards of 8,000 tracts have been circulated. Many drunkards have been reclaimed and brought to the knowledge and enjoyment of true religion. The report furnishes a number of pleasing instances.

JERSEY.

Mr. G. E. Lomax, of Manchester, has recently laboured in this island, in furtherance of the Total Abstinence cause. The pamphlet against Teetotalism, written some years since by the late Jacob Stanley, having been circulated in the island, Mr. Lomax was desired to reply thereto, which he did in an able manner to large audiences. His lectures have been well attended during his four weeks' stay, were listened to with great attention, and, though he frequently challenged the medical men, ministers, &c., to come forward and refute his arguments, yet none would do so openly. Opportunity was taken during Mr. Lomax's stay to hold a tea meeting on behalf of the sax-horn band lately formed by the Total Abstinence Society, at which about 200 persons sat down; after which Mr. Lomax delivered an address on the "True Grandeur of Nations." At the conclusion of his last lecture a vote of thanks was proposed and carried for his able and uncompromising advocacy of the Total Abstinence cause.

AMERICA.

Mr. Delavan offered to the Washington Monument Committee, a block of marble, on condition that the Temperance Declaration, signed by eight Presidents of the United States, be engraved upon it. The offer has been accepted, and the stone will be placed in the structure, so as to enable all succeeding Presidents to add their signatures to it, with the following noble sentiment upon it:—

"Being satisfied, from observation and experience, as well as from medical testimony, that ARDENT SPIRITS as a drink is not only needless, but hurtful, and that the entire disuse of it would tend to promote the health, the virtue, and the happiness of the community, we hereby express our conviction that, should the citizens of the United States, and especially the young men, discontinue entirely the use of it, they would not only promote their own personal benefits, but the good of our country and the world.

THE BLESSINGS OF TEMPERANCE.—Illustrated in the life and reformation of the Drunkard. A poem. By JOHN O'NEILL. London: W. Tweedie, Wellington-street North Strand.

We have more than once commended this poem to the notice of the public. It is the production of a working man, who, though never a drunkard himself, describes, in excellent verse, the evils, individual, domestic, and social, which result from the indulgence in strong drinks, and the blessings which result from the practice of entire abstinence. We again recommend this poem, first, on the ground of its own merit and practical bearing; next, because it contains four admirable specimens of George Cruikshank's inimitable artistic skill; and thirdly and chiefly, because the author is now very old and infirm, and the subject of want and suffering, which an extended sale of this neat shilling book may considerably alleviate. This edition contains a brief sketch of the author's life by the Rev. I. Doxsey.

Advertisements, and articles intended for insertion, should be addressed to the Editor, 335, Strand, London; also, all orders for the Stamped Edition, with remittance for the amount, in postage-stamps, or Post-office orders, to John Cassell, as above.

The TEETOTAL TIMES AND ESSAYIST may be had of B. L. Green, 62, Paternoster-row, London; Ward, 54, do.; Abel Heywood, Manchester; Kershaw, Leeds; Menzies, Edinburgh; Gallie, Glasgow; and all Booksellers.

TEETOTAL SCALES.

Most of our readers have heard of the "Philosopher's Scales" of Jane Taylor, which were so wonderfully constructed that you might weigh thoughts and feelings in them. In fact, all things, both great and small, were estimated in these marvellous balances. The great globe was put into them, and such flimsy matters as worldly honours, titles, &c., things lighter than air, were all weighed by this ingenious female philosopher. To supply herself with weights, she contrived to balance one thing against another. She tells us, that "A lord and a lady went up in full sail

When a bee chanced to light on the opposite scale."

In one of her experiments, which, for the sake of modesty, she attributes to an old friar, she puts into one scale a monk, who was bare-headed, bare-footed, miserably clad, thin with fasting, and sore from flagellations, so that his supposed merit was enormous. To balance him, or ascertain his weight, she uses the heart of Howard in a very decayed state; when she tells us, that "He found, with surprise, that the whole of his brother Weighed less by some pounds than this bit of the other."

We were lately at a "Working Man's Demonstration in favour of Temperance," and one of the speakers, after stating that he could not make a learned nor an eloquent speech, said that he had brought with him a pair of scales, and, by the permission of the audience, he would employ them; but he entreated them not to use any tricks with the balances, so as to prevent them from being just and upright. He observed, that once, in his occupation as a miller, he was weighing flour, and that he found it difficult to make the quantity full weight; but that, on casting his eye downward, he perceived that the man who was the purchaser was standing close to the sack, and had his foot under the scale, and thus kept raising it, that he might have more than his due. Our friend told us that, to punish this fraud, he suddenly unhooked the balance, and let it fall on the foot of the swindler, so as to confine him there and expose his villany! The use he made of this anecdote was to advise "moderation people" not to use any deception, but to allow the blessings and advantages of strong drink to be fairly estimated in opposition to the benefits of Teetotalism, assuring them that if they were guilty of any dishonesty or want of candour, the scale would eventually fall very heavily on their toes.

He informed us that, on signing the pledge, he was assailed by several of his friends, who told him that they thought he would have had more judgment, intelligence, and firmness, than to allow himself to be duped by the Total Abstinents; and, further, they declared that, now he had abandoned the use of strong drink, he would be excluded from all social and jovial company. Sociability and jovialness seemed to be among the most important advantages which these drinking people derived from their cups. "Well then," said the speaker, "we will put these blessings into the Moderation scale, and I will try what I can find on the side of Total Abstinence to over-balance them. And—

"1. I used to be troubled, when I was a moderate drinker, with almost incessant headache. This was a very painful affair, and more than counterbalanced all the happiness resulting from social company; but since I have been a teetotaler my pain is entirely gone. Here, then, is one blessing to be put into the Total Abstinence scale; for remember I have been a teetotaler nine years, and during that period have not had the headache.

"2. Again: on engaging myself to a new master, I found that he allowed his men so much beer a week, and I told him that, as I was a teetotaler, I should like to have the money instead of the liquor, and at length obtained two shillings a week as a substitute for the poison. Now, two shillings a week, in nine years, amount to upwards of £45. This sum to a working man is not a trifle—it weighs rather heavy; and I shall take the liberty of throwing it into the Teetotal scale, as a weight against all the sociability which may be obtained by means of the drunkard's drink. A working man with £40 in his hand or his pocket, would think himself pretty well off, and almost a gentleman; while the man who swallows this sum in liquors has often nothing to show, out of all his sociability, but a hat without a crown, a coat with the elbows peeping out, shoes with the toes looking through, as if they wanted to know where they were going to; and half of his jovial friends as miserably clad as himself, and, if they are not, none of them willing to show their sociability by feeding and clothing their sociable brother.

"3. I am not going to say that I have in hand the £45. I confess that a good deal of the sum is very widely scattered. Some, for example, is gone over the seas in the form of missionaries to civilise and convert the heathen; but then this is an advantage, because it is doing good to our brethren in distant lands. If I had drunk the money, as my fellow-workmen did, I could have done nothing for the benefit of men in other countries. I should, perhaps, have been frightened at a collection, and, to have avoided giving twopence for the cause of religion, might have stopped at home of a Sunday morning, and spent fourpence in tobacco and ale! It is amazing how selfish many moderate drinkers are, because they waste their pence in these poisons. I hope by-and-bye to meet in heaven some of those people who have been brought to CHRIST through the efforts of missionaries, whom I was enabled to assist in supporting by means of the money which others spend in strong drink. Here, then, is another weight for the Teetotal scale.

"4. I have now the power to do a little for home. I can keep a seat at a place of worship, can give something to the Sunday-school, or any other good society, and be of a little use to my native land, and thus enjoy a pleasure quite equal to that of the sociableness arising from drinking beer; and therefore I shall throw this into the Teetotal scale. I can assure our friends that the recollection of having done some good with my money is to me quite as pleasing a reflection as it would be to remember that I had wasted my earnings on a liquor which had poisoned my body and weakened my mind, and, perhaps, through my example, injured the sociable companions who now desert me because I will not join with them in destroying themselves and others.

"5. I have some of the forty pounds at home in a house comfortably furnished, and a wife and children well provided for. I can also buy a few books, and put by a little money for time to come, so that I cannot bring all the cash saved by Teetotalism before this audience, yet I know pretty well what has become of every penny of it, and am quite satisfied that none has been wasted, and believe that both myself and others shall reap benefits in time and eternity from the manner in which it all has been spent: and therefore I shall throw this as another weight into the Teetotal scale."

We need not tell our readers that by this time the Teetotal scale was become very heavy in the estimation of the meeting, and the scale of Moderation kicked the beam, as if it had not a feather in it; so greatly do the blessings of Total Abstinence preponderate over those of Moderation. In fact, we have tolerable proof of this in the circumstance that few of the advocates of strong drink have now a word to say at our public meetings on behalf of their favourite beverage. We have given above, not verbatim, but the substance of a speech delivered by a miller, and every one must perceive that the arguments are impregnable. We all know that thousands of families among us are in the most abject state, in consequence of what they term the moderate use of these poisons. Many are living partly on charity; and some even become beggars because they are so fond of these stimulants. We have often heard a respectable man, who would have blushed to ask you for bread, or clothes, or any thing else, very earnest in his supplications for beer, cider, porter, or spirits. Now there is just as much meanness in this, as there would be in any other species of mendicancy; and yet persons who would fly in a rage if you were to call them "beggars," are nevertheless more importunate and impudent in their solicitations for these poisons than common itinerant mendicants are for pence or bread. It seems as if you could not raise a people who are fond of drink. They often resort to all sorts of de-basing tricks to obtain the liquor, and then, we had almost said by the just retribution of heaven, are sunk to the lowest degradation by its use. Year after year shows that you must have universal Teetotalism before you can have mankind generally elevated to their proper position as intellectual and moral beings.

Why even the very "sociability" of which our friends talk so loudly is only a farce. To suppose that there is no social feeling except when cups are present, is to pay but a very poor compliment to the minds or hearts of the individuals themselves. What should we say of a mother who cannot love her children until she has taken a glass of gin or rum? Such a fact would intimate that all her affection is in the drink, and that she has no natural regard for her offspring. What a poor miserable soul that must be, which requires stimulants to render it communicative or friendly. We always thought that sociability consisted in the interchange of thoughts and feelings, and that these thoughts and feelings are the offspring of the heart; but, according to this doctrine, all real friendship must be produced by ardent spirits, wine, or beer! Few persons will be bold enough to assert that there was any brewery, wine-vat, or spirit-still in Paradise, and consequently there must have been no sociability between our first parents! The priests were to be teetotalers when they went into the house of the LORD, and therefore must have been poor heartless things when they engaged in the worship of JEHOVAH! What unsocial creatures the Nazarites, Elijah, John the Baptist, and the whole host of the Israelites in the wilderness, must have been, seeing they had no other beverage than water! Infants, also, for the most part, during the early period of lives are teetotalers, and yet these little mortals are among the most social of GOD'S creatures, and often exhibit the tenderest affections. But, according to the ideas of our moderation friends, they can have but little susceptibility of feeling until they begin to drink. Multitudes of women likewise, either from choice or necessity, are practical teetotalers, but still there is no want of kindly feeling among them. Woman is allowed to be the type of every gentle emotion; and teetotal women are not less so than others, nor would their feelings and affections be improved by all the intoxicating drinks in the world. There seems something positively revolting in the idea of a being who cannot be sociable until he has been drinking, or who loves you with an affection which he has drained from a deanter or a tankard. We certainly are disposed to estimate at a very low rate all affection and pleasure which proceeds from such a vile and poisonous source.

Much more, too, is made of the sociability arising from drink than is really its due. These convivialists may use very friendly words when the glass is before them—they may talk of each other as very "hearty fellows," and so on; but we have seen them when disease and poverty and death have been present, and have often found that when the bottle was gone the affection fled. It is one of the most pitiable sights on earth to see these lovers of the social glass visiting a dying brother. In such instances we have sometimes seen the visitors more nervous, and look more pallid, than the friend who was in the arms of death. What a contrast with all this is the affection which arises from principle, which roots itself in the heart, and requires no dram, no baptism with liquid fire, to keep it alive! Here you have affections which disease cannot paralyse, which poverty cannot extinguish, which death cannot chill, and which glow more ardently and steadily in the breast of a teetotaler than in the bosoms of those who are cold-hearted until they take their accustomed draught of these pestilent poisons.

We advise all our friends to provide themselves with TEETOTAL SCALES: they will take up no room, and therefore they may always carry them about with them. Man is a "pondering," or as the word means, "weighing" creature: and we desire that every man and woman should well ponder Teetotalism. They may weigh it in the balances of Scripture, of chemistry, of physiology, of domestic comfort, of national prosperity of sound morality, and pure religion; and especially may employ for their standard weight, all the benefits and blessings of Moderation, and we have no fear of the result of a fair and impartial investigation of our principle either in their theory or practice. TEETOTALISM CAN BEAR THE CLOSEST SCRUTINY.

EXHIBITION TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATION.

To the Editor of The Teetotal Times.

SIR,—I am again tempted to solicit a brief space in your pages on the proceedings connected with the Exhibition Temperance Demonstration. I was much gratified with the various suggestions of my old Temperance friend, Mr. Livesey; though, so far as his views comprise a general tract effort, I scarcely approve; deeming it so such an object too miscellaneous in its nature, and calculated to absorb funds that ought to be especially applied to the dissemination of more "permanent documents," allied in name and character with the Exhibition; and which he has also so strongly recommended. My present communication, therefore, is to enforce the necessity of limitation of objects, and a concentration of effort, so that the evil of attempting too much may be avoided, and that whatever is attempted may be well and effectually done. My reasons of dissuadance against prosecuting tract effort with a view of making an impression upon the visitors, or the citizens of London are: First, that I should judge such effort ill-timed; experience having taught the lesson that times of great excitement, such as fairs, races, holidays, and public amusements, are adverse to successful tract distribution; unfavourable to that quiet collectedness of mind necessary to thoughtful tract perusal. My second I have already stated—viz., the absorption of funds; whereas the limitation of the objects would husband the pecuniary resources, and also concentrate the minds and energies of the Temperance friends to their full and complete accomplishment. Third: Because the legitimate purpose of the effort ought to be to embrace the opportunity afforded through the medium of the visitors to the Exhibition to communicate sound Temperance information to every island, and nation, and continent, in the world. If the opportunity be let slip, or only imperfectly attended to, in the attempt to attain some other extraneous object, it would be "as water spilt upon the ground, which cannot be gathered up again." Fourth, on the principle, that "the poor ye have always with you," I should deem the year following, when public excitement has subsided, and a lull come over the public mind, as a more suitable time for a London, or even a national, tract effort.

In reference to the standard documents, they ought to combine a general and epitomised view of the whole temperance question, to be as extensively as possible gratuitously distributed exclusively to the visitors of the Exhibition, so that they may have to carry with them into the distant nooks and localities of our own country, and to every part of the civilised world, documents fully elucidatory of its great principles and objects—documents that would be text-books for any action they might be induced to take, based upon the information contained in them. Time has stolen so far the march in advance, that there ought to be no time wasted in the attempt to procure original papers; neither need this be a source of regret, seeing that information so multifarious and exceedingly powerfully and well written is already so abundantly extant, so that it requires but a judicious selection to collate and compile such documents as would be worthy of this or any other object in relation to the temperance cause.

I would suggest that, in order to give variety, there be four such documents, not exceeding the extent of eight pages, each page embracing its own independent subject and appropriate heading; the first page of each bearing a few introductory sentences relating to the Exhibition, the purpose sought in the distribution of these papers, the nature of the pledge, the principles, constitution, and objects of Temperance Societies. The subjects for other pages would immediately present themselves: the evils of intemperance and their extent—the drinking usages—medical opinions—crime, disease, poverty, &c. &c.; embracing their various influences on morality, religion, and political economy. Though I should recommend their entire printing in English, as being the language most generally useful, yet, to meet the case of foreign visitants, I would append a brief note in French, Italian, and German, expressing the request that they would preserve these documents, and have them translated and printed in their public journals on their return to their own country.

If these papers were limited to eight pages 8vo, two of them would be equivalent to the larger document calculated by Mr. Livesey, and 1,000 of them, in that case, would cost about 14s., or £70 for 100,000, or half a million for £350; and thus the issue of 500,000 or 600,000, inclusive of the expense of their distribution at the door of the Exhibition, and other items, would probably cost £500. It affords just cause of complaint that the burthen of such efforts generally falls to the lot of a few well-known, liberal-minded gentlemen; and yet I have the confidence to believe that 100 individuals would be forthcoming to follow the generous example of Mr. Livesey, and each giving five pounds would avoid the cause of its being an inconvenience to any. When I call to mind the noble American design to give a Temperance document to every family in Great Britain, and which would have been fully accomplished had it not been for the obstruction presented by our import laws, I think that this Great Exhibition effort should not fail for lack of means.

You will see from the tenor of my remarks that it is only a well-digested arrangement of continuous open-air and other meetings, tea parties, &c., that I think available for producing any salutary effects upon the people of London, and the multitudes of strangers that will be attracted there; they only appear to me to partake of the spirit and characteristics in keeping with that active excitement which will rule the mind and influence the conduct of all at such a stirring time.

In a letter to the committee in London, and in the furtherance of the views expressed in a minute of the Newcastle committee, it is suggested that as much as possible of the positive business connected with this demonstration be compressed within the week, and that the Meeting of Juveniles and the Steam-boat Excursion be postponed to the second week; and that the Thursday and Friday, and, if needful, Saturday, be devoted to the Convention, if such be finally determined upon.

In thus freely making my remarks, I wish them only to be taken as the respectful suggestions of an old friend and ardent well-wisher to the Temperance cause.

JAMES REWCASTLE,
Newcastle-on-Tyne, Corresponding Secretary.
April 17, 1851.

[We believe progress is making towards the accomplishment of several of the objects recommended by Messrs. Livesey and Rewcastle.]

ON THE TRUE ADVANTAGES OF COLD WATER USED INTERNALLY AND EXTERNALLY.

To the Editor of The Teetotal Times.

SIR,—WATER is, without exception, the greatest blessing we have bestowed upon us; as far as regards cold water for potation, nothing can be a healthier beverage. I myself am uncommonly fond of this beverage, and I am subject to no internal pains in consequence; winter the same as summer, spring the same as autumn, I take it; it causes activity, expels all sloth, and doubtless creates purity to the stomach, as well as health to the body. It is no less beneficial applied externally. To one who desires to feel a pure warmth, what can be a better occupation than when a man wakes, to go from his bed into a cold-water bath, and there enjoy that healthy exercise of sponging all over with cold water? such is my regular morning exercise. You will not complain of the cold that attends the practice, for if you tried to be warm by any other means, I doubt much whether you would succeed. Health is maintained and much improved, diseases of all kinds utterly expelled, and, above all, we are making a profitable use of that most excellent gift which the Creator most mercifully has bestowed. I advise all, rich or poor, immediately to adopt a practice from which I have experienced great benefits, and could not have believed that anything in this world could have produced such benefits, either in regard to health or comfort, which can be obtained at so trifling an expense.

Ottery, St. Mary.

RICHARD PASCOE.

CORN WASTED!—"What is the chief production of your district of country?" said an eastern traveller, the other day, to a young farmer in the Miami Valley, as he was refreshing himself with a glass of "bald face," while the stage coach stopped to water. "Corn, sir, corn; we raise on our land about 70 bushels to the acre which we manufacture into whisky, to say nothing about the quantity that's wasted for bread."

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

INDUSTRIAL DEMONSTRATION.

The fifth of the second series of Temperance Demonstrations in Exeter-hall took place on Monday evening April 7, when the audience, which was large, was addressed by a number of men engaged in various laborious occupations. The chair was occupied by CHARLES GILPIN, Esq., who briefly stated that the object of the meeting was principally to have working men addressed by men of their own class. As to himself, his connection with the Temperance Movement had been rather more of the past than of the present. About sixteen years ago he adopted the pledge of total abstinence, and it then became his duty, as assuredly it was his privilege, to promote its interests in every possible way. In its earlier years he had witnessed numerous instances of its marked success.

Mr. MILLER, a brickmaker, from Slough, was first called upon. He lamented that many in his profession laboured and spent their strength for that which satisfied not. They worked hard, sometimes from four in the morning till six at night, and yet spent their earnings in such a way that they had little left for any rational or useful purpose: they exchanged their money for strong drink (hear). So it was formerly with him. He used to return to his home late at night, when he had to encounter cross looks, and angry words generally ensued. The wife was made uncomfortable, and the children were frightened. He had, however, abstained from the use of strong drink for about thirteen years (hear). His work was hard; last summer, as a moulder of bricks, he had made about 994,000; in winter, also, he had worked hard, and entirely without any aid derived from strong drinks (hear). It was in vain that men said they could not do without strong drink,—if they said they would not, that would be the truth (hear). His whole family were teetotalers, and his home was the abode of peace and comfort. Before he became a teetotaler he was in debt; but in the space of two years he had wiped all off, and owed no one anything but love (hear). He had made his wife his banker, and she spent the money prudently. In addition to his becoming a sober man, a friend had guided him to a place of worship, and the result had been a conviction of his real state as a sinner before God, followed by a satisfactory enjoyment of peace with God, and the assured hope of everlasting life (hear). Brick-makers were exposed to heat and to cold, and their work was hard, but he was quite sure that if they would abandon the use of strong drinks, and banish it from their dwellings, they would be well able to perform all their duties, and their homes would be abodes of peace and comfort (cheers).

The CHAIRMAN remarked on one striking fact in connection with the Temperance Movement—namely, that of those who were reclaimed, a large proportion became members of Christian churches. He stated some remarkable instances, which had come under his own knowledge, and observed that professors of Christianity ought seriously to weigh such important facts (cheers).

Mr. THOMPSON, of Islington, floor-cloth maker, could not present himself as a reclaimed drunkard, nor as a teetotaler of sixteen years' standing. Many years ago he heard Teetotalism advocated, and was convinced of its truth, though he did not adopt it till some time after. But having to labour among a dissipated, drinking set of men, he was exposed to strong temptation, having footings to pay, and being near strong drink continually. Providence directed his steps to a teetotal meeting, and he became a teetotaler. Since that he had introduced Teetotalism into the factory in which he worked, and the result was, that footings and drinking fines were abolished, and no strong drink was allowed to be brought on the premises (cheers). Finding the cause in Islington in a languishing state, he founded a Working Man's Teetotal Society in 1846, and they had now about five hundred paying members (cheers). He worked in general from six in the morning till eight at night, but he could do so far better without strong drink than ever he could with it. He enjoyed the best possible health; he took his earnings from the counting-house to his family; their food was sweet; and he was comforted by the reflection that he was doing the best he could to make them happy (hear). He was astonished that shopkeepers and tradespeople generally did not adopt the system, both for their own comfort and for the sake of example, and for the improvement their trade would experience (hear). There were now upwards of 1,200 prisoners in the House of Correction; if these wretched creatures had been total abstainers from strong drink, they might have been useful members of the community, promoting trade, and living virtuous lives (cheers). He strongly urged the adoption of Teetotalism upon all present.

Mr. MUNDAY, blacksmiths' hammerman, said that for twenty-three years he had followed the drinking customs of the country, and for eighteen years he had been a drunkard, and, for the most part, an outcast. He was now a sober man; he had been so for four years, and rejoiced to find himself as such on the boards of Exeter Hall (cheers). Intemperance had robbed him of food, of clothes, of furniture, of character—had caused him to walk many long miles without food, and had plunged him into all kinds of misery. He had to labour hard, and thought it impossible to do so without strong drink. When young, he was told if he did not drink it he would never be a man, or be able to labour. He began by taking a little, and went on till he became a drunkard. By the adoption of Teetotalism he had been reclaimed, and had been instrumental in reclaiming others (cheers). He appealed warmly to the working men present. By drink he had lost character, friends, the love of family—all that was valuable to man; by Teetotalism he had regained all. He had now good food and clothing for himself and family; his lost reputation had been regained; he enjoyed the esteem and confidence of his friends and employers; and what Teetotalism had done for him it would do for them, if they would but adopt it (hear). It was in vain that they said they could not practise it. Let the working men of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales but determine to work out their own freedom; let them but abstain from strong drink, and their elevation and prosperity was certain (cheers). He trusted that the time was at hand when all the public-houses in the land would be turned into shops for butchers, bakers, furniture brokers, and other useful trades (hear). In the firm in which he worked there were between eleven and twelve hundred men; there were large furnaces, and the men were exposed to great heat; but he was sure, from his own experience, that they could do all that was required of them without a drop of strong drink, and if they did so they would greatly prosper (cheers).

Mr. ROBINSON, paper stainer, felt particularly happy in speaking on the present occasion, because it was the fourteenth anniversary of his teetotal life (cheers). It was said that teetotalers were an ignorant set; they might be so as it regarded mere book learning, but that was not education: the best education was that which was acquired by reading the book of everyday life, and profiting by its various incidents. By reading that book he had ascertained the cause of most of the evils by which for years he had been oppressed, and he had also found out and applied a suitable remedy (hear). He had found out that he was every day getting worse and worse in every respect, in consequence of his use of strong drink, and that it was absolutely necessary a change should take place in him, and in his family, if he would avoid ruin. He was so reduced by the use of strong drink as to be unable to lift a cup of tea to his lips without great effort, and had, besides, fits of delirium tremens. One day, while in bed in a miserable garret, filled with bitter reflections on his own profligate habits, his children were at play in the room; they played at "father and mother." The boy who played "father" began to stagger in imitation of a drunken man. "Oh," said the girl who played "mother," "fathers should not be drunk." That artless saying cut him to the heart: as he looked on his wife, his children, his wretched abode, all responded, "No, fathers should not be drunk!" He prayed earnestly for Divine strength, and resolved to adopt Teetotalism. He did so, and had reaped from it unspeakable benefit (hear). While he used drink his employers had reduced his wages, in consequence of his having injured himself in their estimation; but when they found he had become truly sober, they paid up all they had kept back, increased his wages, and advanced him to the office of superintendent (cheers). The paper-hanging trade having become greatly depressed, he had, in consequence of having improved his mind, applied himself to the study of improvements in the trade; he had invented a machine or two, which insured him employment, and he had every prospect of still rising (hear). As soon as he began his sober career, his thoughts were directed to the improvement of himself and his home, and he never was so happy as when he could take home a small bundle of useful things. The wife and children were delighted, and the father's heart went pit-a-pat. The first thing he bought was a great coat, that he might appear decent at the public meetings. Then he bundled out the old broken chairs and crazy table, and supplied their place with new ones. O how greatly trade would be benefited if all working men would become teetotalers! (Hear.) Men would light up their own fires instead of sitting before those in the tap-room; hang up their own coats behind their own doors, instead of those of the tavern; beautify their own houses instead of the gin palaces; put good caps and gowns on their own wives instead of those of the publicans'; and instead of going out late on Saturday night to collect a few "block ornaments" from the butchers, they would go regularly to market at the best time of day, and purchase good useful joints (cheering). When he first became a teetotaler his whole furniture and clothing were not worth thirty shillings; now he would not take £200 for it (cheers); his library, a selection of good useful books, was worth £30; and he had various works of art worth at least £20 (cheers). New ideas as to rank and station in life had sprung up in his mind. Much was said about the distinctions of classes; but sobriety on the part of the working classes would go far to narrow those distinctions, and to beget confidence, and even esteem, between employers and the employed (hear). If employers and the employed were all teetotalers, it would be no longer necessary to have one man to superintend a number; all would be ingenious, clever, inventive, and trustworthy (cheers). Teetotalism had brought resources to view in his mind that he had never before dreamed of; he now found himself able to obtain the mastery over circumstances; he had learned the value of self-dependence; and he was convinced that the working classes would never be truly great or independent till they became truly sober (cheering).

Mr. CARRIGAN, hat maker, said he had been a teetotaler for nine years. He was told at a very early age that he would never become a man, if he did not take a portion of strong drink; and, being anxious to become a man, he accordingly used it. By the use of larger portions he injured his health, his character, and his circumstances, till about nine years ago, when he adopted the practice of Teetotalism; he adopted it, not because the doctors said it was right—though he found that hundreds had testified to its excellence—but because he found that working men could do well without strong drink; and that by abstaining he might greatly improve his circumstances. Regarding himself as one of the producers of property, he thought it inconsistent to spend his earnings in that which did not improve his circumstances, but, on the contrary, injured them materially. He soon found that he must carve his own way through life, and began to work hard, making eight or nine days a week, which, as a cold-water man, he found himself well able to do (cheers). He needed no greater stimulant than the desire to improve his family circumstances (hear). He began with a few shillings, and took an empty room, which he had to furnish; now he was paying £130 a-year rent, and employed a number of men, women, and children (cheers). He had gained the confidence of those with whom he transacted business, who were ready at any time to advance him from fifty to a hundred pounds (hear). He appealed to the working men present, urging them to cease from dependence on others, and to rely more fully upon their own energies. Sober and industrious men, with clear heads, were not likely to be injured or oppressed by any rulers or employers, however despotic (cheers). Let them think for themselves, purchase books and read them, cultivate their intellectual powers; and thus they would secure their own independence, gain the confidence of their employers, benefit their families, and be useful in their day and generation (cheers). Mr. Carrigan concluded by exposing the delusion under which the majority of the working classes laboured in reference to the nourishing and strengthening properties of strong drinks; and also of supposing that the moderate use of such drinks would be an effectual safeguard from the evils of intemperance.

The usual collection was then made, and Mr. Green announced, that through the kindness of R. D. Alexander, Esq., of Ipswich, a large quantity of useful tracts would be distributed at the close of the meeting.

The CHAIRMAN said that nothing was more certain than that the vice of intemperance was practised in all classes of the community, and that the use of strong drinks, in what were called respectable circles, was a source of great mischief, and led to much intemperance. A young friend of his came to Manchester a few years ago, an abstainer in practice, but not having signed the temperance pledge. He (the Chairman) well remembered the time when no circle seemed complete unless that young man was present, and he well remembered the time, too, when that same young man became a drunkard, died a drunkard, and filled a drunkard's grave! And how was that brought about? He learned to drink at the tables of his friends (hear); at the tables of those who stood high in society, persons whom he loved; and he himself brought up in a well educated family, and brought up, too, with every guarding influence except that of total abstinence from strong drink (hear). He fell; and he fell deplorably. If he (the Chairman) were asked, what have the Total Abstinence Societies done? he would answer, with gratitude and humility, placing it as a heave-offering on the altar of the Lord, they have done something to shake the throne of an idol more bloodstained than Juggernaut; it was true they had not overthrown him, but they had raised a bulwark against his attacks. They had not thrown back the waves of intemperance, but they had rescued many families from the destroying flood (cheers). The advocates of the cause had reason to rejoice that they would leave the world somewhat better than they had found it (hear). If their sons were to be brought up to toil, they had freed the workshops, comparatively, from many destructive customs. Were they to be tradesmen, they had succeeded to remove much that was prejudicial to trade and commerce. Were their children to be commercial travellers, temperance principles would not now be found uncommon upon the road (hear). Were they called to move in higher classes of society, thousands that were formerly disposed to laugh, and to pooh-pooh the efforts of temperance men, had greatly lessened the drinking customs, and were looking favourably on the Temperance Movement (cheers). When attention was directed to the working classes, the question naturally arose,—How was it that those who contributed so greatly to the wealth of the nation shared so little in the consequences of that wealth? The answer was ready: Mr. Porter had shown, in his paper recently published, that of the sixty-seven millions annually spent in this country on strong drink, about twenty-seven millions was spent by the working classes; that was a mournful but an unquestionable fact as to the condition of a vast majority of the working classes (hear). He urged them to take the case into their own hands; not to lie in the ditch, calling upon any Hercules to come to their aid, but to rise and help themselves. Those were their best friends who, while pointing them to distant reforms, reminded them that those reforms were only second to that moral reformation which they had full power to effect (hear). Let them learn to curb their own vices; to have good politics at home, and then they would be sure to have good politics abroad; to curb their own appetites, and to stand erect in true and manly freedom (much cheering).

Mr. APPLGATE, coal whipper, remarked on an expression made use of by some speakers, that they were able to do more work as total abstainers than they were before they abstained. He hoped that the time would soon come when, through the instrumentality of total abstinence, less labour on their part would be necessary. Why should it not be so? Surely there was no monopoly of intellect. High sentiments and noble feelings might beat in breasts under a fustian jacket, as well as those beneath the velvet of the noble, or the lawn of the bishop (hear). The speakers had referred to their well-furnished houses, and not without reason; but happiness did not consist in fine furniture; "the mind," to use the language of Milton, "was its own place, and could make a heaven of hell—a hell of heaven." He was not rich, but he thanked God he was happy, and he felt that he had an interest in the Saviour of the world. He had been reared in a Sabbath-school, and the important truths which his teachers sought to impress upon his mind in early youth, had followed him through life, and had been as a voice saying to him, "Sin not against thy God!" But he became a coal-whipper, and the difference between that and his former life was as great as that between heaven and hell. He was still among human beings, but every noble feeling seemed to be stifled in the bud, and every sensual passion found ready indulgence. In such society, though he had never become an habitual drunkard, he learned to drink and to love drink; and then the lips that had been taught in the Sabbath-school to hush the praises of God, learned to blas-

TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATIONS AT EXETER-HALL.

THE SIXTH and last of the SECOND SERIES of Temperance Meetings in Exeter-hall, will take place on Monday evening, May 12, when addresses will be delivered by several ministers and gentlemen from various parts of the kingdom, and, probably, from America. The chair will be taken at seven o'clock precisely. As at that period many ministers and other gentlemen, members of Temperance Societies, will be in the Metropolis, the Committee will be greatly obliged to them if they will send their names and addresses to the Treasurer, Mr. JOHN CASSELL, 335, Strand; as the Tetotals of the Metropolis will rejoice to have the opportunity of giving them a hearty welcome, and of listening to their statements as to the progress of Temperance in various parts of the kingdom.

Those friends who kindly promised donations towards these demonstrations, but who have not yet forwarded the amount, are requested to do so without delay, as the committee are anxious to close their accounts, and to publish a correct list of the contributions.

STRONG DRINK, CRIME, AND DEATH.

SEVERAL fearful illustrations of the connection between the use of strong drink, and the commission of crime, and the penalty of death, have occurred during the last few days, to say nothing of the almost daily cases of fraud, cruelty, accident, offence, and "disorderliness," which result from the same prolific source of evil.

On Tuesday, the 22nd ult., George Carnit, who was tried and convicted at the last Suffolk Assizes for the murder of Elizabeth Bainbridge, a married woman with whom he had formed a criminal connection, suffered "the extreme penalty of the law" at Bury St. Edmund's. When, a few days before his execution, he took leave of his father and his brother, he is reported to have said: "You don't know what great temptation I had. I was wholly unconscious of what I was doing—I was as one lost. I had been taking a great deal of beer during the day, there having been a club dinner at Mr. Payne's—in fact, I was full of beer at the time, and when that was the case, I always became so excited that I never scarcely knew what I did. Had it not been for that, she, as also others, might have led me like a child." Then, turning to his brother, in earnest and forcible terms he begged him to "be warned by his fate, and to warn others also, that the first step towards a sinful course of life was drunkenness; that had been the ruin of him. Had he never indulged in drink it would never have happened." He afterwards attempted to destroy himself, but the instinctive love of life prevented him.

The Carlisle Journal of last week relates a very lamentable occurrence. Mr. William Armstrong, a large farmer and considerable landowner, about 38 years of age, married, and having two children, resided at Sorbie Trees, in Bewcastle, Cumberland. On the Wednesday he visited Brampton, for the purpose of making some arrangements as to property he had recently bargained for. It was market day, and meeting with a number of "friends" from various parts of the country, he had drunk somewhat freely, and when he left Brampton, about eight o'clock in the evening, was apparently the worse for liquor. He was on horseback, and proceeded homewards by way of Cambeck-bridge and Walton. At the inn at Cambeck-bridge he stopped and had more drink, in company with two "friends."

About eleven o'clock at night all three left the public-house together, and Mr. Armstrong soon cantered forward, leaving his friends behind, and was not again seen alive. The next morning, a little before eight o'clock, a girl about twelve years of age went with some milk to the house of the Rev. Mr. Smith, the incumbent of Walton parish, whose house was situated about a mile from Cambeck-bridge public-house. This house stands out of the high road about forty yards, and is on the right hand side of the road, whereas Mr. Armstrong's road was on the left. It was a fine moonlight night, so that the road could not well be mistaken. Inside the gate of Mr. Smith's house, the little milk girl saw a man lying upon his back; his hat was off, and a stick was lying by his side. He was quite dead! On the outside of the gate there were marks to show that a horse had been fastened up there, and that it had stood there a considerable time. Shortly after, Mr. Armstrong's pony was found about a mile from Walton, on its way home. On the inquest held that day, the above evidence was collected from several witnesses; and the Rev. Mr. Smith stated that on the previous evening, near twelve o'clock, he was sitting up alone, when he heard a knocking, which after some little time, the knocking being repeated more loudly and rapidly, he found to proceed from the study window. Being a man of very weak nerves, he was greatly agitated; and in a spirit of self-defence he barred up the window, making a great noise, in the hope of intimidating any parties who might be outside, thinking it was some vagrants. He then took out a pistol, and with a small lantern went to the front door, drew back the bolt and chain with much noise, and looked out. He was near-sighted, and the moon cast long and deep shadows upon many of the objects. He fired the pistol (a revolving one) two or three times, but without aiming at any object, in the hope of alarming intruders. He then went in and shut the door loudly. He afterwards went out to see if there was any one there, looked round with his lantern in his hand, but saw nothing. The result of this firing of the pistol we have already stated. The deceased could not have been far off, as the bullets had passed through a top coat, a dress coat, a thick waistcoat, a linen shirt, and two flannel shirts. It is supposed that he called at the parsonage-house after one of the female servants with whom he was acquainted. At the adjourned inquest, a verdict of manslaughter was returned, and on its being made known to Mr. Smith, that gentleman immediately went off in a state of most alarming derangement. In that state he remained when the last account arrived in town. Thus, through circumstances occasioned, no doubt, by the excitement of strong drink, two respectable families are plunged into deep distress, which may prove but "the beginning of sorrows!"

April 23, between one and two o'clock in the morning, a fire broke out in a low lodging-house in Keate-street, Spitalfields, which at the time of the discovery was crowded with persons, as many, it was said, as 150, most of whom were characters of the lowest description. The fire originated through the recklessness of a drunken woman, named Elizabeth Booth. She came in, the report states, about half-past twelve o'clock, drunk, paid twopence for her lodging, went up stairs, and lighting a candle, took it with her into the "stall" where she slept, and left it burning. The other lodgers were soon awoke by a sense of approaching suffocation, and in an instant the "stall" occupied by the female in question was discovered in flames! A scene of the greatest confusion immediately ensued; in the rush to escape, many were thrown down the staircase and much injured. The wretched woman was dragged out of the burning stall; she was dreadfully burned, and was immediately taken to the hospital, but there was little hope of her surviving the effects of her burns, which were most extensive!

April 24, Frederic Massey, aged 19, was brought before the magistrate at the Marylebone office, charged with an attempt to commit suicide by stabbing himself with a knife at a coffee-house in Marylebone. It came out, upon inquiry, that he had been a teetotaler for a long time, but having at length yielded to the temptation to take a "little drink," it had overcome him, and he formed the determination to destroy himself. After a reprimand, he was delivered to his brother, who promised to take care of him.

We might lengthen our narrative of horrors without any difficulty. But this sample may suffice to admonish us of the fearful consequences of this prolific vice, and to urge us to leave no means untried by which we may arrest its progress. How long shall social gatherings of "friends" be the means of exciting to acts of folly, leading to "wounds without cause," to "sorrow," to "woe," and to DEATH?

TEETOTALISM AND MISSIONS.

A letter appeared in the Nonconformist, some time since, written by the Rev. C. Rattray, missionary, at Demerara, which ought to be read by all officers of missionary associations, candidates for missionary labour, and the friends of missions generally. The writer says:—

"My opinion is, that no man who will not abstain from the use of all intoxicating liquors should be sent out as a missionary; and I know that most of my brethren in this part of the world are of the same mind. Our convictions are so strong on this view of the subject, that the arrival of a drinker, however moderate, to become one of our number, would be deemed a curse rather than a blessing, unless he at once and for ever abandon the use of strong drink. And if there be in this colony one missionary who does conform to the drinking usages of society, there are at least ten Non-conformists to whom nothing less than the conversion of such a one to total abstinence would be greater cause of joy than his departure never to return! At each of our stations there are hundreds of staunch teetotalers. At the one with which I am most intimately acquainted, there is not, so far as I am aware, a single member of the church who uses any kind of intoxicating drink, unless it be strictly for medical purposes."

"VOICES FROM PRISONS AND PENITENTIARIES, respectfully addressed to the Patrons and Teachers of Sabbath-schools."—In answer to several inquiries, we may state that a fourth edition of the pamphlet bearing the above title is now ready, three large editions having been exhausted, and the demand for it still continuing. Some zealous friends of Sabbath-schools are desirous of circulating a large number of this very important document at the forthcoming anniversary of the Sunday-school Union in Exeter-hall; as, notwithstanding the thousands that have been circulated, it is believed that many of the superintendents and teachers are as yet unacquainted with its contents. We had intended to have offered some further remarks on the uncandid and impolitic course pursued in reference to this important question, by some members of the London Committee of the Sunday-school Union; but a letter which appears in the April number of the "Union Magazine" so completely exposes the conduct of the editor of that magazine and others, and so fully justifies the course we have taken, that we consider further notice on our part unnecessary. We are greatly obliged to "G. B." for his letter, and hereby return him, and those other friends who have, in public and in private, exonerated us from blame, our sincere thanks.

THE SECRET OF SO MANY PUBLIC-HOUSES.—The number of such low drinking shops is far above what might be imagined. The fact is that many wealthy citizens, regardless of the consequences which affect the drunkard, derive large incomes from public-houses, and, of course, exert themselves to the utmost to obtain licenses for publicans.

PUBLIC-HOUSES AND THEIR VICTIMS.

THE subject of this paper has been many times touched upon by able writers; but the GREATNESS of the EVIL, and the necessity of, at least, its partial abolishment, renders continual repetition necessary.

In the first place, we must consider the amount of crime, sin, and wretchedness these diabolical places engender, and how great would be the difference in society did they not exist. We do not regard them as hurtful and injurious to mankind merely because they sell alcoholic drinks. Bad as this may be, it is, in our solemn belief, exceeded by the frightful vices created and brought to deadliest perfection through their fostering care. It is more particularly in large towns that gin-palaces and such like entail the greatest amount of harm. Some among them are hot-beds of the most hateful vices—vices which tend more towards the degeneration of man than any others that might be named.

Here the worst passions find nutriment, and those animal faculties which, were it not for the stimulus here to be met with, would lie dormant, are excited to an awful pitch, decreasing the influence of those higher powers, which, in the ordinary course of nature, would keep them in proper subjection. Immorality and sensuality, of the grossest kinds, here find ready patrons. In many of these dens, plans are concocted and arrangements made for robbing, or for the perpetration of some still more heinous crime. When seeking to evade the vigilance of the detective police, it is in these places that such offenders find a secure asylum for a time; thus they answer a double purpose. But let not our readers think that the category of evils thus enumerated, as connected with these odious places, are all, or even half, which exist. We would not offend the ear by entering into details. In passing one of these gaudy, illuminated, attractive houses, it would be well to watch the kind of beings that enter therein, supposing the hour to be between ten and eleven o'clock at night, and the scene to be laid in any of the crowded districts of the metropolis. A female advances,—formerly, perhaps, the pride of some country village, beloved by affectionate parents, whose death she hastened. Now, alas! she has sunk into an abyss of guilt, which has so changed the outward appearance, as well as purity and innocence of her nature, that were her mother, who, while living, prized her above all human things, to be raised from the dead, she would be troubled to recognise her once-loved girl, in the sunken cheeks, and unmeaning gaze, of this now fallen woman. She arrives at the door of the gin-palace! stops, hesitates—the door just ajar—so that the least touch introduces you into the interior;—she enters, like the moth, unable to resist the dazzling light of the taper, and fancying a brighter world within,—she, as the small insect, encounters destruction, and a premature death. . . . We enter also—what a woeful spectacle!—Here we behold similar beings ranged round the bar, drinking large potions of fiery spirit; the bright gas-light falling on the countenances of these creatures, displays a picture too ghastly for us to attempt to describe, for vice in woman assumes an inhuman, and an unearthly character.

WOMEN OF ENGLAND think upon the sinfulness, the exceeding wretchedness of the lives which these your miserable fellow-creatures lead at your very doors, and reflect how far you may be responsible for the continuance of this kind of life. And oh! let me beseech you, if true pity still lingers within you, to strive to the utmost of your power to bring some, at least, back to the path of virtue—to work strenuously and earnestly in the cause of their moral regeneration. Take as guides and examples such resolute, noble characters as E. Fry. Let no obstacle daunt you, be not discouraged by not reaping any present reward; you will have your recompense in Heaven, and all good men will speak of you as the "good angels, as true "philanthropists."

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

pheme, and to use language the most unfitting and unseemly. Meetings were called to advocate the wrongs and grievances of the oppressed coal whippers; at those meetings he took a conspicuous part; and he believed that about 5,000 souls had to thank temperance and temperate habits for their liberation from a bondage the most grievous (cheers). He and his companions in temperance had been instrumental also in shutting up nearly one hundred public houses, and in persuading between three and four hundred able-bodied men to abstain from the use of strong drinks (cheers). But he knew of hundreds who, in consequence of their use of those poisonous compounds, furnished to them instead of money, had been brought to an untimely grave. As he had before said, he was not rich, but he had many comforts he could not have if he spent any portion of his earnings in a public-house. No working man had a farthing to spare for strong drink. None of them would ever have become the slaves they were, if they had not themselves furnished the lash. They were accustomed to talk much of reforms; let them look at home, and wipe out every foul spot they found there (hear). And let them be sure to add religion to their other attainments; they would never attain the position God designed for them, till they became sober, industrious, intelligent, and religious (hear, and cheers).

Mr. MULLINGER, bricklayer, said that strong drink had robbed him of education, and he had, in after life, suffered greatly from the use of strong drink himself. He began by drinking moderately in the parlour, but he found the parlour to be a nursery for the taproom and for excess. He became a degraded drunkard, and neglected himself, his wife, and his home. He was invited to a temperance meeting; and if he had been imprisoned for years, and then suddenly liberated, he could not have rejoiced more than he did when he heard of a way by which he might become free from the miseries of drunkenness. He signed the Temperance pledge; that was eleven years ago, and since that period all things had gone on well. Before that period he had made promises, vows, and resolutions; but temptation presented itself, and he fell again and again. After becoming a teetotaler he applied himself industriously, and after working hard for about eight years, he found himself and his family in happy circumstances. He urged the adoption of Teetotalism upon all present, not only for their own sakes, but for the sake of their families—for the families of drunkards often suffered more than drunkards themselves (hear). In addition to his sobriety, Mr. Mullinger stated that he had become a teacher in a ragged-school, and that, should he be called away by death, he had made a provision for his family far better than any the parish would provide for them (cheering).

Mr. LINIHAN, a porter, stated that he was a reclaimed drunkard, and that he had been a teetotaler eleven years. Like many more he had greatly injured his health, his character, and his circumstances, by his love of strong drink. Had he adopted Teetotalism five-and-thirty years ago, when he first visited London, he need not, as at present, occupy the station of porter. He used to spend his evenings in the public-house, and rarely took home any money to his wife, in consequence of which she was compelled to go out and stand at the wash-tub for a shilling or fourteenpence a day, while he was spending double that sum in destructive drink (hear). It was not altogether from the love of strong drink that he went to such places, but from a desire to read the papers and to discuss politics. One day he was reading in "Cleave's Gazette," a letter from a working man advocating Teetotalism, and stating that blacksmiths were able to do their heavy work without the use of strong drink; he thought immediately that if that were true, he could surely do without it, and that opinion was confirmed on his attending a teetotal meeting. He signed the pledge, and his right hand had never done that good for him which it did that night, in enabling him thus to sign his emancipation (cheers). He soon got better situations, found favour in the eyes of his employers, and had his wages increased. Last Christmas, a handsome silver medal was presented to him by the superintendent of the warehouse in which he was, as a token of the satisfaction he had given. After exhorting the working men present to become total abstainers, and to exert their influence in their various circles, he concluded by saying, "If I have committed any bull, I hope you will excuse it for my country's sake, but I assure you that I made no bull when I signed the total abstinence pledge (much cheering).

Mr. W. WELLS BROWN was then introduced to the meeting by the chairman, as a man who was once enslaved in a country which boasted of its freedom, but to whom he rejoiced to give the right hand of fellowship in this really free country (cheers). Mr. Brown, who, on rising, was warmly greeted, said that he felt much indebted for that very cordial reception, especially as he appeared before them as the representative of a class in his own country more deeply oppressed at the present than at any former period (hear). He was indebted for his present freedom, not to any class of Christians or philanthropists, but to his own energy and a good pair of legs (cheering). His intention, however, was to advert briefly to circumstances in his own history, illustrative of the value of total abstinence from strong drink. He was held by a slave-owner, a professing Christian, who was fond of whiskey toddy, milk punch, sherry cobbler, mint julep, gin sling, and other intoxicating liquors. He would sit drinking these in his rocking chair, with his legs on the table, swinging backwards and forwards, till he fell asleep. He seemed so comfortable that he (Mr. Brown) thought he should like to do just the same; and on one occasion he took advantage of his master's absence to mix himself some liquor, to occupy the rocking chair, to elevate his legs, and to fall asleep. While asleep his master and mistress returned and caught him, and the result was corporal punishment. That determined him to have no more to do with strong drink. He began to meditate his freedom. He had been told that a negro could no more take care of himself than could a monkey; he thought, however, that he would try. He did so. Having saved his pence by not using mint julep, he fled on his way to the land of freedom; that portion of America over which waved,—not the stars and stripes—but the British flag. He travelled, with the North star as his guide, hiding by day and running by night, with the belief that the slaveholder, with his bloodhounds and thumbscrews, was behind him. He arrived in a free state, and found employment, though of a mean and not very lucrative kind. He had a strong desire to learn to read. Having on one occasion earned a shilling by working all night, he thought he would treat himself with sixpennyworth of whiskey toddy, but the remembrance of his former drinking bout and punishment restrained him, and he purchased a sixpenny spelling-book and sixpennyworth of barley sugar. With the sugar he persuaded the children of his employer to teach him to read; and if there were in that assembly any who were tempted to spend their earnings in strong drink, he recommended them to copy his example, and to purchase some book, by the perusal of which they might improve their minds. Mr. Brown was greatly cheered during the recital of these adventures.

Mr. McCURRY proposed, and Mr. ROBINSON seconded, a resolution of thanks to the chairman, which was carried with acclamation, and briefly acknowledged. At the close of the meeting some signatures to the pledge of total abstinence were obtained. It was announced that the next meeting was to take place on Monday evening, May 12, when several ministers and gentlemen from the country were expected to take part in the proceedings.

SAFFRON-HILL.

The "Good Samaritan Temperance Hall," in St. Peter's-terrace, Saffron hill, the station newly fitted up and occupied by the committee and members of the Farringdon Temperance Society, was filled on Friday, the 18th of April, with a large and respectable audience. After partaking of an excellent tea, a public meeting was held, over which the Rev. Mr. MILES, President of the Conference of Wesleyan Methodists of New York, presided. An appropriate chorus having been sung by a select band of Temperance vocalists,

The CHAIRMAN said that he rejoiced to find himself amongst those who were banded together to destroy the being denominated by Shakspeare "the Devil." He stated that he was one of seven who joined the society at Hastings, Sussex, some years ago, after listening to an inelligent lecture by the late Mr. H. N. Rickman. Since that period he had resided for some years in America. There the cause of Temperance was going on well; and the principal reason, next to the Divine blessing, was, that there they had the ministers with them. Generally speaking, the people there could not endure to sit and listen to a minister who talked about religion in the pulpit, and then went and swallowed the liquid devil. He found that there were a few ministers in England who espoused the cause; but some, even of these, were only of a middling sort—teetotalers in practice, but never asserting or maintaining the principle in public. He would have all who believed the principle to be a good one to come out boldly, and speak with force against that which God had denounced in his Word. The Chairman proceeded to relate some fearful cases of the evil wrought in families and on individuals by the use of strong drink, and dwelt on the vast importance of exertions to check so fearful an evil. Christians especially were bound to denounce the use, the manufacture, and the sale of strong drinks; and the Church of CHRIST should take up the matter as a moral question, and one affecting the well-being of thousands. The Government of the country were highly to blame for licensing a system fraught with so much injury to the community. The Chairman concluded a very interesting address by exhorting teetotalers to press forward in their noble career. The star of hope was rising upon them, and the blessing of God would rest on their exertions.

Mr. J. W. GREEN justified the conduct of the Committee in opening that station. The district was one proverbial for profligacy, poverty, and wickedness, and the principle of total abstinence from strong drink was just the instrumentality suited to the case. There were numerous difficulties to encounter, such as ignorance, prejudice, appetite, &c.; but the past history of Teetotalism encouraged the hope that at no very distant period a great and glorious change would be effected.

Mr. J. H. ESTERBROOKE furnished some thrilling narratives of cases in which he had been honoured as the instrument of reclaiming individuals who, having become desperate through the use of strong drink, had ruined their families, and had more than once meditated suicide and murder. He cited these instances both to justify and encourage exertion, and founded upon them an eloquent appeal to Christian professors, to philanthropists, to females, and to the young, to leave no means untried by which they might rouse thoughtless drunkards to a sense of their danger, and rescue from the gulf which yawned to receive them.

Mr. HENSON, a man of colour and an escaped slave, was then introduced by the Chairman, and was warmly greeted by the audience. He said that, though young, he had been engaged in advocating the cause of Temperance for some years. He loved that cause, and rejoiced to know that the blessing of God was upon it. The prayer that was first presented to heaven for the success of that cause was one of the most important that ever rose from earth—for on its success depended the deliverance of thousands from one of the most fearful evils by which the bodies and souls of men were ever afflicted. If there were any present that evening who were given to the use of alcoholic drinks, he exhorted them most earnestly to embrace that opportunity of obtaining deliverance. He concluded by relating some striking instances of reclamation.

Mr. DUFFY made several very amusing and instructive remarks upon the name by which that Society was designated, the district in which it was located, &c. He rejoiced to find that the Harp-alley Society was vigorous and active, and that, like the famed banian-tree, it was spreading its branches and striking its roots in new directions.

Mr. BIRT said, that the object of the society whose committee had convened that meeting was to improve the district; and he proceeded to point out the several respects in which Teetotalism was likely to effect that object. Having furnished a graphic description of the salutary changes Teetotalism was capable of effecting, and which it had effected in so many delightful instances, he maintained that teetotalers had powerful claims on the Government of the country in consequence of the good they had wrought, and might with great propriety apply to it for pecuniary assistance. They had been instrumental in reclaiming thousands whom magistrates and others had sought to reclaim in vain.

Mr. J. W. GREEN proposed a resolution of thanks to the Chairman. He rejoiced to find him present as a Christian—as a Christian minister—and as a Christian minister connected with a denomination which, with some pleasing exceptions, had not only done little to promote the cause of Temperance, but had placed many difficulties in the way of those who promoted it zealously.

Mr. WHITEHEAD seconded the resolution, and it was carried with cheers.

The CHAIRMAN, in acknowledging the vote, referred to the circumstance of his connection with the Wesleyan Methodists of America. He was formerly a Wesleyan local preacher in England. He went to America in 1833. He soon found that a large portion of the Wesleyan Episcopal Methodists of America were slaveholders, and dealers in or consumers of rum. What with slavery and rum, there was little religion among them. A number of individuals having seceded from them in consequence of difference of opinion on those two important questions, he (the Chairman) united with them, determining to have no fellowship with slaveholders, or with persons who made, or sold, or used strong drink. He concluded with an exhortation to all present to cultivate righteousness as well as temperance, and to be conscientious in their observance of all the commandments of God.

A resolution of thanks to the ladies and gentlemen who had enlivened the proceedings of the evening by singing numerous choruses and melodies was carried with acclamations, and briefly acknowledged by their leader, Mr. Aldis.

MARYLEBONE.

The tea-party and soiree of the Fitzroy Teetotal Association, at the Society's-hall, Little Portland-street, St. Marylebone, on Good Friday, was well attended. 250 sat down to tea at the time appointed; after which the company were interested by a number of recitations, temperance melodies, and a selection of vocal music, with instrumental accompaniments, Mr. Poulter presiding at the piano. Addresses by Messrs. Kilpatrick (Hammersmith), Beesley, and John Davis were delivered; Mr. Vallance occupying the chair. The meeting terminated at half-past ten.

FINSBURY AND HOXTON.

According to annual custom, the committee of the Hoxton and Finsbury Ladies' Teetotal Association held a tea festival in the school-room adjoining the Tabernacle.—After tea the chair was occupied by Mr. W. Green, of Hackney, who commenced by expressing his belief that the teetotal cause was never in a better condition than at present. Many acknowledged the excellence of the practice who had not the courage or sufficient self-denial to adopt it, and many adopted it who had not the courage to avow it; still, in various ways, progress was made. He urged upon the females present, and especially upon those who were mothers, the vast importance of training up their children in the temperance principle, and of doing all they possibly could to shame intemperance out of the land.—Mr. Genibird furnished an interesting detail of his experience, of the privations, individual and domestic, which he endured for some years in consequence of his love for strong drink, and of the delightful changes which had gradually followed his adoption of Teetotalism. He had become sober, abandoned wicked associates, improved his health, acquired provident habits, assumed the profession of religion, and was in all respects a better and a happier man.—Mr. J. W. Green dwelt on the importance of the teetotal practice on the part of females, for the sake of the benefit they would derive from it as to health, personal appearance, and happiness; for the sake of others who would be benefited by their example, advocacy, and influence; and for the sake of the society, in connection with which they might become efficient advocates, tract distributors, visitors, collectors, &c.—The Rev. Mr. Symons observed, that when men did anything which God never intended they should do, it generally happened that they received retributive punishment. That was remarkably the case in reference to strong drink. God never intended it for man; but man took it, and disease, want, crime, misery, and death were, in a vast number of cases, the consequences of his temerity. It was necessary that such an evil should be plucked up by the roots; and therefore he advocated the practice of total abstinence, as also because of the beneficial results which were sure to follow its adoption.—Mr. Greyne described the gradual and almost imperceptible degrees by which he came to love strong drink, the misery which strong drink had wrought in his family, and the benefit he had derived from twelve years' practice of total abstinence.—Mr. Jeffcoat, the master of a Ragged-school, related several most appalling instances of the ruin and misery inflicted by the use of strong drinks. Ragged-schools and city missions were very well in their place, and were certainly instrumental in effecting great good; but if the parents could be induced to become sober they would send their children to good schools, and would themselves attend places of religious worship. Total abstinence had been the means of bringing thousands, once vicious and miserable, to the enjoyment of the blessings of true religion. Other benefits also had resulted. He had recently read that, out of £50,000 raised by Building or Freehold Land Societies, it was estimated that about £30,000 of that amount consisted of money saved by the sober habits of men who once spent their earnings in the public-house.—Mr. Birt remarked that there was a threefold power operating against teetotalers—namely, the licensing system on the part of the Government, the traffic in strong drink, and the use of strong drink by such large portions of the population. Nor was that all. Professing Christians and Christian ministers either regarded the Temperance Movement with apathy, or placed difficulties in the way of its progress. Still the cause was prospering; and let them but get the working classes on their side, and especially the female portion, and Teetotalism would soon effect the most delightful changes. He besought professing Christians to put their little glasses and half-pints and similar indulgences in one scale, and the disease, want, crime, misery, and ruin inflicted by strong drinks in the other, and then let them decide as conscience should dictate.—The meeting was then concluded with a brief address by the Chairman.

HAWKSTONE-HALL, WATERLOO-ROAD.

An interesting gathering of Teetotalers took place in the above commodious Hall on Easter Tuesday. After the company had partaken of refreshments, which were served up in excellent style, the chair was taken by the President of the society, W. West, Esq., and a public meeting was held, when the Hall became full. Suitable pieces were sung by the Temperance chorists.—Mr. T. B. Smithies, after relating some affecting instances of declensions from religion among Sunday-school teachers of his acquaintance, in consequence of their adopting drinking customs, he compared teetotal societies to life-boats, put out to rescue poor drowning drunkards from misery and death, and exhorted the teetotalers to exert themselves to the very utmost to save as many as possible.—Mr. Duffy thought the society had cause to congratulate itself, and to thank God for the good which had already been effected through its instrumentality. They had made many breaches in the enemy's wall, and they might hope soon to gain access to the citadel, and rout out the leaders of the great mischief.—Mr. J. W. Green addressed the young persons and children, assuring them that the more aged portion of the audience sincerely wished them to be truly happy through life, and that, therefore, they wished them immediately to become teetotalers. The essentials of happiness were health, intelligence, a good reputation, a decent competence, and religion;—these were all more or less interfered with injuriously by the use of strong drink, and materially strengthened and insured by total abstinence.—Mr. T. A. Smith dwelt on the non-necessity and injuriousness of strong drinks, in connection with their expensiveness, as reasons why they should be totally abandoned.—Mr. J. H. Esterbrooke furnished some remarkable instances of want and misery occasioned by the love of strong drink, and of reclamation by means of total abstinence; and upon these he founded a powerful exhortation to parents and other classes of the community to promote the Temperance Reformation by every means in their power.—Mr. J. Davies related briefly the result of fourteen years experience of the benefits of Teetotalism.—Mr. Harper referred to the way in which Easter Monday was spent about a century ago, and read an advertisement announcing several brutal and cruel sports at a place near London, about the year 1716. Though there was still much intemperance, it was certain that a very marked improvement had taken place in the habits and pursuits of the population.—The proceedings of the evening were much enlivened by the performances of the Temperance chorists, to whom as well as to the chairman, votes of thanks were presented with acclamations.

LEWES, SUSSEX.

This town has recently experienced the benefit of nine lectures, by Mr. James Teare. Seven were delivered to adults, and one to juveniles, in the Mechanics' Lecture-room, and one in the open air. A powerful impression in favour of our principles has been produced. The Rev. Henry Lawrence (Baptist Minister), and other members of the society presided on the different evenings, with the exception of Thursday, April 10, when the chair was occupied by C. H. Lovell, Esq., M.D., of London. Mr.

Teare's Lecture on the History of the Origin and Success of Teetotalism, was remarkably well received; and of his uncompromising method of advocacy, his hearers evidently approved. He boldly commented on the conduct of two deacons, who refused to allow his meetings to be announced in their chapel, and urged upon his hearers the duty of making an aggressive movement towards all who offer similar opposition to the Temperance Reformation. At the close of his last lecture (previous to rendering a vote of thanks), the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—"That this meeting, recognising the Scripture test, that a tree is known by its fruit, is fully convinced that the whole drinking system is immoral, that the actions of those who encourage it by malting, brewing, distilling, selling, drinking, giving, or offering, are morally wrong, and that a solemn call is made to every patriot, philanthropist, and Christian, to give their example, support, and unflinching advocacy to the Temperance movement."

BRIGHTON.

The members of the "Band of Hope" held a festival meeting in the Town-hall, on Monday, March 31. Upwards of four hundred took tea, after which the Rev. Thomas Spencer, A.M., presided over a public meeting for the advocacy of Temperance. He remarked on the influence of strong drink to injure the body, and, through the body, the mind. If children were brought up with plenty of fresh air and exercise, with plenty of wholesome food and the natural beverage, there would be ruddy faces, healthy bodies, and long and happy lives. Having explained at some length the kind of education which he considered most useful, he concluded with some instructive remarks on the provident habits induced by the practice of total abstinence, and instanced the following case:—"A wife went to a Freehold Land Society, and wanted to pay in for a house; she was told that being a married woman, this was not legal; but still she persisted in having her own name put down. The clerks at the office asked her why she was so pertinacious, and her reply was—'Why, my husband is paying in for a piece of land, and he thinks I don't know it; and I want to pay in for a house, which he shan't know; and one of these days, when we have paid in enough, and he comes home and says, "Mary, I have got a piece of land," I want to be able to say, "John! and I have got a house to put upon it."—Mr. J. H. Esterbrooke, founder of the "Band of Hope" in Westminster, depicted in very graphic style some of the fearful scenes he had himself witnessed as the results of intemperance, and the altered circumstances which had followed an adoption of the teetotal pledge; much of which he attributed to the teaching which drunken parents received from children who attended the ragged-schools. Though Teetotal Societies were not religious societies, they were, in a great number of cases, successful pioneers to the teachings of the ministers of religion.—Votes of thanks to the Committee, the Chairman, Mr. Esterbrooke, and others, were moved and seconded by Messrs. Wakeford and Ripley, and by J. D. Bassett, Esq., of Leighton Buzzard. The meeting was attended by nearly 900 persons, and at the close sixty-two signed the pledge.

DITCHLING, SUSSEX.

Thinking it advisable that the principles of Total Abstinence should be introduced into this village, two open-air meetings were accordingly held on Good Friday, April 18, 1851—the first in the afternoon, when addresses were delivered by Mr. J. Ripley, Mr. J. Hilton, jun., Mr. C. E. Verrall, Mr. J. H. S. Wakeford, of Brighton, and Mr. A. Morris, of Lewes; after which, about sixty persons sat down to a comfortable tea. The second meeting was held in the evening, which was addressed by several reclaimed drunkards. Four signatures to the pledge were obtained. A society has since been formed in this village, of which Mr. J. Hilton, jun., is the president, Mr. J. H. S. Wakeford and Mr. A. Morris the vice-presidents, and Mr. C. E. Verrall hon. sec.

IPSWICH.

The cause of Temperance is making rapid progress here, through the indefatigable exertions of Mr. F. Atkin, the Temperance missionary. Since his connection with the Ipswich Society we have held two public meetings weekly in our commodious Temperance-hall. Addresses are delivered chiefly by working men, interspersed by temperance melodies, and each meeting concluded by a powerful address by Mr. Atkin to large and attentive audiences.

A members' meeting is held once a month to give each member an opportunity of stating his experience.

A Band of Hope has likewise been formed of several hundred young teetotals, when temperance songs are sung, and addresses delivered by the children and by the Temperance missionary. At their last meeting, Monday, April 7, about two hundred juveniles were present. Each child is presented with a tract, or Band of Hope Magazine, kindly furnished every month by our president, R. D. Alexander, Esq. Since Mr. Atkin commenced his labours amongst us, in November last, upwards of four hundred persons have signed the pledge at our public meetings.

On Wednesday, April 9th, a public tea meeting was held in the Temperance-hall. Nearly five hundred persons were present. After tea a meeting was held, R. D. ALEXANDER, Esq., in the chair.

Mr. MARTIN, from Lovestoft, gave a short speech, and was followed by the Rev. T. SPENCER and others.

The committee-room of the Temperance-hall is to be opened as a reading-room for the working classes, at one penny per week. The room will be supplied with daily and weekly newspapers, periodicals, and a library.

EPWORTH, LINCOLNSHIRE.

The anniversary festival of the Total Abstinence Society, of the above place, was celebrated on Good Friday, April 18, in the Court-house, when more than 100 partook of an excellent tea. After which a public meeting was held, and the room was well filled. Mr. Wm. Read, jun., presided; and addresses were delivered by Mrs. Theobald, of Derby; Mr. W. Tomlins, Ferry; Rev. W. Hudson, Methodist Minister; Rev. S. Mann, New Connection; Rev. T. Greenbury, Primitive Methodist Minister. After which a number of persons took the pledge.

KIRTON LINDSEY, LINCOLNSHIRE.

April 12, a Temperance meeting was held in the Wesleyan School-room. Mr. Smith, Baptist Minister, was called to the chair, and addresses were delivered by Messrs. Partridge, Bailey, and others, who showed at length the evils of the drinking system, and the good resulting from Teetotalism. Several persons signed the pledge at the close.

BOSTON.

The Teetotal League recently formed here by the union of two societies, is going a-head. Weekly meetings are held in different parts of the town. The tea-meeting, held a few evenings ago in the Town-hall, was a bumper; and, from the means now used, numbers are joining the ranks of Teetotalism, and exchanging misery for happiness, disease for health, intoxication for sobriety. Branch societies are established in neighbouring villages, which are visited by speakers and lecturers connected with the League. Messrs. Noble, Mathews, and Beck are appointed delegates to the World's Temperance Convention in August.

SCARBOROUGH.

The Fifteenth Annual Tea Festival of the Temperance Society was held on Easter Tuesday in the Town-hall. About four hundred persons were present; Mr. E. O. Tindall in the chair. Various Temperance hymns were sung during the evening.—The report for the past year was read by Mr. R. Lee.—The meeting was afterwards addressed by Mr. Rowntree, the Rev. W. Mackenny, the Rev. B. Evans, the Rev. J. Dawson; the Rev. W. J. Stewart, and Mr. Benjamin Glover, on the Evil and Demoralising Effects of Strong Drink on Mankind—the best means to be adopted for reclaiming the poor drunkard—and the happy results that would accrue from the universal abandonment of these liquors.—The various speakers were listened to with much attention, and the company separated highly gratified.—Public meetings were also held on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday evenings, in the Hall of Commerce, at which Messrs. Glover, Stuart, and others, took a prominent part. Altogether, this anniversary has given great satisfaction.

PRESTON, LANCASHIRE.

The fourth anniversary of the "Grimshaw-street Sabbath-school and Congregational Total Abstinence Society" was celebrated by a tea party on Tuesday, April 15. When the company had partaken of the social cup, the Rev. R. SLATE took the chair, and, after a few observations, called upon

The SECRETARY (Mr. Davis) to read the report. From this it appeared that there are upwards of 200 persons connected with the society. About 18 teachers and a large portion of the scholars in the Sabbath-school were connected with the society. In pursuance of a suggestion made by Mr. Livesey at the last anniversary meeting, 5,000 tracts bearing on the temperance question had been printed, and a system of house visitation commenced; and so far as it had been carried out, this system had proved satisfactory and encouraging.

The Rev. F. SKINNER, of Blackburn, was gratified to hear that so many of the teachers connected with the Sabbath-school had taken up the temperance principle. The teachers in a Sabbath-school, had very great influence, not only upon those that were immediately committed to their care, but in many instances over the minds and the conduct of the parents of the children that constituted their classes. He was glad also to know that so many young people were here associated in this good cause. The friends of temperance anticipated that in many instances their efforts would be blessed, as they had been blessed in times past, for the reformation of the drunkard; but still, they were prepared to affirm that their hope was not so much in effecting reformation as preventing the evil. Teetotalers believed that the use of intoxicating liquors was unnecessary for the accomplishment of any of the objects for which they were generally used—either for the purpose of imparting health, or strength, or energy, or for the purpose of manifesting kindness in acts of hospitality. He believed there were comparatively few places where greater efforts had been made to show to the public generally the false views which had obtained respecting the beneficial effects of these liquors than in Preston. Mr. Livesey's "Malt Lecture" was of itself pre-eminently fitted to open the eyes of any individual who would examine it, and to produce a deep conviction upon the mind of every individual who would give it a candid investigation (hear, hear). Many of the most distinguished medical men in the world had given forth their unbiased and very strong testimony in favour of Teetotalism. After an earnest appeal to his audience on behalf of Teetotalism, the rev. gentleman concluded by moving the adoption of the report.

The Rev. J. THOMPSON (Association Methodist minister), seconded the resolution. He enlarged upon the importance of Christian churches becoming also Total Abstinence churches, amusing the company with several humorous and appropriate anecdotes, and expressed his conviction that so long as drinking customs prevail no system of education would elevate the working classes.

Mr. BRADLEY thought that if the whole of the Sabbath-schools in this town and the same proportion of scholars and teachers connected with Total Abstinence Societies as this society had, we should not hear of so much crime being committed by Sunday scholars as was represented to be the case at present. He described the pernicious influence of the public singing-rooms in this town, and expressed his opinion that if the ministers of the various denominations would undertake to visit those places, they might deter from going thither such of their Sunday scholars as were in the habit of frequenting them.

Mr. WILSON ascribed his conversion from drunkenness to teetotalism to a sermon preached by Mr. Slate from the text—"Wine is a mocker, and strong drink is raging." He stated that in that part of the prison with which he was connected there were 75 prisoners, of whom 62 or 63 stated—and he had every reason to believe they were speaking the truth—that they had been Sunday scholars. Those who had not were principally old men. Four had been teachers, and one had been secretary to a Sabbath-school of which his father was superintendent for twenty years. The time these prisoners attended Sunday-schools varied from six months to thirteen or fourteen years.

Mr. JOHN HARGREAVES having briefly addressed the meeting, the CHAIRMAN and Mr. THOMPSON signified their intention of acting upon the suggestion of Mr. Bradley by visiting the Albion singing-room.

Thanks were then voted to the chairman and to the ladies who presided at the trays, and the meeting shortly afterwards separated.

IRELAND.

WEXFORD.

A crowded and influential meeting of the Temperance Society of this place, was held last week in the Temperance-hall, Selskar.—Sir F. Le Hunte was called to the chair. He dwelt forcibly on the importance of enlisting young persons in the cause of Teetotalism, and expressed his hope that the 202 names of members already enrolled in that hall would soon be doubled.—Dr. Boxwell enlarged on the evil effects of intemperance.—The Rev. W. Moran, delivered an impressive speech, in the course of which he read extracts from the writings of Dr. Doyle and W. Cobbett, illustrative of the evils of intemperance.—Dr. White stated, amidst the loud cheering of the audience, that he came to avow himself a teetotaler. Though he was never intoxicated in the whole course of his life, he had “never rejected the reeling grape;” but he took the pledge as a protest against Ireland’s greatest sin, and at a period when every sacrifice that charity and patriotism called for should be cheerfully and generously made. He enlarged on the evils which intemperance inflicted on individuals, families, and nations, and intimated his confident belief that if it were banished from the land, the people would become contented and happy.—Mr. C. Gifford exposed the dangers of moderate drinking, and considered those who drank any portion of strong drink, and yet pretended to be friends of temperance, as no better than hypocritical pretenders.—Mr. D. Devitt dwelt on the many advantages he had derived from giving up strong drink and tobacco; the use of both which was a waste of money, and injurious to health.—The Chairman, in conclusion, expressed his great gratification in seeing their respected fellow-townsmen, Dr. White, taking the pledge. He exhorted females to take the pledge, and to get their children to take it, and to form “Bands of Hope” to strengthen and extend the cause both in the present and the rising generation. At the close of the meeting, the pledge was administered to between thirty and forty persons.

SOUTH AFRICA.

PORT NATAL.

On November 1, 1850, a teetotal meeting was held at Pietermaritzburg, Mr. Brickhill in the chair. Mr. Buchanan, Q.C., and six years a teetotaler, spoke on the licensing system.—Mr. Odeli, late of Woburn, Beds., delivered an heart-stirring speech, showing what he himself had experienced by using strong drink.—Mr. Mildman having addressed the meeting, Mr. Roberts, of the Record-office, followed, and said he found from the official books there had been forty criminal cases in the colony during the past five years, of which twenty-two English and two blacks were for thieving while in liquor.—Mr. G. J. Draper, late of London, then spoke, detailing the evil effects of intoxicating drinks at home, and the work of demoralisation carried on among the natives of the colony by the introduction of strong drinks by the white man; and appealed to the audience to become abstainers, and set a good example.

On January 1, 1851, a teetotal tea-party took place. 130 sat down to tea. The meeting was addressed by various speakers, and twenty signed. Sir Joshua Walmsley’s son is at this place, and recently signed the pledge. Teetotalism is very popular here, though drunkenness is at the same time monstrous. Suicides and premature deaths are continually occurring. Mr. Russom, late of Bristol, delivered a lecture soon after his arrival here, in the Court-house, to a crowded audience. A number of influential signatures ensued.

On January 6, a teetotal tea-party was also held at D’Urban, at which 150 were present; after which, several addresses were delivered, Mr. Russom and others taking part, and some signatures were received.—From a correspondent.

MR. J. RUSSOM IN AFRICA.

THE name of John Russom is familiar to many of our readers. He was for some time connected with the British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, whose head quarters were in London. He removed to Bristol, where, for some years, he employed himself zealously to promote the principles of Teetotalism. Last year he emigrated to Africa, and from Port Natal he has recently addressed a letter to Robert Charleton, Esq., of Bristol, which contains much matter of deep interest, especially to intending emigrants. From a copy of the letter, which appeared in the Standard of Freedom, of April 19, we extract the following, in proof that Mr. Russom has carried with him that zeal for the promotion of true temperance which so distinguished him while in this country. After describing the very unfavourable circumstances under which he arrived on shore with his family, he proceeds thus:—

“The miseries of this never-to-be-forgotten first night in Africa were aggravated beyond description by several of our passengers being brought in by Kaffirs in the most deplorable state of drunkenness. At about one o’clock I had to rush into an adjoining apartment, amidst the cries of ‘Murder!’ and at two attempts, in the dark, I rescued from bed three lovely children, of the ages of about six, four, and two years, amidst the ravings of a maniac mother and a drunken father. During the fray I lost a shoe, and had to hop about on one shoe throughout the rest of the night. Thus we had but just escaped all the perils of the sea, and got safely on shore, when these unhappy men offered a drunken sacrifice to Bacchus, instead of one of thankfulness and gratitude to God, the giver of all good. I have not been idle in improving these sad scenes in the promotion of Teetotalism. I have visited from door to door, and from tent to tent, in the distribution of the tracts which were given to me at Bristol. I have held public meetings both here and at Pietermaritzburg, and with great success, as you will see from the accompanying newspapers. We are making preparations for a tea-meeting on a grand scale, and I do assure you that our efforts to stop intemperance are greatly needed; for, though the quarterly license for a canteen is £25, we have nine of these pests in this town. Our countrymen set a most unhappy example to the Kaffirs, who are a sober, virtuous, though heathen people. I have already met with many persons who knew me years ago as a teetotaler. The late secretary to our society in this place has just been promoted to the office of magistrate for a Kaffir settlement. I am now secretary. Several very influential men are on our side. The governor, with whom I had an interview last week, deeply deplors the unhappy influence which many of our countrymen, from their intemperance and debauchery, are exercising upon the natives. Ah! sir, I have seen the scornful and derisive look of these naked wild children of Africa when they have beheld a drunken ‘amalunga’ (white man), and have felt for England’s sons, I am more resolutely set to oppose the drinking system from these things. This colony—aye, and this vast continent too—will be ruined, unless we arrest the monster intemperance by Teetotalism. God being my helper, I shall do all in my power to check this crying evil. Another supply of tracts, by private hand or some London house, would be most serviceable, I can assure you.”

AMERICA.

NEW YORK.

From the last returns made to the Chief of Police, it seems that there are 4,425 licensed houses for the sale of liquor in this city; 750 not licensed, 3,896 which sell on the Sabbath. Thus there are 750 daily and hourly violations of law in this city, and 3,896 on the Sabbath, with a police-force of 600 or 800 well-paid men. One would think that the police and the city government would be ashamed to present such a report. The least efficiency would break up the whole of this illegal business, which creates a cry for more tombs, more prisons, more almshouses.—Journal of the American Temperance Union.

DEVICE OF GERMAN MOTHERS.—In Germany, he remarks, and all France over, ‘tis held a great part of incivility for maidens to drink wine until they are married. The German mothers, to make their sons fall into hatred of wine, do use, when they are little, to put some owl’s eggs into a cup of Rhenish, and sometimes a live eel, which, twingling in the wine while the child is drinking, so scares him, that many come to abhor and have an antipathy to wine all their lives after.”—Howitt’s Familiar Letters.

THE "SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION" AGAIN!

THE statistics collected with so much care by several Sunday-school teachers, and published in the Standard of Freedom, the Tetotal Times, and other periodicals, and subsequently, with considerable additions, in the Voices from Prisons and Penitentiaries, have evidently been productive of great good. They have, it is true, provoked the ire of those who dislike the Temperance Movement, but they have awakened serious inquiry in the minds of many others, and have, in several instances, led to improved action. A number of zealous and devoted co-conductors and patrons of Sunday-schools have confirmed our statements—have thanked us for the pains we took to increase the efficiency of their beloved institution, and have seconded our efforts by circulating our statistics by thousands amongst the teachers of Sunday-schools in their localities. By this means, as we have intimated, serious inquiries have been instituted, and some corrections of the evil of which we complained have been introduced into several schools.

On the other hand, it is painful to observe the want of truth and candour in articles which have been written, and in speeches which have been made, by leading members and supporters of the London Committee of the Sunday-school Union—that portion of them, we mean, who have frankly acknowledged through their avowed organ, that "they have no feeling of favour towards the so-called Temperance Movement." Mr. Watson, the Secretary of the Union, and his friend, the "Reviewer" in the Union Magazine, have more than once said "that the statistics contained in the 'Voices from Prisons and Penitentiaries' are designed to support this proposition—namely, that the majority of Sunday scholars become criminals." This glaring and impudent untruth was repeated by the Secretary at the Morning Conference of the Committee of the Union and the representatives of Country Unions, held on the 8th ult. He then said that "the object of the pamphlet, the 'Voices,' &c., was to make out this proposition—that a very great majority of the criminals of this country had passed through the Sunday-school." This false statement was set up again as a bugbear before the thousands assembled in Exeter-hall on the evening of the same day, and was bravely assailed by two popular platform champions. Mr. G. Smith, of Poplar, contented himself with briefly insinuating that the statistics furnished were not based upon truth, at the same time candidly confessing that if but one instance of failure had occurred, it was sufficient cause for deep humiliation before God. As a sort of set-off to the statistics, he stated a case in which 3,000 or 4,000 persons in a certain town had paraded the streets in a season of deep distress, without breaking a single window or endangering a single life; and the reason he assigned was that the majority of these men had been taught submission to the authorities of the land whilst scholars in a Sunday-school. Mr. Burnett, of Camberwell, waxed bolder. He "considered it ridiculous to make themselves uncomfortable about such statistics." "As to those trumped-up facts, he would have none of them." "Who gave these men the information about young criminals? Why, the young rascals themselves." "It had been proved that numbers of them had been only once or twice to the Sunday-school." "He thought the whole affair a hoax, and he was sorry that the gentlemen who had so assiduously propagated these statistics should have been so duped." We have quoted from Mr.

Burnett's speech as it was really delivered, and as it was correctly reported in the Patriot newspaper. The report, as published by the Sunday-school Union, contains but few of the "floral decorations" which we have underlined above.

The Hon. Judge Darling, equally misled by the Secretary's unblushing statement, expressed his astonishment at the statistics which had been adverted to, because in his country, America, the result of Sunday-school instruction was to replenish the Christian Church with consistent and useful members.

Now, in reference, first, to Mr. Smith's statement. Most cordially do we unite with him in expressions of gratitude to GOD for the great good that has resulted from the labours of Sunday-school teachers, and the comparative fewness of those who have gone astray. But because some men of Stockport, on a certain occasion, broke no windows and endangered no lives, it does not, therefore, follow that the statistics of crime we have furnished are false, or that the cautions and advices founded upon them are unworthy of regard.

We are sorry to find the popular Mr. Burnett so greatly forgetting the dignity of his position. Without a spark of affection towards the Temperance Movement, we could have made a far better use of the statements put forth by the Secretary than Mr. Burnett made of them, with all his platform tact. It is easy to throw an audience consisting of nearly 5,000 persons, mostly young, into ecstasies of laughter, by reciting, as having happened in the life of the late Lord Howe, a fact recorded in the pages of the renowned Joe Miller long before Mr. Burnett or Lord Howe were born; but it would have been far worthier of the advocate and the occasion to have admitted the truth of the statistics referred to, and to have founded upon them a solemn exhortation to greater diligence and zeal for the future. The young teachers, male and female, might have laughed less, but they would have thought more, and have thought to better purpose. What is there "ridiculous," Mr. Burnett, in feeling "uncomfortable" at the comparative failure of a darling scheme? And what right have you to call the statistics "trumped-up facts?" or to state that they were supplied by "the young rascals themselves," and that "some of them had only been once or twice to the Sunday-school?" Why, if the statistics are "facts," it is not of such vast importance how they were obtained: facts are facts, be they gathered by whom they may. And what does Mr. Burnett mean by their being "trumped up?" As far as we can comprehend the import of this classic phrase, it means documents that are devised or forged. Does Mr. Burnett mean to say that the statistics we and others have published are either devices or forgeries? If so, we dare him to the proof. They were collected, as statistics usually are, by competent and trustworthy persons, in answer to a series of well-digested queries. The "young rascals" had little to do in the matter, and could not even guess why they were asked the questions. The responsible persons are those whose names the returns bear,—the Governors and Chaplains of various Prisons, and the Matrons and Chaplains of female Penitentiaries; persons whose private and official character rendered it unlikely that they would "trump up" facts, far less that they would practice "a hoax" upon gentlemen who were prosecuting a serious inquiry for great and important purposes. And as to the gentlemen who have so assiduously propagated these statistics, Mr. Burnett knows little of them—though some of them are often by his side—or he would have publicly declared that they were too experienced to be duped themselves, and too honest to attempt to dupe others. We know them, and we affirm that they are as respectable as to standing in society—as pure and patriotic in their motives—as unimpeachable as to veracity—as incapable of “mounting official stilts”—as staunch friends to Sunday-schools—and as firm believers in the truth and power of Christianity—as Mr. Burnett himself can possibly be.

As to the Hon. Judge Darling, we are happy to know, with him, that the Sunday-schools of America are the nurseries of the Christian church; and we know, too—what we are very sorry he did not state on the platform of Exeter-hall that evening—that the principle of total abstinence from strong drink is made an integral portion of the teaching in those schools, and that almost every teacher and every scholar is a pledged teetotaler. Were this the case in England, the triumphs of the Sunday-school system would be a hundred-fold increased.

We are sorry to find the Patriot newspaper uniting in this ill-judged crusade. Its title seems to pledge it to the support of every patriotic, philanthropic, Christian movement; and though we are painfully aware that it rarely advocates the Temperance Movement, we were not prepared to find in its editorial columns an attack upon statistics, prepared, as we have shown, with the most scrupulous care, and with the most praiseworthy motive. How could the Patriot, which has taken no pains to investigate the matter, call these returns “absurd, fallacious, and calumnious,” declare them to be “wholly unworthy of credit,” and repeat Mr. Burnett’s ill-placed merriment about “young rascals,” “a hoax,” “duped,” &c.? But the Patriot has been misdirected, and hence this unjust verdict.

Yes; and it is on this ground only that we can excuse the gentlemen who have thus maligned us; they were misled, misdirected; they acted according to the instructions on the margin of their briefs, and those instructions were designedly wrong. The Secretary stated at the morning conference, and at Exeter-hall, that which was not true, and hence a portion of the time which ought to have been occupied in useful advice to the teachers was spent in unmerited and injurious abuse. Mr. Watson said that “the object of the statistics was to make out this proposition, that a very great majority of the criminals of this country had passed through the Sunday-school,” and to induce the belief that “these criminals are a fair specimen of the whole class of Sunday scholars.” Now we defy Mr. Watson to point to any such absurd statement, either in the Standard of Freedom, THE TEETOTAL TIMES, or the “Voices from Prisons and Penitentiaries.” Our statement (as Mr. Watson well knows, for he has been told so in many forms) is simply this:—We have collected the statistics of several prisons and penitentiaries, and are grieved to find that of the youthful portion of the criminals at that time in those places the majority were ascertained to have been scholars in Sunday-schools. Upon inquiring more particularly as to what led to the commission of the crimes for which they were suffering imprisonment, we found that in almost every case strong drink had been the cause. And knowing, at the same time, that the practice of Teetotalism was not prevalent among Sunday-school teachers, and that therefore they were not likely to recommend it to their pupils, we laid the statistics before them, urging them, as they valued the success of their own exertions, and the welfare of their pupils, to give the whole question their serious and prayerful consideration. All the facts and documents, together with our reasonings upon them, were forwarded to the secretary, treasurer, and leading members of the Sunday-School Union. How have they been received? The first edition of the statistics collected by Mr. Smithies, together with some additions by the Rev. Mr. Sherman, Dr. Burns, Mr. J. Cassell, and others, was published early in December, 1849, in the Standard of Freedom, and copies were duly forwarded as above. A second edition was published in THE TEETOTAL TIMES of January, 1850, copies of which also were duly forwarded. Some time after this the “Voices from Prisons and Penitentiaries” was published, containing the statistics collected by Mr. Smithies, testimonies by judges and magistrates as to the connection between the use of strong drink and the commission of crime, important statistics and facts by Mr. William Logan and several other gentlemen, and an earnest and affectionate appeal to Sunday-school teachers founded upon the whole. Four large editions of this pamphlet have been nearly exhausted, copies having been put into the hands of almost every Sabbath-school teacher or superintendent in the kingdom, so far as their addresses could be obtained. No notice of any of these publications appeared in the organ of the Sunday-school Union until February, 1851, fourteen months after the first published documents were furnished to the leading members of the Union. In the February number of the Union Magazine, it is insinuated that the Committee knew nothing of the statistics till a copy was sent to them from the York Temperance Society; but it is also confessed that instead of immediately devising a remedy for the fearful evil—instead of instantly rushing in to stay the plague—the Committee wished first to obtain from the York Society certain documents; first, a copy of the letter addressed by Mr. T. B. Smithies to the chaplains, matrons, &c. Now this they had been furnished with long before, in the Standard of Freedom and in THE TEETOTAL TIMES, and still more fully in the “Voices from Prisons,” &c. But if this had not been the case, they might have obtained it from Mr. Smithies, who resided in London, or from almost any member of the Temperance Society in London. The Committee required next, the names of the prisoners, and the schools in which they had been taught; but they must have known at the time they made the request, that it could not in the very nature of things be complied with; the prisoners having completed their terms of imprisonment, and being again mixed in the general mass of the community. Of this also the Committee of the Union were informed in the various papers published in THE TEETOTAL TIMES; so that it is sadly idle to continue harping upon that one string.

After all, Mr. Smithies has only had a share in this transaction. The editor of the “Voices from Prisons and Penitentiaries” availed himself of those invaluable documents as far as they went, but he collected in addition a mass of evidence to which the Committee of the Union have not once adverted. They have attacked Mr. Smithies: why have they not also attacked Mr. Sherman, Mr. W. Logan, Mr. Phillips, of Haverford West, and others, whose corroborative testimonies have been published? And what have they done, or what will they do, with the evidence furnished at their own Conference two or three weeks ago? With the awkward admission of Mr. Hartley, that “they could not trace the future history of scholars leaving Sunday-schools, and that no means were used to keep up a connection with them:” does it become the abettors of so loose a system, to cast doubt upon the correctness of our statistics collected with so much care, and with such a scrupulous regard to truth? “That being the case,” continued Mr. Hartley, “it became a matter of the deepest importance for the teachers to consider whether they had omitted to do anything, the performance of which would have prevented such a calamity.” And what will they do with Mr. Wright’s statement, that “some with whom he was associated in the work were now spending their time as transported felons in different parts of the world?” What will they do with the statement made by the matron at Newcastle, that “out of 38 inmates at present in the Penitentiary, 36 had been at Sunday-schools?" And what will any person of common sense—especially any person conversant with the history of crime—do with the astounding and preposterous statement, that "she never, in all her experience, met with more than one person that was led away by the love of drink?" "Such an idea," she added, "was absolutely opposed to fact!" And how will the Committee of the Union dispose of the evidence of another of their own witnesses, Mr. Kingsell, of Leeds, who said that "in the borough of Leeds there were 299 prisoners, 196 of whom were formerly Sunday scholars, and that thirty had formerly been teachers in Sunday-schools?" And whereas, Mr. Watson, Mr. Burnett, and others, are anxious to have it believed that some of the youths in question had been only casual and irregular attendants at the Sunday-school, or that "they went just once in a way, and then, probably, to pick pockets, if they had the chance," how will the Committee deal with the declaration of Mr. Kingsell, that of the 196 who had formerly been Sunday scholars, 100 had been connected with the school for three years and upwards, and 52 for four years and upwards? And, having disposed of this testimony, let them turn to the "Voices from Prisons," &c., page 5, where this statement will be found:—"The Rev. J. F. Black, Kendal, stated that the average term of attendance at Sunday-schools by the prisoners was about four years. Of the 310 prisoners in the Wakefield House of Correction who had attended Sunday-schools, the Rev. W. T. Alderson states, that after examining them separately he ascertained that—

" 93 had attended Sunday-school upwards of 5 years.
68        "	between 3 and 5 years.
59        "	2 and 3 years.
47        "	1 and 2 years.
43        "	under 1 year.

The reviewer in the "Union Magazine" twits us with passing lightly over the testimony of the Rev. J. Kingsmill, chaplain to the Model Prison, Pentonville. This testimony is quoted by the Union as a triumphant argument against our statements. If we had asserted, as they falsely allege, that the majority of the children educated in Sunday-schools turn out criminals, this testimony might have been of value to them; but as Mr. Kingsmill admits that "the number of criminals in one year who have been taught in Sunday-schools will amount to a little more than 6,000," we cannot think our statements at all impugned, or the statements of the Union in any degree justified, by his testimony.

On the whole, we venture to express our belief that the Committee of the Sunday-school Union have not greatly advanced themselves in the esteem or confidence of their constituents by the course they have adopted in this matter. They allowed the statistics to be plentifully circulated throughout the country for more than twelve months before they took any notice of them at all; and what they have published since has been a series of misrepresentations both as to facts and motives. On one occasion, indeed, they allowed a gentle remonstrance to appear in their magazine; but, in the very next number, this was spoken of as a proof of "unusual candour," and notice was given that "further correspondence on the subject must be declined." That concluding article, like all the foregoing, misrepresents facts and motives, and actually accuses us of putting Teetotalism in the place of the Gospel, because we said that "we knew persons who had been reclaimed from habits of inveterate drunkenness without any aid derived from the Gospel, or from the teachers of religion." We repeat this as plain matter of fact, the proof of which we can furnish at any given moment. And we now conclude by saying that instances of reclamation from intemperance would be very greatly multiplied, were it not for the sanction given to the drinking usages of the country by Sunday-school teachers and Christian ministers.

As the curiosity of many will probably be excited by this controversy, we beg to state that the "Voices from Prisons and Penitentiaries, respectfully addressed to the patrons and teachers of Sabbath-schools," may now be had at the reduced price of one penny, or 6s. per hundred.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.

THE Proprietor of the Standard of Freedom has resolved to send a SPECIAL COMMISSIONER to conduct a series of investigations in the manufacturing districts of Lancashire into the state of the Juvenile Population, and especially as to the influence of Sabbath-school instruction upon their condition and character. The results will be published in the Standard of Freedom, in a series of Letters, to commence with the number issued on the 7th of June, 1851. Other counties will be reported in due course.

GOOD LIVING AND BAD MORALITY. BY A BISHOP OF THE PEOPLE.

"We dine at one o'clock on roast or boiled beef, ducks, turkeys, &c., with a dessert of plum pudding, rice pudding, jelly pudding, or pancake, and as much sherry wine as you like to wash it down. I use two glasses daily. At six we take tea; twice a week we have music from the piano, German flute, and tambourine, with dancing, in which, of course, I never engage, and terminate the day by a slice of sweet cake, and a tumbler or two of brandy toddy." So saith one Andrew Pringle, writing to the Christian Times, from the wilds of Australia. Good living there, O reader! Would'st thou like to be in that land flowing with sweet-cake and brandy? Would'st thou like two glasses of sherry daily? Of course thou would'st refuse to dance. That would be very wrong. Christians don't dance. Why should they? Is it not a giddy pastime? Does it not sometimes lead folks into mischief? Every one knows that, and, therefore, men like friend Pringle never dance. They only drink sherry and brandy toddy, and look at the dancing. It is hard work this capering on the floor. You can sit and drink wine. You can sip hot brandy toddy, and wonder at the wickedness of the dancers. But there is no harm in brandy. Of course not, O friend Pringle. It will injure thy liver, inflame thy passions, heat thy brain, make thee susceptible to temptation, indispose thee for study, serious conference, and private prayer; but what is that to thee, O Andrew? Thou art fond of cake. Thou canst enjoy sherry. Thou art not ashamed to mention thy beverage—brandy toddy. A fine, pure, moral beverage that, O Andrew, for a man who signs his letters, "Yours, in the bonds of the Gospel." Which Gospel? That of CHRIST'S, Andrew? But that Gospel speaks, "Glory to God in the highest." Does brandy glorify Him. "On earth peace." Is sherry wine twice a day famous for peace-making? "Good will toward men." Does thy toddy fill the world with "good will," or with violence, blasphemy, and crime? Tell me, O Andrew, which is the greater evil—dancing or brandy? Say not that I defend the polka? Not I, O man of toddy. But I say waltzes, quadrilles, hornpipes, and other scientific modes of capering, are small evils when compared with "wine and strong drink." Therefore, O thou sherry-cobbler, learn to shun what is the curse of Great Britain and Australia; and the next time a letter of thine appears in the Christian Times, inform us thou hast become wise enough to eat thy cake without thy sherry, and canst enjoy thy music without thy brandy toddy.

THE WHISTLE PREVENTIVE.—A certain old lady in Lancaster, whenever she hires a servant, asks him if he can whistle. On being requested to explain the cause of such a singular question, she replied, that when her servant went down to draw ale, she always made him whistle until he returned, by which means she insured his sobriety.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

The sixth and last of the present series of large temperance meetings in Exeter-hall took place on Monday evening, May 12. There was a goodly array of advocates, including several ministers and gentlemen from America, who were most cordially greeted as they came on the platform, preceded by the chairman, John Cassell, Esq.

The CHAIRMAN said it must be gratifying to the friends of temperance to observe that in most public discussions emphasis was laid on the importance of the Temperance Movement (hear). It had been stated in Parliament, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and others, that the decrease in the consumption of spirits was attributable to the increase of temperate habits on the part of the people. The temperance reformers were indebted also to Richard Cobden for the exposure he had recently made in the House of Commons of the outrages at the Falkirk election, arising out of the use of strong drink (cheers). Public opinion was also brought to bear upon that question, and he trusted that those boroughs in which such scenes of demoralisation had taken place would be disfranchised (hear). The chairman then referred to the erroneous statements made at the recent meeting of the Sunday-school Union on that very platform by the Secretary of the Union. He (the chairman) wholly repudiated those statements—(hear, and cheers)—and on the ground of his own experience and observation, he declared that the statements made in the "Voices from Prisons and Penitentiaries" fell far below the real facts of the case. He had himself received the chief portion of his early education in a Sabbath-school, and at an early age he had to engage as an operative. He could call to his recollection his schoolfellows and associates; and he found that the majority of them had turned out bad, in consequence of their going to the drinking-rooms and saloons with which Manchester abounded, and in which organs were played, and "sacred music" performed on the Sunday evenings, and the drinking of the evening was concluded by singing, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow" (hear, hear). Such habits, as might well be supposed, induced profligacy, theft, and other crimes. It was very far from being the wish of temperance advocates to depreciate Sunday-schools; but the fact could not be concealed that very few Sunday-school teachers placed the evils of intemperance before the eyes of their pupils, and hence when they were surrounded by temptation to drink, they became a prey to those temptations—they were tempted, further, to pilfer in order to obtain money for drink, and thus they got into prison (hear). He would say to the teachers of Sunday-schools, and to ministers of the gospel—to those who preached from pulpits, and yet drank wine at their own tables, and at the tables of their members—(much cheering)—to all such he would say, "Ponder over the facts we have placed before you, and act accordingly. Take care how you stand in the way of the temperance reformation, the success of which would aid your labours more than any human instrumentality beside" (cheers). In the meantime they (the advocates of temperance,) would not be discouraged; they would collect and publish facts yet more convincing—facts that would prove that there was no greater foe to the spread of the gospel and the advancement of religious instruction at home and abroad, than intemperance (hear). Had ministers and Sunday-school teachers been on their side, they might have had thousands of scholars and members where they had now only hundreds. The success of the temperance cause had not been owing to any aid rendered by those who ought to have been foremost, but to those hard-working men who had gone on through evil report and good report, and who would still persevere in the work in spite of every discouragement (much cheering).

The Hon. HORACE GREELEY, Member of Congress, and Editor of the New York Tribune, was much cheered on rising to address the audience. He said that from what he had seen he was led to believe that the cause of temperance had made less progress in this country than in America. They had but very few clergymen, of any denomination, who were not members of temperance societies (hear). He was sure that no minister, whatever his talents, could exert any great moral influence unless he was a warm friend to temperance (hear). Hence leading men, honourable men, men of talent and standing, were compelled, if they would hold any position of influence, to be members of Temperance Societies. At the beginning of the movement the physiological portion of the question was deemed the most important. They analysed and worked out chemically the fact that no innocent and wholesome use of alcohol could be made. He did not refer to the medical use of alcohol, but he would say that where a drinking physician judged it necessary to give it ten times, a temperance physician would only give it once (hear). Regarded simply as a physical agent, it was destructive to health and to human life. It might be so modified as not in all cases to be equally powerful, but in whatever form it might be conveyed, the same quantity would do an equal amount of hurt. The hon. gentleman here referred to the celebrated case of a man named St. Martin, who received a wound by which an opening was made in his stomach which never closed, and which enabled Dr. Beaumont to examine with the naked eye the nature of those changes which take place in the stomach during digestion; and he found that whenever St. Martin took spirits, the mucous membrane was covered with inflammatory and ulcerous patches, and the digestive powers greatly injured. The speaker then described more fully the properties of alcohol, and those inflammatory and other diseases which destroyed human life before the time. When men in such cases blasphemously returned the verdict, "Died by the visitation of God," they ought rather to say, "Died by the influence of alcohol" (hear). But the moral and social effects of intemperance must also be regarded. During the consideration of the question of the repeal of the Malt-tax, it was stated that about five millions were paid annually into the Treasury as the amount of duties; if so, what must be the sum paid for the liquor itself? And that only for one form of alcoholic drink (hear). Here were people devising means for bettering the condition of the poor—for supplying them with better houses, food, washing, lodging, and so on; why if they could only be induced to give up alcoholic drinks, all these things could be supplied without difficulty (cheers). Such large sums were spent, and yet statesmen looked on, and wondered what they could possibly do without the Malt-tax (hear, hear). Further, the use of alcoholic drinks destroyed the capacity for usefulness—for contributing to the well-being of society. Men, in consequence of their love of drink, were every day sinking to poorer houses, worse food, worse clothing, worse everything. And then the use of strong drink exerted a fearful influence on their religious condition (hear). How could any teacher of religion rationally hope to bring any man to the comprehension and enjoyment of the blessings of religion while he was a slave to that desolating habit? (Hear.) In vain did Christian churches lift their spires over the land—in vain did Christian ministers raise their voices—while that destructive influence was exerted. (The speaker here related the case of a friend who died at the age of thirty, in consequence of his use of strong drink. He was never seen drunk; but alcohol had sunk down into his whole system, and he soon yielded to its influence.) Those were facts which men could not but see, if they would look through a natural and not a coloured glass (hear). Oh, if but one law could be made which would have the effect of abolishing the use of alcoholic drinks, that one law would be worth all that had hitherto been made by philanthropists and statesmen (cheers). Strike at the root of the evils which prevailed in society by striking at strong drinks, at distilleries, wine manufactories, and breweries—dry up these sources, and misery and ruin would cease to desolate the land (loud cheering).

The Rev. WILLIAM FORSTER said he had been requested to address them on the connection of the Temperance Movement with all the other great movements of the day, political, benevolent, and religious. He observed that this is the age of societies, and proceeded nearly as follows: Every great idea now sought to embody itself in an appropriate institution for the purpose of conquering a place in the convictions, principles, and practices of men. But our present societies do not prosper as their advocates could wish. If their committees and friends are to be believed, they are but inadequately supported. This does not arise from the lack of excellence and importance in the objects at which they aim, or from a want of adaptation in the means used to gain the ends, for the attainment of which they had been constructed. The great evils which exist in the political, social, and religious worlds, require the combination of all honest men to uproot and destroy them (hear). Those evils are gigantic, numerous, deep-seated, heavy with age, and withal possess the vitality and vigour of youth. They are not to be blown away by idle words. Lamentations will not annihilate them. Their downfall cannot be effected by such scanty agencies and feeble efforts as those which have as yet been made. It is pitiable, he said, to hear the complaints which the secretaries and committees of our different societies pour forth on account of the meagre support which they receive from the people of this country. They seem to be totally unaware of the cause of this. It never occurs to them that the drinking customs of society have a most injurious influence upon all our associations and movements; yet this is so (hear). Our bible, our missionary and tract societies, our freehold and financial reform, and other important associations, are impaired in their efficiency and hindered in their progress, through the deleterious effect of alcoholic drinks upon the English population. This is no random statement. It is capable of proof the most convincing. The wonder is that the truth it expresses is not seen and acted on by all those who profess to be the friends of social and religious progress. Let us briefly consider the way in which the use of intoxicating beverages prevents the societies which are holding their meetings at this time of the year from getting such a number of intelligent, zealous, liberal, and active supporters as shall enable them to attain their several momentous objects (cheers). The use of alcoholic drinks prevents men from taking a lively and intelligent interest in the great movements of the day. No great object can be gained unless it is clearly apprehended and firmly grasped. However important it may be, yet if it has not laid hold of a man's whole intellectual and moral nature, it will be to him a subject of no value, no concern. Our various societies feel a difficulty of exciting sufficient interest in men's minds to give them liberal support. Every artifice is employed to get up the steam. They have not a tithe of the constituents which they require. Those who give them support are often very lukewarm friends. Now there must be some powerful cause or causes in operation to produce such melancholy results. Among the most efficient, we say, is the use of alcoholic drinks. It blunts a man's intellect; it dulls his conscience; it enfeebles his moral affections; it lowers his whole spiritual nature; it shuts him up in the narrow circle of personal interest; it turns his thoughts and his cares upon his individual indulgences; it makes him the despicable slave of a low and calculating selfishness. How unfit is such a man to throw himself upon the spring-tide of any generous and beneficent movement (hear, hear). Hundreds of thousands of our countrymen are totally incapacitated from taking any part in the work of social and religious renovation through the demoralisation of intoxicating beverages. It may be said this refers more especially to drunkards. Are not moderate drinkers exempt from the charge of unfitting themselves for great and philanthropic undertakings? We say it lies in part at their door. They are in some measure deteriorated by their unfortunate habits. They have not the zeal, the generosity, the earnestness they would have if they were to abstain entirely from a stimulant which clouds the brain, corrupts the heart, and paralyses the conscience. All our societies will languish while those who ought to support them are labouring under such serious disqualifications. The great specific for this is total abstinence (cheers). In proportion to its spread will every institution which has the good of man for its object increase the number of its intelligent and ardent supporters. Every drunkard who is reformed becomes in some way or other a benefactor of his species. If it were not for the drinking customs of Christians, the great body of reformed drunkards would join our communities, support our societies, and enter into all our movements. Every moderate drinker who becomes a total abstainer is not only more useful in his family, but he is rendered doubly serviceable to society. As temperance progresses among us, it will multiply the number of men who will detect and detest the evils which are blighting the happiness of their species, and will enter with vivid and lofty interest into all undertakings which have the political, social, or religious good of mankind in view. Then, Sir, our homes and foreign missions, our educational institutions, our benevolent societies, and our political associations, would not want men of clear heads, generous hearts, ready hands, and swift feet, to do their bidding and to forward their ends. As it is, I see nothing for it but that our great social movements must be retarded from a want of friends to help them on—must wait until Teetotalism has given our countrymen the primary and indispensable qualification for everything that is great and good—a nature freed from the blighting influence of intoxicating drinks. The use of alcoholic drinks deprives men of the time necessary to carry on efficiently our great movements. It requires time to work our different societies. Men are slow to see and feel the evils which have existed long before they were born, which have come down to them endorsed with ancestral approbation, into which they have been educated from their earliest childhood. It is long before you can enlighten the intellect, convince the reason, awaken the conscience, rouse the passions, and sway the will, of a great community. You must give line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little; or, in modern language, you must agitate, agitate, agitate (cheers). There is no exception to this rule. However just, patriotic, and fraught with good, a cause may be, the public mind is slow to receive it, to take it up, to put forth the energy necessary to carry it to a triumphant conclusion. But this will not do to remove some of the greatest evils which afflict our fallen humanity. Moderate drinkers will not do this. Men have not even time to listen to your reasonings. They shut their hearts against all your appeals. Now, one cause of this is the immense time they lose through the even moderate use of alcoholic drinks. They require more sleep to get rid of the effects of their daily potations of beer, brandy, or wine. They are obliged to give longer attention to business or labour, in order to meet the great and continual expense of a pernicious beverage; they cannot engage in the same amount of mental application to any given subject as teetotalers (hear); they are more prone to reverie about the evils in the world, than willing to make bare their arms with a view to remove them. When you call upon them to engage in some great work—a work which will require energy, perseverance, patience, and self-denial, to bring it to a conclusion—a work which must be years and years before it can be completed in the reformation of a people, or in the abrogation of some injurious institutions, or in the uprooting of some fatal social habits, they will offer all manner of excuses for not obeying your call. They tell you they have not time, they are worn out by business, they are too occupied with their own affairs. Such are their excuses. It is only Teetotalism which can enable them to redeem the time they lose through the use of intoxicating drinks. If they would only join us they would have time to read, time to think, time to attend public lectures and meetings, time to propagate their political, benevolent, or religious views. It would be a sort of moral necessity for them to connect themselves with the great movements of the day. They could not help working for the good of their fellow-men (hear). Oh, Sir, our different societies would have such an influx of earnest, zealous, intelligent, active supporters, that they would soon attain their ends, and bring complete redemption to a world which has long sighed to be renewed. The use of alcoholic drinks prevents men from subscribing, as they otherwise would, to the funds of our great societies (cheers). Money is the sinews of war. We cannot carry on any great movement without considerable expense. It is well known that all benevolent and religious institutions are crippled in their action from a want of funds. If Christians are pressed to increase their subscriptions, they say, "We cannot afford it." Yet, Sir, the Christian congregations of this country are spending at least ten millions a year upon intoxicating drink. If they were to give up this pernicious expenditure, they might consecrate to the cause of humanity and of God five millions a year in supporting different agencies for the benefit of mankind, and be far more than five millions a year the richer for the change (cheers). Our societies might then have a jubilee every year. But the good would not end here. If Christians were to become teetotalers, the use of alcoholic drinks would soon cease from among our population. Then, while any amount of wealth would be at the command of our benevolent and religious associations and their committees, the necessity of such combinations would almost entirely cease; for a greater part of the evils which our societies seek to cure either spring out of or are nourished by drunkenness (hear, hear). Those philanthropists who are moderate drinkers pull down with one hand what they build up with the other. The little dribbles of subscriptions

TESTIMONY OF RESPECT TO JOHN CASSELL, ESQ.

THE gentlemen to whom was committed the management of the series of TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATIONS in EXETER-HALL, have determined on inviting the friends of the Temperance Movement to an evening party, as a small token of respect to JOHN CASSELL, Esq., by whom the abovenamed Demonstrations were projected, and through whose exertions, mainly, they have been brought to a successful termination. It is expected that this meeting will take place towards the latter end of June, probably about the 23rd, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street. Full particulars, however, will be advertised shortly.

TEMPERANCE DEMONSTRATIONS DURING THE INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION.

THE committee appointed for conducting certain Teetotal Demonstrations during the period of the Industrial Exhibition in Hyde-park have made some progress in their arrangements during the last week. The principal demonstrations, we understand, are reserved for the latter end of July and the beginning of August. On Thursday, July 31, and Friday, August 1, it is proposed to hold a General Conference, and to receive reports of the progress of the Temperance cause, and discuss such questions as may be deemed of importance to its more rapid progress. It is expected that many leading members and advocates from various parts of the United Kingdom, as well as from America and other distant parts, will be present on this occasion.

On MONDAY, August the 4th, it is proposed to hold a meeting in Exeter-hall for the purpose of welcoming friends from various parts of the world. The Welsh Choristers, who have gained such celebrity by their performances, are expected to be present.

On TUESDAY morning, August 5, it is intended to assemble in Hyde-park, near the entrance at Hyde-park-corner, Piccadilly, at nine o'clock, there to form a regular line up to the south entrance of the Crystal palace, ready to enter as soon as the doors are opened (ten o'clock). It is recommended that all present on this occasion wear a neat sprig of white roses in the button-hole on the left breast, as also at all the public meetings. To preserve uniformity and to save expense, the committee propose to furnish these sprigs at threepence each, and to deposit them for sale at all the principal places of meeting, and at Mr. Tweedie's, Bookseller, North Wellington-street, Strand. We suppose that, for the use of strangers, they may be had on the ground also, or at Exeter-hall on the Monday evening.

On WEDNESDAY morning, August 6, it is proposed to invite the friends of Temperance to a Public Breakfast Meeting, probably at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street. At one o'clock the same day, it is proposed to repair to the Surrey Zoological Gardens, where, in addition to the numerous attractions provided by the managers of the Gardens, the Welsh Choristers will attend.

Further arrangements are under consideration; the result will be announced shortly.

As it is expected that a number of friends and advocates of Teetotalism will be almost constantly arriving in the Metropolis, not only from various parts of the kingdom, but from distant portions of the globe, we think it well to state that meetings are held regularly at the times and places specified underneath, where we are sure the committees will rejoice to receive them, and to introduce them to the respective audiences:—

MONDAY EVENING.—Infant School-room, adjoining the Tabernacle (Dr. Campbell's), City-road; Hall, Cross-street, Wilderness-row, Goswell-street; Hall, Fair-street, Horsleydown; Hall, Exeter-street, near Sloane-street, Chelsea.

TUESDAY.—British School, Harp-alley, Farringdon-street, City; Hawkstone-hall, Waterloo-road, over Waterloo-bridge; Hall, Little Portland-street, opposite the Polytechnic Institution, Regent-street; Lecture-room, London-lane, Hackney; British School-room, York-street, Walworth.

WEDNESDAY.—Great Hall, Broadway, Westminster; Star of Temperance Hall, 14, King-street, Seven Dials; Hall, Weir's-passage, Wilsted-street, Somers-town; Hall, Fox's-lane, Shadwell.

THURSDAY.—Hall, Bow-road; School-room, Great Suffolk-street, Southwark; Good Samaritan Hall, Little Saffron-hill, Clerkenwell.

SATURDAY.—Hall, Fox's-lane, Shadwell.

The meetings commence at eight o'clock.

The following resolution has been adopted unanimously by the Committee and by the meeting of representatives:—

"That while this committee desire to cherish the most friendly feelings, and to exercise all the requirements of fraternal and Christian hospitality towards any advocates of Temperance from America who may visit this country, they feel it to be their imperative duty not to welcome to their platforms, or to any conference which may be held on the subject of temperance, any minister of religion or other gentleman, whatever may be his reputation in his own country, who hesitates to avow his abhorrence of slavery, and his earnest desire for its abolition, or who acts under the influence of the unnatural prejudice against the coloured portion of the population. The Committee are the more determined on this point in consequence of the operation of the abominable Fugitive Slave Law, and of the atrocious resolutions of the so-called 'Sons of Temperance,' excluding from their 'Divisions' some of the most consistent and exemplary teetotalers, solely on account of difference of colour. This committee feel it their duty, further to urge upon temperance societies throughout the kingdom the adoption of a similar resolution, both as a solemn protest against slavery and prejudice as to colour, and also for the purpose of strengthening and encouraging their brethren who are labouring hard to remove from their country the guilt and shame of practices opposed alike to the claims of a common brotherhood, and the requirements of the blessed Gospel."

*.* We take it for granted that the extent and efficiency of these demonstrations will depend entirely upon the amount of the funds placed at the disposal of the committee. To make these meetings truly "DEMONSTRATIONS"—demonstrations of the value and excellence of the teetotal practice—large funds will be required. Admissions to the meetings (excepting the Zoological Gardens and the public breakfast) should be free; but as the places proposed to be engaged, and the efficient advertisement of those places, will cost a considerable sum, the expenses can only be met in two ways—by payment for admission, or by the liberal contributions of those who desire the extension of the teetotal principle. We find that an appeal for the latter has been sent out by the Committee, and has been, in some part, responded to, but the amount hitherto received must we are convinced, be increased four-fold, or the committee will not be able to accomplish half their proposed objects. We perceive that the treasurers are WILLIAM JANSON, Esq., and JOHN CASSELL, Esq.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

GOOD HEALTH: The Possibility, Duty, and Means of Obtaining and Keeping it. London: Religious Tract Society.

THERE is much in this elegant little book which commends itself to our judgment; but the writer is sadly mistaken in his views of total abstinence, and the virtues of strong drink. He says:—"Wine is recognised in the Bible as a blessing." We deny it. The writer perverts a simple verse, which, as any Sunday scholar knows, does not refer to wine. We quote it for the benefit of all:—"Thus saith the Lord, As the new wine is found in the cluster, and one saith, Destroy it not; for a blessing is in it: so will I do for my servants' sakes, that I may not destroy them all." (Isaiah, lxxv., 8.) A commentator who was guiltless of teetotalism, but famous for his knowledge of the Scriptures, renders a part of the verse thus:—"As when one findeth a rich grape in a cluster." Therefore, the allusion is not to intoxicating wine, but to ripe, beautiful, and nourishing grapes. It seems, then, that so far as Isaiah is concerned, wine is not to be written down a "blessing." How can it be so? Did not the Wise Teacher say, "Wine is a mocker?" The fruit of the vine is a blessing, but the fermented juice of the wine-press is a "mocker," Isaiah and Solomon being our witnesses. But our author informs us thus:—"There is a legitimate use to which this class of substances (wine, &c.), can be put, and that will never be injurious to health." Indeed! so said we, and then locked to see what the writer would say respecting this proper use of wine and strong drink. He gives this very explicit statement:—"It is impossible to specify the exact circumstances under which it may be beneficial to take a moderate allowance of alcoholic stimulus." Then why talk about the legitimate use of wine and beer? The writer does not, and can not, "specify the exact circumstances" under which a man should dose himself with alcoholic fluids, and yet condemn us for not touching them. Now, when he can "specify the exact circumstances" in which a man can touch pitch, and not be defiled, we shall be glad to receive the sanitary lesson. But the writer has a short memory, or else knows not that wine and beer contain alcohol. Having told us that wine is a "blessing," and malt liquor not to be refused, he thus writes:—"Alcohol acts directly on the lining of the stomach, and its habitual (he does not say intemperate) employment, keeps this membrane in a state of irritation, verging on and frequently amounting to inflammation." And this is "a blessing!" The rich grape would not do this. The new wine would not do it. It is only man's "invention" which thus injures the fabric which the Creator "wonderfully made." He says:—"There is nothing that cannot be abused by excess." An old story! But does the writer mean that moderate drinking is not an "abuse?" We cannot get a single glass of wine without perverting and prostituting a "good creature" of God, and therefore total abstinence is laudable and obligatory. The abuse is in the habitual imbibing of alcoholic drinks, as well as in drunkenness. Let us once more read this very ancient saying:—"Take a little wine for thy stomach's sake, and thine often infirmities, is still very salutary advice for many people." Which people? No answer. For what kind of disease? No answer. And yet this writer lectures us on our abstinence! We do not wish to be rude, but we must say of our author's wisdom, as he has said of the "necessity for stimulants," it is "more fancied than real." Still, with all his errors, our author can write fairly:—"If any individual discovers, by abstinence, that he can do without these drinks, he will be greatly the better for abjuring them entirely." Then why persuade people that wine, such as is now common, is a blessing? Why condemn total abstainers for agitating its abjuration? Why pretend that the Bible is against us? We lay down the book, declaring it a mixture of truth and error, and express our regret that the Religious Tract Society should have issued a volume containing an insidious attack upon temperance principles.

THE TEMPERANCE CYCLOPEDIA. Compiled by the Rev. WILLIAM REID, Edinburgh. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

EVERY advocate of Teetotalism, whether public or private, will find this an admirable repository from which to furnish himself for his great work. Whether he wishes for principles, opinions, statistics, testimonies, or illustrative facts and anecdotes, he will find in this "Cyclopædia" an abundant supply, methodically arranged, and pointed out, in addition, in a very copious index. The volume contains upwards of a thousand closely-printed columns, the contents of which are thus arranged:—Intemperance Described—History of Intemperance—Nature of Intoxicating Liquors—The Adulteration of Liquors—Evils of Intemperance—Causes of Intemperance—Inadequate means of Suppressing Intemperance—History of the Temperance Movement—Arguments for Abstinence—Objections to Total Abstinence Answered—Mode of conducting the Movement.—In this latter section will be found many suggestions and remarks well worthy the serious consideration of all who desire to advance the Temperance Reformation. Such persons will regard the publication of this volume as a rich boon.

PRIZE ESSAYS ON TEMPERANCE. London: John Cassell, Strand.

THESE Essays are two in number:—I. "The Principles and Practice of Total Abstinence," by Michael Spears, a letter-press printer at Edinburgh. II. "The Necessity, Practicability, and Value of Total Abstinence," by Colin A. Hunt, draper's assistant, Cupar, Fife. Premiums of £20 and £10 having been offered by the late committee of the National Temperance Society for the two best essays on the principles and practice of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, as especially applicable to the working classes, between twenty and thirty Essays were sent in. The two now before us were selected by the adjudicators, the Rev. W. R. Baker and Thomas Beggs, Esq., and the writers have received the above-named premiums. Could the large and important class for whose especial benefits these essays are published be induced to read them with attention, delightful results would follow. There would be glorious accessions to temperance societies, an increase of industrious, ingenious, and trustworthy operatives, a multiplication of good husbands and parents, greater demand for useful labour, a powerful impetus would be given to trade and commerce, and the moral and religious well-being of multitudes would be abundantly promoted. But to accomplish these objects, the essays must obtain an extensive circulation. The more wealthy members of temperance societies, and all who seek the elevation of the masses, could scarcely render more essential service to the community than by placing these well-written and well-reasoned essays within their reach; and that this may be done without any great sacrifice, they are published in a cheap form, with the promise of considerable reduction to those who take large quantities for gratuitous distribution.

THE EXHIBITION AND THE PEOPLE.—The Temperance Cause in relation to the Condition of the Working Classes. By THOMAS BEGGS. London: C. Gilpin.

A WELL-TIMED tract, giving a few important statistics illustrative of the condition of the working classes, the probable amount spent by them on strong drinks and tobacco, the injurious influence of this expenditure upon their health, welfare, and morals, and the adaptation of the Temperance Movement to meet the circumstances of their case. It includes, also, a brief sketch of the history and principles of temperance societies, and the nature of the evils that first called them into existence.

The Temperance Cause is viewed as a question affecting the trade and industry of the country—food, education, adult and juvenile crime, poverty, &c. The inefficiency of a moderate use of strong drink as a remedy for intemperance is pointed out, and total abstinence is insisted upon as the only effectual cure. Upon these statements is founded an appeal to what are usually termed the respectable classes, and the Christian public, who are strongly urged to attend to the claims of the temperance question, as a question of light, liberty, and knowledge. A tract of this description has long been regarded as a desideratum, and now it is furnished by an able hand. We trust that the lovers of temperance will give it the extensive circulation which its excellence and importance demand. This its cheapness will enable them to do, without any great pecuniary sacrifice.

THE TRIALS AND TRIUMPHS OF TEMPERANCE. Six Engravings: designed by H. FITZCOOK, and engraved by GEORGE MEASOM. London: Singer and Co., Ingram-court, Fenchurch-street.

Six bold and striking engravings, each measuring fourteen inches by nine. The subjects are as follows:—
 "I. The Pledge. Our hero becomes awakened to a sense of the dreadful results of intemperance by the awful spectacle here displayed—the death of a sister, who, in a fit of delirium caused by intoxicating drink, has laid violent hands on herself and child. He appeals to heaven, and seeking forgiveness at the Throne of Grace for his misguided relative, resolves, with Divine aid, to abjure her fatal vice, and henceforth lead a strictly temperate life." "II. The Happy Home. The temperate man, surrounded by an amiable and industrious wife, and three happy children, is represented as entertaining the parents of his wife at the birthday of their eldest grandson, then just breeched. The effects of temperance are here visible in his domestic circle, all participating in the bliss attendant on a well-regulated life." "III. The Temptation. Employed in a factory, the master of which pays his men on a Saturday night in a public-house belonging to himself, the temperate man is beset by his less fortunate fellow-workmen with temptations to drink; but, feeling a just sense of his responsibility as a husband and parent, and, as an accountable reasonable creature, no inducement, either from young or old, can prevail on him to give way." "IV. The Hour of Adversity. Having given offence to his master for the example of temperance exhibited before his fellow-workmen, he is discharged, persecuted, and ultimately, for a trifling debt, thrown into prison, where we see him visited by his wife and children. Afflicted, but not dismayed, he has fortitude to sustain, and energy to combat with misfortune." "V. The Triumph of Temperance. Rarely can the evil-minded succeed in obscuring from view the worth of those whose good deeds they affect to despise. Sooner or later virtue and merit are recognised, and rescued from oppression. Thus, the temperate man, released from prison, obtains a situation in which he is better appreciated by his employer, and becomes eventually a partner. He is here represented as paying his men, on whom the effects of his example are visibly apparent." "VI. The Final Reward. Here is portrayed the death scene of the temperate man: old and full of years, he expires 'like a spent summer breeze.' His eye is not dimmed by intemperance, nor do his faculties fail him. Surrounded by his wife and children, he departs like the setting sun, becoming greater as he wanes: great has been his example, and great shall be his reward." Though not equal to the memorable "Bottle" and "Drunkard's Family" of GEORGE CRUIKSHANK in point of character, they are, nevertheless, deeply interesting, and will furnish materials for lecturing to many a temperance advocate. The price at which they are published (six large bold engravings for one shilling) will no doubt secure for them an extensive sale.

THE BAND OF HOPE REVIEW, and Sunday Scholars' Friend. London: Partridge and Oakey, Paternoster-row.

We are glad to learn that this monthly publication is pursuing a successful career. The attractive form in which it is printed, its pictorial illustrations, and its interesting and instructive contents, render it the most remarkable publication of the day at its price, it being obtainable for "the small charge of ONE HALF-PENNY." We believe the circulation is extensive, but "to make it pay," as the booksellers say, at least ten thousand must be sold of each monthly number. Yet, what is ten thousand, or even twice ten thousand, when the number of "Bands of Hope" and "Sunday scholars" is taken into the account? For the sake, however, of both these classes, we should like to see a larger space occupied by brief and luminous expositions of the teetotal principle, in its nature, necessity, and advantages. The number for May is a curiosity; it contains a copy of a letter from the scholars of the Sunday schools belonging to the Methodist Episcopal Church in New York, America, to the scholars of the Sunday schools attached to the Wesleyan Connexion of York, England. The roll containing the original letter measures eighty-four feet five inches in length, and contains the signatures of five thousand seven hundred and sixty children, black as well as white.

FAREWELL TO THE BOWL.

Now the last link is broken,
 Farewell to the bowl;
 Its power has departed,
 And gone its control.
 We have severed the shackle,
 Which giant-like bound
 All our hopes of the future
 In pleasure's gay round.

But our former companions—
 Ah! where are they now?
 Like the fool they have perished
 With guilt on their brow;
 Every warning unheeded,
 They madly pressed on,
 And are lost in the vortex
 Where thousands have gone.

O, ye lovers of pleasure,
 Who seek in the bowl
 For that horrid excitement
 Which killeth the soul!
 Would you shun their example,
 Escape from their woe,
 And hope for God's blessing—
 The wine cup forego!

BARLEY WASTED.—Rev. B. Parsons says:—It is allowed by brewers, on all hands, that six pounds of barley will make a gallon of good ale. In these six pounds you have 96 ounces, and in these you have full 88 parts of solid nourishment; but, gentle reader, you will do well to observe, that in your gallon of beer you have not ten ounces of nourishment. So that in manufacturing beer you actually lose very nearly eighty parts out of eighty-eight, and all that you obtain in the place of it is upwards of three ounces of spirits of wine, or alcoholic poison, and which constitutes the strength of the liquor."—Anti-Bacchus.

SUBSTANCE USED IN ADULTERATION OF MALT LIQUORS.—Capsicum, coculus indicus, salt of tartar, headings, ginger, and slacked lime. The headings is a mixture of half alum and half copperas, ground to a fine powder, and is so called from giving to porter that beautiful head of froth, which constitutes one of the peculiar properties of porter, and which landlords are so anxious to raise to gratify their customers. To make new beer old, add oil of vitriol; an imitation of the age of eighteen months is thus produced in an instant.

TEETOTAL OPERATIONS.

which they do contribute to any good cause are neutralised by the floods of evil they assist, at a vast expense, to roll in desolating strength over our land. Until Teetotalism reconverts the Church—until it becomes the practice of the secretaries, the committees, the subscribers of our societies to abstain—we may be sure of this: we shall never cease to hear the wail of distress from the annual reports, speeches, and addresses, because of the want of funds to maintain an adequate agency to attain their several ends (cheers). These, Sir, are some of the ways in which Teetotalism stands connected with all our other societies. It is absolutely necessary to give them all an impulse to recruit their resources, to multiply their agencies, and to carry them on to ultimate success. Let teetotalers ever remember that their cause is the feeder of all other societies—is the top-root of the great tree of benevolence, of which such societies are the branches, and that through it, to a great extent, must flow up the vital and nourishing sap which enables it to cast those branches over all the world, to cover them with leaves, and to load them with fruit which shall be for the shelter, healing, and the feeding of all the nations of the earth (cheers). High, noble, and momentous is your position, teetotalers! Ye are the foremost men of your day! Ye are, in a very important sense, the lights of your age! The good time coming will owe its advent and its reign chiefly to you (cheers). He did not say Teetotalism would do the work of science, philosophy, education, political economy, and religion. No; it is related to all these things. It would help them to produce their proper results upon mankind. Like the genial influence of spring brooding with balmy wing and warm breath over all nature, liberating it from winter's frosts, and opening it for the reception of all needful culture, and of all kinds of seeds,—so, too, temperance prepared the minds of men for all manner of training necessary for their intellectual, social, moral, and spiritual progress (cheers). It cannot of itself effect the regeneration of man, neither can the regeneration of the race be brought about without it (cheers). Again, do you teetotalers remember your high mission. Let not sneers, ridicule, abuse, neglect, misrepresentation, or any other thing, separate you from the good cause. Every other movement must wait upon this. All other societies must stand still if yours do not go on. The increase of their members, their funds, their efficiency, depends upon your success. How faithful, how active, how self-devoted you ought to be! (Cheers.) Tremendous are your responsibilities! Solemn is the lesson which by example and precept you have to teach mankind! Deep and quickening is the influence which you have to exert upon your fellow-men! You need to be divinely helped in your work. Shall we invoke His aid who alone can nerve us to our duty? Heathen men would have done this—why may not Christians? O thou great Father, from whom alone come good counsels, generous thoughts, and brave resolves—who hast enabled feeble men in all ages to do great and mighty things for the glory of thy blessed name and the good of thy creatures—grant us, we beseech thee, and grant all throughout every land who labour with us in this great cause, vigour of thought, force of purpose, and depth of faith, to persevere in our work, that all other efforts to bring about the reign of righteousness, peace, and love on the earth may be sustained and forwarded by the fruits of our solicitude and our toil; and to thee, not to us, O God, but to thee, shall be all the glory and the praise, for ever and ever. Amen. (Loud cheers.)

The Rev. J. W. CHICKERING, of Portland, Massachusetts, U.S., said that since he came to England he had been learning some new lessons in reference to temperance and intemperance. He had heard that though large sums were expended on strong drink, yet that there was not so much actual intoxication as in some parts of his own country; but he had, he thought, discovered the secret of that in the extent and strictness of the police regulation of the country. He had, however, visited some police-courts and police-stations, and had seen many drunken men and drunken women, too; and he judged that similar scenes might be witnessed at other police-courts and stations. Still he believed that temperance principles would ultimately prevail. Reference had been made to the influence of strong drinks in deadening and destroying moral and religious impressions, and he could fully confirm all that had been said on the subject. Let them go on patiently, but not idly, in pursuit of their object. They needed light and love; but both came from the same blessed source, and would be imparted to all who sincerely sought them. His brethren in the ministry in America loved the temperance cause, and did all they could to promote it—(cheers)—they had much opposition to contend with, not merely from drunkards and from drunkard makers, but from many from whom they reasonably hoped better things. Still they had enough to encourage their zeal and perseverance. He trusted that there would be a generous rivalry in the matter between England and America (hear and cheers).

The CHAIRMAN hoped that the men of England would imitate the men of America in their endeavours to break the bonds of the drunken slaves. He hoped, also, that while we praised them for their exertion to emancipate the slaves of drunkenness, they would imitate us in our exertions to rid the negro slave of his chains (much cheering). And he would say, also, to the ministers of the Gospel in this country, "Do not be so hasty in reproving your brethren in America for not speaking out in their pulpits against negro slavery, under the fear of offending some slave-holding office-bearer of their church, while you are afraid to speak out in your pulpits against strong drink, because you use it yourselves, or because you have in your church deacons or rich members, who are wine or spirit merchants or publicans" (prolonged cheering).

The Rev. JABEZ BURNS, D.D., after paying some high compliments to the Hon. Mr. Greeley, referred to the attack made on the friends of temperance by the Secretary of the Sunday-school Union, at its recent meeting. He regretted much that such an unwarranted attack had been made, and that it had been vindicated and supported, first by two of the speakers at the meeting referred to, and since in the columns of the Patriot newspaper (hear, hear). He referred to the prison statistics which had been collected by Mr. J. B. Smithies. Why, at the very time that those statistics were brought forward in that hall, confirmatory statements were made by other speakers, and especially by the Rev. James Sherman (hear, hear). Why did not the Secretary of the Union attack Mr. Sherman? (Hear, hear.) He (Dr. Burns) maintained that the statements made by Mr. Smithies had been borne out, and more than borne out (cries of "Yes, yes!"). He pronounced the statement made by the Secretary of the Union to be a piece of gross presumption, not to say impudent calumny (cheers). Yes, he would repeat it, of impudent calumny (cheers prolonged). And then he found from the report of the meeting, that Mr. Burnett referred to the statistics as "a hoax." Was that worthy of the speaker, or of the facts? (Hear.) And then it was said that the Temperance Society set itself against Sunday-schools. Against Sunday-schools! Why some of the very warmest friends of Sunday-schools are to be found amongst temperance men (hear). We don't complain of what Sunday-school teachers do teach, but of what they do not teach. And he maintained that Sunday-schools would never prosper as they might till the teachers, generally, took up the Temperance cause (hear, hear). Many of the patrons and superintendents of Sunday-schools used strong drink, and therefore it was unpleasant to them to hear strong drink condemned; they felt condemned, and it was just they should be condemned (hear). But of all the pitiable shuffling that ever took place in reference to the question of Temperance and Sabbath schools, the most remarkable and disgusting was that which took place in Exeter-hall at the annual meeting of the Sunday-school Union (cheers). It was said that the statements made by the temperance people were fallacies. How did they arrive at that conclusion? what process had they themselves adopted to arrive at a just knowledge of the facts? (Hear.) Let the whole question be fairly brought up. Let both parties meet. Let there be a fair field, and no favour (hear, hear). He would venture, in the name of the friends concerned, to throw out a challenge—namely, that the friends of Temperance challenge the Secretary of the Sunday-school Union, and the Rev. John Burnett, and other members of that body, to come forward and meet in that hall (cheers). Let each party share the expense, let suitable umpires be appointed, and let a just decision be made, according as the evidence shall be (cheers). He asked the present audience if they were prepared to meet half the expense? (Loud cries of "Yes, yes!" from all parts of the Hall.) Very well; then let a meeting be called; let a fair report of the proceedings be taken, and let it be published to the ends of the earth (cheers). The temperance friends had nothing to fear; they said, "Let there be light, let information be spread, and we have no fear for the result." They would again visit the prisons of the Metropolis and other parts, and ascertain the real facts of the case (hear). It was necessary that exertions should be made, and vigorous exertions, too, to counteract the baleful influences of the drinking customs of the land. Some of the most lovely scenes were fairly desolated by the use of strong drinks. Men connected with the public press—and with the religious press, too—sank one after another into disgrace, and into untimely graves (hear). In conclusion, he trusted that the mind of that meeting would be communicated to the Committee of the Sunday-school Union, and that the result of any further discussion which might take place would be to purge from Sunday-schools everything that could, even in the least degree, impede their prosperity (protracted cheers).

The CHAIRMAN said that, as far as he was concerned, he would not let the question between the friends of temperance and the Sunday-school Union rest (cheers). As to the publication which had excited so much feeling—the "Voices from Prisons and Penitentiaries"—he had only to say that many thousands had been circulated at the price of two pence each, but from henceforth it should be sold at one penny (cheers).

The Rev. HENRY H. GARNETT, of Geneva, State of New York—a gentleman of colour—was received with several rounds of cheers. He said that he could not but express the gratitude he felt at the opportunity of assembling with the friends of temperance, and giving even a feeble impulse to a cause which was doing so much good in the world. He had seen the progress of the cause in America from its first advent; and, while he reflected on the difficulties which the friends of the cause in this country met with, he was prepared to say that, while it had such advocates as those he had heard to-night—men who understood the subject, and who relied upon God for success—there was no fear of their suffering defeat (cheers). He presumed that the same ravages were made by drunkenness in this country as in America. Everywhere drunkenness did mischief. It walked into the shop of the mechanic, taking away from him his tools, his character, his health, and leaving him in a state of destitution. It went into the farm, and caused the plough to be left in the half-tilled land, the ground covered with weeds and thorns, and the stock starved or sold away. It entered the courts of law, and took the judge from the bench and the juror from his seat. It entered the Congress of the nation, and brought down the most exalted genius, and dashed the most promising into an ignoble grave. Nay, it had gone into the Church of God, and had emptied the pews of members once exemplary, of office-bearers once useful, and had even plucked from the pulpit ministers eminent for their talents, and had brought them into disgrace and ruin. Hence they found it necessary to work (hear). Dr. Beecher commenced the work gloriously. Since that period the Washingtonians, as they were termed, had effected wonders. They told such tales as men who had not themselves been intemperate could not have related, and the effect—especially upon persons of their own class—was most surprising. Now, he would put this question to any who felt apathetic as to the great movement—Was there one who would object to attempts being made to rescue the drunkard—the man who was created in the image of God, but who had effaced that image—the man possessed of such astonishing powers of body and of mind—the man that was capable of looking up to heaven, and of holding communion with God—was there one who could object to the bringing back to his reason and to his God a being who had degraded himself by intemperance? Who would not say that such a man ought to be brought back? (Hear, hear). But then what were the means to be employed? There must be the force of example (hear). He would give more for an ounce of example than for a bushel of precept (cheers). The speaker then referred to the danger of using strong drinks under the idea that moderate portions could do no harm; also to the great influence of example in inducing the irresolute to sign the pledge of total abstinence; and finally on the importance of enlisting female influence on the side of temperance. He concluded by observing that there were three principles destined to bless the world—Temperance, Liberty, and Religion; let a man advocate temperance, and he would take up the cause of universal freedom (cheering).

The Rev. T. J. MESSER, from Hayley, Cornwall, stated that he was one of the first Christian ministers who connected himself with the great temperance cause, when it was not fashionable to be a teetotaler, and when the advocates had to face men not very favourably disposed; since which period he had gone on through evil report and good report (cheers). He had come from the land of granite rocks and poor fires, delighted at having an opportunity of throwing out a few random thoughts in favour of Teetotalism. He believed that Teetotalism accorded with truth, and, therefore, he was somewhat bold in its advocacy. He had often been astonished and disgusted at the conduct of men—ministers of religion, many of them—who could utter burning words while advocating the abolition of negro slavery, but who never uttered one word in favour of the abolition of drunken slavery (hear). He hated the religious cant which pitied slavery at a vast distance, and had no pity for slavery at home (hear). The people of England were urged to arise, "one and all," to put down colonial slavery; appeals were made, and the people wept; money was asked, and the people emptied their purses; petitioning was recommended, and the people crowded to the tables; but when they were asked to assist in the emancipation of drunken slaves, "Oh!" they exclaimed, "we are not drunkards; we drink very moderately; we are never carried from under the table, and so on. Don't ask us to make sacrifices for such wretches" (hear). But what comparison was there between the two kinds of slavery? (The negro slave was held, in bondage, but his mind was free; he embraced the truth—felt its sublimating influence—thought lightly of his fetters—died—and rose to immortality. But look at the drunkard: thousands in this country had the brand of drunkenness upon their brow. For them there was no entrance into heaven; they sickened—they died—and entered the presence of the Judge of the universe in their chains! And yet there were men, ministers, christians—so they called themselves—who take no concern whatever about those thousands (hear, hear). Might God forgive them! He confessed that he could not understand their case. They not only never uttered a sentence against intemperance, but when ensconced in comfortable parlours, they whispered fulminations against the advocates of temperance (hear and cheers).

THOMAS BEGGS, Esq., moved a resolution of thanks to Mr. John Cassell, for having projected the series of Temperance Meetings in Exeter-hall, as well as for his other exertions in the cause of temperance.

MR. W. SPRINGS seconded the resolution, intimating at the same time that it was the intention of the committee to testify their sense of obligation to Mr. Cassell for those exertions in a more distinct form, of which due notice would be given.

The resolution was carried with acclamations, and briefly acknowledged by the chairman.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

The annual public meeting of this society was held in Exeter-hall, on Thursday evening, the 22nd inst.

The Rev. W. W. Robinson, of Chelsea, took the chair, and the proceedings commenced by the Rev. Dr. Burns reading the 67th Psalm and offering prayer.

The CHAIRMAN said he had been a member of that society upwards of ten years, during the whole of which period he had not once had occasion to resort to the use of alcoholic drinks even for medicinal purposes. It was a lamentable fact that the drinking customs of the country were absorbing more wealth than would be sufficient, with God's blessing, to bring the knowledge of salvation within the reach of every individual in the world. It had been proved beyond the possibility of contradiction, that if every person in England were to abstain from intoxicating liquors for one year, a fund might be created sufficiently large to furnish every family in the world with a copy of the sacred Scriptures (hear, hear). For 1800 years the gospel had been preached; but how little, comparatively, was the progress it had made! There must be a great fault somewhere. He then proceeded to state some objections which had been raised by professing Christians to the present society, and pointed out how very sophistical and untenable they were.

MR. NEWCOMBE, the assistant secretary, read the Report. W. R. BAKER, Esq., author of the "Curse of Britain" moved—"That the report now read be adopted and printed, and circulated under the direction of the committee."

He said he had been reminded during the reading of the report, that the history of teetotalism was the history of organisations and disorganisations, yet notwithstanding all the changes which had taken place, the great central principle had been steadily progressing, and so firm was the hold it now had on the public mind, that if all organisations were to cease from the present time, teetotal truth would continue to have free course, and ultimately triumph universally.

EDMUND FRY, Esq., secretary to the Band of Brotherhood seconded the resolution. There was no word more hateful to the people of this country than slavery, and we prided ourselves upon the fact that we had abolished for ever the iniquitous trade of dealing in the blood and sinews of our fellow-men. From the impulse of a sincere affection we could extend the right hand of fellowship and brotherhood to those coloured men, who in another country, which should be nameless, found that the love of liberty was the greatest crime they could indulge in; but was it not a fact, nevertheless, that we were open to great reproach in connection with the tyranny which was exercised over a large proportion of our own people from the drinking habits of society? ("Hear," and cheers.) Go into the workshops and factories of Britain even now, and what were all the systems of fines, and footings, and compulsory drinkings which abounded in them, but so many racks and thumb-screws by which honest men were put to the torture, and oftentimes to death? (Hear.) There could not be a question for a moment but that a large proportion of the industrial classes of society and their families were still subject to a system of slavery, not the less terrible and destructive because it was self-imposed (hear). Nay, there was no grade of society, from the highest to the lowest, where the traces and effects of this galling oppression was not felt, and it would be a happy day for Britain, when she would be able to proclaim herself as free from the slavery of strong drinks as she was from participation in the slavery of her negro brethren (cheers). How was this happy change to be effected? To his mind it appeared that they could only emancipate themselves from the slavery of strong drinks by the same process as that which brought about the abolition of black slavery (hear). They must set about it earnestly and heartily, as a great national question, not leaving the solution of it to one class of persons, or another, but to be resolved by the people themselves (hear). If ever England was to be freed from the stain of this fearful thralldom, it must be by the earnest and unanimous resolution of all her people to abolish entirely from amongst them that article by which the whole of the intemperance of the country was produced.

The Rev. H. GARNETT, coloured minister from the United States, was received with loud and protracted applause. In a clear and forcible manner he pointed out the evils of intemperance as affecting young people on their entrance into life, and especially urged the beneficial influence of this society on their behalf, illustrating his remarks by the cases of two individuals, the one a near neighbour of his own in America, and the other, being Mr. Dwight, a representative to Congress from the state of Massachusetts, both of whom found an untimely grave through the influence of strong drinks.

J. SILK BUCKINGHAM, Esq., also spoke in support of the resolution. After referring to the baneful effects of American slavery, he proceeded to show that the thralldom in which so many in our own and other lands were subject through habits of intemperance was far more fearful and lamentable, because in the former case the slavery was not the act of the will of the individual himself, while the latter was that into which he voluntarily resigned himself, and which not only killed both body and soul in the end, but made the years of his earthly course a continuous scene of suffering, degradation, and sin. It was also a fact that, though so large a number as eight millions were doomed to wear the badge of outward slavery, a far greater number were the victims of that hopeless oppression and bondage which was produced by strong drinks. There were two classes of objections not noticed by the chairman, but which were often urged against teetotalism. No declension was so strong among working men as that some species of stimulant was necessary to preserve the strength of the body. A similar error prevailed amongst literary men, who believed that they required the stay of alcoholic drinks in the excessive taxing of the mental energies to which many of them subjected themselves. Now, it was vain to hope that either class would abandon the use of strong drinks unless these objections to their discontinuance were removed. These two false positions Mr. Buckingham combated successfully, and in conclusion urged that each individual in his sphere should exert himself to the utmost to extend a knowledge of the principles, and recommend the practice of teetotalism.

LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, Esq., M.P., moved the second resolution:—

"That in looking upon the past efforts of the Temperance Society, whilst conscious that as much has not been effected as the sanguine hopes of its friends might have led them to anticipate, yet there is ample proof of the powerful influence the Temperance Movement has exerted upon all classes of society, both in enlightening public opinion as to the effects of alcoholic liquors on the human frame, and in changing the habits of a considerable portion of the community."

HORACE GREELY, Esq., editor of the New York Tribune, in seconding the resolution, gave an account of the former prevalence of drinking habits in the New England States of America, and of the influence which teetotal principles were now exerting there.
