

Central Lancashire Online Knowledge (CLoK)

Title	Making the ethical case for effective domestic abuse policy and practice: the role of trade unions
Type	Article
URL	https://clock.uclan.ac.uk/45121/
DOI	https://doi.org/10.1108/ER-05-2022-0214
Date	2022
Citation	Bennett, Tony and Wibberley, Gemma (2022) Making the ethical case for effective domestic abuse policy and practice: the role of trade unions. Employee Relations . ISSN 0142-5455
Creators	Bennett, Tony and Wibberley, Gemma

It is advisable to refer to the publisher's version if you intend to cite from the work.
<https://doi.org/10.1108/ER-05-2022-0214>

For information about Research at UCLan please go to <http://www.uclan.ac.uk/research/>

All outputs in CLoK are protected by Intellectual Property Rights law, including Copyright law. Copyright, IPR and Moral Rights for the works on this site are retained by the individual authors and/or other copyright owners. Terms and conditions for use of this material are defined in the <http://clock.uclan.ac.uk/policies/>

Making the ethical case for effective domestic abuse policy and practice: The role of trade unions

Journal:	Employee Relations
Manuscript ID	ER-05-2022-0214.R2
Manuscript Type:	Research Paper
Keywords:	Trade Unions, domestic abuse, Corporate social responsibility, HR policies, people management, employee wellbeing

SCHOLARONE™
Manuscripts

Making the ethical case for effective domestic abuse policy and practice: The role of trade unions

Abstract

- Purpose: This paper focuses on the role of trade unions in policy and practice designed to address the workplace impact of domestic abuse. The paper will examine this union remit through the lens of corporate social responsibility (CSR).
- Methodology: In-depth interviews were conducted with 39 union representatives in a region of England to capture their views on and experiences of supporting members experiencing domestic abuse.
- Findings: There is a clear ethical model by which the unions might articulate the key moral, legal, and business drivers in determining effective domestic abuse policy and practice. Furthermore, the degree of 'proximity', in terms of union deliberation with employers and particularly joint action following disclosure, suggests that unions could play a key part in achieving 'substantive' domestic abuse policy and practice within organisations.
- Originality: Despite unions' capacity to offer significant support to employers and employees, the role of unions in addressing the workplace impact of domestic abuse is under-researched. With reference to the concept of CSR, the article adds to our knowledge of how to address the workplace impact of domestic abuse.

Keywords: trade unions; domestic abuse; corporate social responsibility; HR policies; people management; employee wellbeing

Research paper

Introduction

Domestic abuse research in several countries has highlighted its direct impact on employees' productivity, attendance, and employment prospects (Bell et al., 2002; de Jonge, 2018). MacQuarrie et al., (2019) provide a useful summary of international efforts generally with respect to better addressing the impact of domestic abuse in the workplace, including the role of the International Labour Organization (ILO). However, with a few exceptions (Macgregor et al., 2016, 2017, 2022; Wathen et al., 2018), there has been limited academic research that recognises the role of trade unions in addressing the workplace impact of domestic abuse. Conversely, the ethical role of unions in influencing corporate social responsibility (CSR) is an area of growing interest within the literature (Harvey et al., 2017; Goerke, 2022). Given that the 'essence' of trade unionism is to represent, provide advice and lobby for their members, very often in terms of their mental, physical, and emotional wellbeing (Hodder and Edwards, 2015), the aim of this paper is to explore the role of trade unions in potentially making the ethical case for effective domestic abuse policy and practice. For these reasons, it is argued that trade unions, working with employers, play a key role in making the workplace a potential source of valuable support for employees who are experiencing abuse (Reeves and O'Leary-Kelly, 2009; Wilcox et al., 2020). For instance, as highlighted by MacGregor et al. (2022), working with management, trade unions can assist those employees affected to access confidential counselling. To give context to the discussion, the United Nations (2020) recently referred to the global rise in domestic abuse during Covid-19, with reduced access to support or to escape perpetrators, as the 'shadow pandemic'. Crucially, even before Covid-19 in the UK, 28.9% of women and 13.2% of men had experienced some form of domestic abuse since the age of sixteen (ONS, 2018).

The article is structured as follows. A critical review is presented of the relevant literature on CSR and the role of the unions in promulgating its core objectives. The workplace impact of domestic abuse is then considered. The methodology for the research follows, outlining the nature of the methods

1
2
3 chosen to investigate the research question under consideration. The article turns subsequently to a
4
5 discussion of the research findings. It closes with a critical reflection on the implications of the findings
6
7 in terms of a better conceptual understanding and the practical actions that can be taken to 8
9 operationalise an effective strategy. Furthermore, it critically assesses the key role that trade unions
10
11 play in that process.
12
13
14
15

16 Literature review

17 CSR and the role of the unions

18
19 Freeman and Hasnaoui (2011), through their extensive review of the 'many meanings of CSR', rightly 20
21 note its complexity. CSR can be seen both as a theoretical construct but also a very practical means by 22
23 which organisations can engage more ethically and, therefore, effectively with communities and 24
25 society (McWilliams et al., 2006). It has been also argued that CSR is a potential vehicle for achieving 26
27 greater equality and wellbeing in society and in the workplace (Grosser and Moon, 2019).
28
29 Nonetheless, the traditional focus of CSR initiatives for organisations has been on how effective they 30
31 are in terms of the business case for delivering in the interests of shareholders as the dominant
32
33 stakeholders in the organisation (Crane et al., 2019).
34
35
36
37
38

39 The conceptualisation of CSR by Archie Carroll continues to be particularly influential as a working 40
41 definition. His seminal model (1998; 2016) highlights for him the four key dimensions of CSR:
42
43 economic, legal, ethical, and philanthropic. The dimensions are non-hierarchical and mutually 44
45 supportive. The 'economic' dimension represents the cost benefits case for CSR and the 'legal'
46
47 dimension captures the social 'codified ethics' (Carroll 1998, p.2) of corporate behaviour. The 'ethical'
48
49 element of the model sets out what is expected by the firm's stakeholders from a moral perspective.
50
51 These, for instance, might be in terms of climate awareness or social citizenship. Finally, the fourth
52
53 level relates to CSR's more philanthropic contributions, that go beyond the other three in relation to 54
55 an organisation's relationship with, and broader responsibilities to, society.
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Focusing specifically on domestic abuse, Larrieta-Rubin de Celis et al., (2017) emphasise the need for
4 CSR to fully embrace the occupational health and safety needs of women as a key stakeholder. Katz
5
6
7
8 et al., (2017) also advocate that the impact of domestic abuse can be addressed through the utilisation
9
10 of CSR as a map for action.

11
12
13 Crucially, from Flanders' 'sword of justice' (1970) to Hodder and Edwards (2015) model of the 14
15 'essence' of trade unionism, the ethical function of the union has been well articulated. This is 16
17 particularly so in terms of their traditional role "to defend the interests of the employee stakeholder"
18
19 (Preuss et al., 2015 p.1). Framed within a discussion on the politics of CSR and the respective power 20
21 of different key stakeholders (Frynas and Stephens, 2015), writers globally have increasingly 22
23 recognised the specific role of unions in helping determine businesses' CSR strategy (Dawkins, 2010).
24
25 Equally significant is the distinction made by Matten and Moon (2008) of CSR as a more 'explicit'
26
27 element of corporate policies, typical within national institutions that encourage individualism, like 28
29 those in the US. This contrasts with countries whose corporate institutional practices are based on a
30
31 more 'implicit' CSR facilitated by a collective approach to policy deliberation; for instance, in countries
32
33 where union influence is stronger. Similarly, Gold et al., (2015) in comparing the 'liberal market
34
35 economy' of the UK with more 'coordinated market economies' like Germany, highlight how variations
36
37 in capitalism can impact on the nature of CSR in different countries and, in the context of their study,
38
39 on unions' propensity to engage with CSR.
40
41
42
43

44 Delbard's (2011) studies of European unions also reveal that in relation to multinational corporations
45
46 (MNCs), the institutional culture of employee relations can determine whether it is perceived by 47
48 unions as an opportunity or threat. As Chun and Shin (2018) note, unions may oppose a CSR initiative, 49
50 for instance environmental, if it is seen to have an adverse effect on their members' wages.
51
52 Conversely, for Gold et al., (2020), CSR can offer real opportunities for unions to revitalise their 53
54 influence.
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 At a more micro-level, Boodoo (2020) usefully identifies a correlation between union density at
4 company level and the greater willingness of an organisation to negotiate on more employee as well
5 as non-employee CSR issues. Snell and Gikara (2020) highlight specifically how, in this case to secure
6 the employer's support for redundant workers, unions can effectively negotiate specific collective 7 bargaining agreements within the aegis of CSR.
8
9
10
11
12

13
14 In this context, Schons and Steinmeier (2016) usefully argue that the level of 'proximity' of a
15 stakeholder, such as a union, can dictate whether CSR strategy is merely 'symbolic' or more
16 'substantive' in its outcomes. Significantly, the success of the union in achieving these substantive 17 aims is assessed by Harvey et al. (2017) in terms of how effectively the union can utilise the 18 'deliberative processes' open to them in influencing a firm's CSR policies and practice.
19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27

28 The ethical role of the unions in addressing the workplace impact of domestic abuse

29
30 That domestic abuse continues to be seen by many as a 'private' matter remains a key barrier to the 31 development of strategies to address its effects in the workplace. For many victims/survivors there
32 exists a perceived stigma to disclosing their abuse, which leads to many organisations assuming that 33 it is not something that impacts upon their workplace or that they need to consider (CIPD/EHRC, 34 2020). In contrast, however, a review of the literature discussed in this article demonstrates that there
35 are clear legal, economic, and moral arguments driving the overall ethical case for why the workplace
36 impact of domestic abuse should be addressed.
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47

48 The legal case

49
50 Since 2015, UK laws have incorporated the concepts of coercive and controlling behaviour to highlight
51 the range and complexity of behaviours that were reflected in lived experiences of domestic abuse.
52 The definition of domestic abuse is "any incident or pattern of incidents of controlling, coercive or 53 threatening behaviour, violence or abuse between those aged 16 or over who are or have been 54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 intimate partners or family members regardless of gender or sexuality” (Stark and Hester 2019, p.83).

4
5 Domestic abuse can cover psychological, physical, sexual, financial, and emotional abuse.

6
7 Building on the legal duty of police to disclose the previous history of perpetrators to an individual
8
9 who may be at risk, as enshrined within ‘Clare’s Law’ (Fitz-Gibbon and Walklate, 2017), a significant 10
11 move by the UK Government has been the enactment of the more comprehensive Domestic Abuse 12
13 Act 2021. A key aim of this new legislation is, through giving a clear and extensive definition of 14
15 domestic abuse, to extend powers to police and the courts and prioritise the accommodation needs
16
17 of victim/survivors of abuse. Furthermore, its intention is to challenge the underlying attitudes and 18
19 norms that underpin all aspects of abuse. Both these laws need to be understood by employers in the 20
21 context of developing effective policy. Additionally, whilst there are some ‘new workplace protections’
22
23 (Atkins, 2021), with the exception of Northern Ireland (Lewis Silkin, 2022) and in contrast to legislation
24
25 in Australia, New Zealand, Canada and parts of the US, there is no stipulation to specifically recognise 26
27 the need for paid or at the least unpaid leave rights for employees who are experiencing domestic 28
29 abuse (Baird et al., 2014; Katz et al., 2017; Donne 2021; Government of Canada, 2022). The legal driver 30
31 for employers to address the impact of domestic abuse, particularly with respect to their duty of care
32
33 under broader health and safety legislation (Larrieta-Rubin de Celis et al., (2017), is also a feature of 34
35 the discussion that follows.
36
37
38
39
40
41
42

43 The business case

44
45 Many of those experiencing domestic abuse are in employment (CIPD/EHRC,2020). This, therefore,
46
47 strengthens the argument that employers should take this issue seriously, given that the economic 48
49 costs of domestic abuse are increasingly apparent. It has been estimated that the costs to the UK
50
51 economy amounted to over £14 billion as “lost output due to time off work and reduced productivity
52
53 as a consequence of domestic abuse” in 2016/17 (Oliver et al. 2019, p.6). Furthermore, despite being 54
55 suffered primarily by the employee (for instance lost wages), economic costs can be incurred by 56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 employers, and by the State, specifically in terms of health care and criminal justice costs. In the US,
4
5 for instance, costs can run into trillions of dollars (Peterson et al., 2018).
6

7
8 Although it is difficult to quantify, domestic abuse also affects the ability of the victim/survivor to 9
10 maintain adequate performance (ILO, 2019). The most common workplace impact of domestic abuse
11
12 is reduced attendance at work. The reasons for absence can range from actions by the perpetrator
13
14 preventing an individual from getting to work (for example, hiding car keys), to victims/survivors being 15
16 unable to attend work because of the physical, emotional, or psychological effects of the abuse
17
18 (Trades Union Council (TUC), 2014; Showalter, 2016; Wathen et al., 2018). Significantly, research data
19
20 reveals a clear business case in terms of the organisational benefits of reducing absence due to abuse,
21
22 and the improved performance of victim/survivors (Swanberg et al., 2005; de Jonge, 2018). Domestic 23
24 abuse can also impact on employee turnover. This impact, however, will often be one that is hidden
25
26 since it is not uncommon for an employee simply to leave their job or to be dismissed for disciplinary 27
28 breaches, without ever having disclosed the role that domestic abuse played in this outcome (de 29
30 Jonge, 2018; CIPD/EHRC, 2020). Hart and Heybrock state that employers should, therefore, see 31
32 “violence prevention plans as an investment in human capital rather than an expense” (2017, p.9).
33
34
35
36
37
38

39 The moral case

40
41 This case premises the actions needed to support a victim/survivor, because it is right and proper to 42
43 do so as a good employer but also that those actions will realise economic benefits. Fundamentally 44
45 and morally, as the TUC have commented, “supporting employees who are experiencing domestic 46
47 violence is crucial. Without a job and a source of income, those experiencing the abuse are less likely 48
49 to find a way of escaping the abusive relationship” (TUC, 2014, p.7). It can also improve the employee’s
50
51 sense of self-esteem, motivation, ‘economic empowerment’ and go some way to countering negative
52
53 messages from abusive partners (Reeves and O’Leary-Kelly, 2009).
54
55

56
57 Nevertheless, maintaining employment can be difficult. Where victims/survivors feel they have no
58
59 option but to quit a job, this can result in a downward spiral of reduced income and fragmented work 60

1
2
3 histories that make sustaining a viable income increasingly difficult (Showalter, 2016; Women's Aid,
4 2019). Sadly, research on financial abuse (where an abuser appropriates their partner's wages for their
5 own use, for example) demonstrates that just because a victim/survivor has a good income it does not
6 necessarily mean that they either control it or could use it to escape from the situation (Sharp, 2008;
7 Sharp-Jeffs, 2016).

8
9
10 This said, enlightened workplaces potentially remain a key place in which to 'break the silence' about 11 domestic abuse, by raising awareness and being supportive in order that employees feel supported
12 should they decide to disclose about their own experiences. Crucially, it should not be necessary for 13 victims/survivors to disclose to gain support, as this can jeopardise their safety, wellbeing, and career
14 (Swanberg et al., 2005; O'Doherty et al., 2016). Instead, confidential access to a range of support,
15 whether they choose to disclose or not, should be available (World Health Organization (WHO), 2014; 16 Macgregor et al., 2022). Where employers do act to address domestic abuse, the response should
17 take the form of a policy and procedure (CIPD/EHRC, 2020), underpinned by training and awareness
18 raising activities to generate a supportive organisational culture (O'Leary-Kelly et al. 2008).
19 Nonetheless, it is currently not known what the most effective ways are of providing support to 20 domestic abuse victims/survivors in the workplace, as there has been little evaluation work in this 21 area (Adhia et al., 2019).

22 23 24 25 26 27 28 29 30 31 32 33 34 35 36 37 38 39 40 41 42 43 44 Methodology

45 Utilising concepts drawn from a critical analysis of domestic abuse research and the literature that 46 has investigated the degree of influence and involvement of trade unions in relation to CSR, the 47 following research question is critically assessed - What ethical arguments might unions put to 48 encourage employers to introduce a domestic abuse policy and to make those policies work effectively
49 in practice?

50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57 The findings reported in this paper are based on research that captured the views and experiences of 58 a cross-section of 39 union representatives from a range of unions and organisations they represented
59
60

1
2
3 in a region of England. Approval was obtained from the University ethical research committee. A
4 formal informed consent procedure was used as part of that process. Following presentations to 5 regional TUC women's and executive committees, interviews were arranged through 'snowballing' to 6 contacts provided by those attending the presentations. Further participation came through a variety
7 of channels to ensure a broad sample for the region. Broad brush demographics of the sample are set
8 out in table I. Given the sensitive nature of domestic abuse, detailed information cannot be given,
9 and all respondents are anonymised. Respondents were mostly female and represented by a range of 10 trade unions including GMB, UCU, USDAW, NEU, Unite, RCN, UNISON, FBU, RCM, CWU, PCS and the 11 TUC.

12
13 Interviewees' union roles covered branch and area secretaries, branch and regional officers, shop
14 stewards, organisers, project workers, learning reps, and other education roles; and their members
15 were from an array of industrial sectors including local government, education, retail, manufacturing, 16 transport, and emergency services. Respondents' experience was limited to partner abuse.

17
18 Critically, whilst based on the perspectives and experiences of key 'supporters' in the workplace
19 (Gregory, 2017), we cannot presume to suggest that we are 'giving voice' to the victim/survivor
20 themselves. Nevertheless, it is of note that a significant minority (10) of respondents revealed during 21 the interview that they themselves been victim/survivors of abuse. It could be argued, therefore, that 22 they could speak with insight and empathy about the experience of supporting their members.

23
24 Interviews were recorded and full transcribed. The interviews lasted for an hour on average. The 25 interviews focussed on several key areas:

- 26 • How effective were the domestic abuse policies and practice of the employers with whom 27 they had contact?
- 28 • How had members disclosed to them that they were experiencing abuse?
- 29 • What types of ethical arguments might representatives potentially put forward to employer 30 to address domestic abuse issues?
- 31 • How successful might such a strategy be?

1
2
3 The data were analysed using template analysis (King et al., 2018). Interview transcripts were first
4 thematically analysed to explore key issues through the construction of an initial template. In this way,
5 early categorisation could be made based on the initial questions put to the respondents. Coding was 6 undertaken by both researchers and cross-referenced for consistency throughout the analysis of 7 transcripts. Further coding revealed the moral, legal, and economic imperatives articulated by 8 respondents.

9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16 Table I. HERE

17 18 19 20 21 Findings

22 23 The lack of domestic abuse policy

24
25 In line with the literature, few of the respondents were aware of dedicated a policy related to domestic 26 abuse at the organisations in which they supported members (Kulkarni and Ross, 2016; de Jonge, 27 2018). This was also reflected in the comments of one trade union education tutor who noted that 15
28 of the 16 delegates on a recent union course, from a cross-section of public-sector organisations,
29 reported that their organisation had no domestic abuse policy.

30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60
This absence of policy suggests that, for many employers, domestic abuse is not perceived as having an impact within their organisation and, therefore, requires no action (CIPD/EHRC, 2020). Predictably, for most respondents, persuading employers that domestic abuse is a workplace issue was not always straightforward. A typical sentiment was expressed by one respondent who stated that, "I think if we
[the union] went in and said domestic violence, I think they would sort of like go "oh, but nobody suffers from that here" (Interviewee 3).

Several interviewees commented that, even where a policy existed, what happened in practice was not necessarily aligned to that policy. For those respondents, it was more about 'box ticking' rather than actions of real substance. As a union project worker who dealt with many organisations stressed:

1
2
3 “A lot of them will say they’ve got them, but nobody’s aware of them or nobody can read
4 them because they’re not readable. So, they need writing and designing and delivering or 5 whatever in a way that people understand” (Interviewee 1).
6
7
8
9

10 Similarly, despite the good intentions of all parties to a negotiated agreement at corporate level, it
11 counts for little if it isn’t acted on in practice. The following quote illustrates that even where a policy
12 had a measure of ‘symbolic’ validity (Schons and Steinmeier, 2016), if there was no awareness of the 13 policy and no training offered to those who were responsible for its implementation, it was of limited
14 ‘substantive’ (ibid.) utility:
15
16
17
18
19

20
21 “When it comes to practise a lot of people aren't even aware that these policies exist, they're 22 hidden away on the internet somewhere. So, like we were all happy with it when it was 23 finished, and all read it and it was formally signed off. It was agreed by the unions and there's 24 a press statement about it and this kind of stuff. But I think the actual implementation of it
25 with regards to like training for management and stuff like that and making people aware of 26 it was non-existent probably” (Interviewee 22).
27
28
29
30
31
32
33

34 Furthermore, for a typical union officer, the role of HR was central in recognising the need for good 35 policy and practice:
36
37

38
39 “It would be great if...Organisations like CIPD [Chartered Institute of Personnel and 40 Development] were to endorse this as good practise. That would get your HR managers
41 listening...That would get them talking about the kind of the holistic approach to managing 42 staff retention, they’d probably get less disciplinaries...HR managers would listen as well as 43 unions working together, because quite often you know, we both want the same thing for the 44 people we represent...Like CIPD are really supporting our health and wellbeing programme
45 that we've got” (Interviewee 14).
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Absence and performance issues: Making the business case
4

5 In accord with the literature (Hart and Heybrock, 2017; de Jonge, 2018), recognising domestic abuse
6 as the real reason for absence resonated generally with interviewees' experiences as a key factor for 7 making a business case for employer action. Most respondents reported that infringements of an 8 absence policy and the resulting managerial intervention were often what led to disclosure. The most 9 common issues appear to be frequent and unexplained absenteeism or irregular attendance patterns.
10 As the following, and typical, contribution from one union officer representing staff in the food and 11 drink industry graphically illustrates:
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19

20
21 "They'd gone off sick...[were] not even [in] a frame of mind, a stable state of mind, to actually 22 inform the employer, so it was an unauthorised absence, that's why it was a little bit less dealt
23 with empathetically [by management]. But...I have to say, this individual was in no fit frame
24 of mind to do anything about it, at that moment in time" (Interviewee 34).
25
26
27
28
29

30 Many of the organisations where interviewees represented members had absence and attendance
31 policies that automatically trigger action when several absences have been recorded. These are often 32 part of a suite of measures linked to capability and performance reviews with disciplinary sanctions
33 leading to dismissal as a final stage. For the representatives who had experience of supporting 34 victims/survivors within these workplaces, disclosure often only occurred when an employee faced 35 some form of organisational sanction as part of these processes.
36
37
38
39
40
41
42

43 Further, in line with the literature (TUC, 2014; Wathen et al., 2018), respondents reported several 44 specific reasons why an employee who is experiencing domestic abuse might present with a pattern
45 of absenteeism or poor attendance at work, including having been beaten and being physically unable 46 to attend work or needing to stay at home to care for children. Therefore, this can lead to a pattern
47 of absenteeism that is problematic from an employer perspective but the causes of which are not 48 understood. As this respondent, who represents members in Government services, noted:
49
50
51
52
53
54
55

56
57 "They'll have a sickness policy and normally you will find somebody who is experiencing,
58 you know, horrific beatings at the weekends will not come into work on a Monday...they 59
60

1
2
3 don't ask the person about why they've been off, they just say, oh you've been off again
4
5 another Monday and they make an assumption, oh it's because you've had a heavy
6
7 weekend, you know, you've had too much to drink, or you know, you're just 8
9 exhausted...[Whilst] really it's a day of rest for that person from the abuse, or the physical 10
11 attacks that they're experiencing when their partner goes to work or leaves the house" 12
13
14 (Interviewee 33).
15

16 It is at this point that the absence system triggers a management intervention. As another 17
18 interviewee, who represented workers in the transport sector, reported:
19

20
21 "That's why I say that reps can identify the problems. Because they're the first point of 22
23 contact when members are off on the sick, they've been invited into a sickness review, 24
25 which we know is going to get a sanction, so the rep is always that first point of contact"
26
27
28 (Interviewee 10).
29

30 In some cases, this can lead to disclosure. Conversely, an employee may simply leave their job rather 31
32 than disclose, irrespective of reassurances from the representative. The examples above graphically
33
34 illustrate the duty that the representative and the manager have to be fully supportive of the 35
36 individual experiencing abuse, whilst recognising that it must remain for the victim/survivor to decide
37
38 whether, how and to whom to disclose. Those examples also highlight how seemingly routine
39
40 approaches to absence management can cause palpable problems in the context of domestic abuse.
41

42 Respondents from across sectors felt that in addition to supporting staff, it could reduce employer
43
44 costs if absence and performance management policy were less rigid and more transparent, allowing 45
46 managers to interpret employee behaviour more sensitively. An interviewee from the TUC
47
48 supporting union reps across many sectors opined:
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 “If we were to build a business case to the employers around...If you're looking at them
4
5
6 [victim/survivors], they're more likely to stay with you...[if you] invest in your workers
7
8
9
10 and safeguard them to an extent” (Interviewee 14).
11
12

13 For another participant, who supported workers in the communications industry, when asked 14
15
16 whether a business case could be persuasive, commented that, “if you've got someone being 17
18
19 off sick, or going off with stress...you lose productivity and so you hit [employers] with those 20
21
22 words” (Interviewee 4).
23
24
25

26 Summarising these contributions, the overall potential impact that the unions could have, in 27
28
29 relation to making the strategic business case for an effective domestic abuse policy is articulated well
30
31 by a public sector regional officer:
32

33 “Unfortunately, a lot of [sector named] employers have quite punitive policies in place when 34
35
36 it comes to things like attendance management. So, there's certainly a massive job for the 37
38
39 union in making sure that the employers' policies have provision so that they don't end up 40
41
42 penalising people who are victims of domestic abuse...[and]...have time off of work as a result 43
44
45 of that...It's really important that we educate the reps so that they can go back and review
46
47
48 those policies....it could end up making a huge impact” (Interviewee 17).
49

50 Making the legal case for effective policies

51 Making the legal case for domestic abuse policies was less prevalent in the interviews. It was argued,
52
53
54 however, that the ‘business case’ could be strengthened if there was legislation in place to support
55
56
57 victims/survivors of domestic abuse in the workplace. This reflected the criticism of the Domestic 58
59
60 Abuse Act 2021 in the UK reported earlier (Donne, 2021; Atkins, 2021). In addition, most

1
2
3 representatives felt that trade unions should be involved in campaigning for employment law changes,
4
5 which would also enable representatives to provide better support.
6

7 A further justification for employer action cited by many interviewees was with respect to the 8
9 employer's duty of care, specifically in relation to health and safety legislation. As one typical 10
11 respondent from the TUC stated:
12

13
14 "I think there's recognition that employers have a responsibility to provide staff...[with] a safe
15
16 working environment. You know, a duty of care and recognise that...domestic violence and 17
18 abuse can actually impact on people's workplace performance because obviously when you 19
20 come to work you bring all of your personal issues with you as well. And I think a clear
21
22 recognition that the workplace should also be somewhere where people should be trained to 23
24 spot these things or have a policy" (Interviewee 14).
25
26

27
28 For another union representative, it was about 'using the law' to win the support their member 29
30 needed:
31

32 "She [the manager] said the application for special leave has been denied, so I just said, 'Well
33
34 in that case then, we need to be following law'. And she looked at me...and said, 'What's that?'
35
36 I went there's a four-year-old child involved here, and she wants to apply for parental leave.
37
38 And she just said oh, right, and how much? And I just said she wants the lot. She wants it all 39
40 in one go. I think that were 18 weeks. Because of childcare issues" (Interviewee 13).
41
42

43 Similarly, a regional officer supporting workers in the food and drink sector, used health and safety 44
45 obligations in his discussions with a management:
46

47
48 "I just kept re-emphasising that obviously their duty of care in relation to supporting the staff, 49
50 you know, even though it's initially from outside the workplace, in making reasonable 51
52 adjustments" (Interviewee 34).
53
54
55
56

57 The moral case for recognising and addressing the stigma of experiencing abuse
58
59
60

1
2
3 There is a clear moral case outlined in the literature which was also implicit in respondents' views. For 4 instance, the recognition that victim/survivors need to maintain a belief in their competence and
5 ability to do the job (MacGregor et al., 2019; CIPD/EHRC,2020) can be a powerful reason behind non-
6 disclosure. For many respondents this was not only due to a sense of personal identity. It was also to 7 do with the very real fear that if one is seen as a victim/survivor of domestic abuse this could
8 compromise that person's job prospects and negatively affect how work colleagues and managers
9 perceive them. As put succinctly by one TUC educator:

18
19 "It's for the person like saving face, nobody...wants you to know their business and I think 20 the person often feels as though, well obviously their self-esteem has been stripped, but 21 like "oh I can't face [other] staff", and it's awkward for the other [staff], it's almost like 22 the elephant in the room. Do we talk about it?" (Interviewee 3).

23
24
25
26
27
28 The reported concerns that shape victims' perceptions reflected those in the literature (Kulkarni and 29 Ross, 2016; MacGregor et al., 2016). Where that viewpoint of oneself can manifest itself in shame, 30 embarrassment, fears about confidentiality, risks to their safety and wellbeing, and the belief that 31 being a victim/survivor of abuse would in some way reflect badly on them. These negatives outcomes
32 for staff experiencing abuse further highlighted for all the interviewees how crucial it was that union
33 representatives worked closely with the line manager. Those 'moral' sentiments are encapsulated well
34 in the following comments from a public sector local representative:

35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43 "As a rep I think you try to persuade your member that actually it's in their interest to 44 be like for full disclosure so that then both us and the employer can support them. But 45 in real life people don't feel comfortable doing that for whatever reasons and what 46 usually happens...was that people would 'call in' because either they'd had a domestic 47 violence incident, or they were dealing with the repercussions of one. They'd been at 48 hospital or something like that and they'd just tell their line manager "oh, I've got flu"
49 or "I've got a cold". So, what would happen was that they would have all these unrelated
50 periods of absence, so the manager would have to deal with it on that basis, so on a 51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 sickness basis rather than dealing with that as a domestic violence issue” (Interviewee
4
5 19).

6
7 Representatives were aware that if workers were unable to tell their managers about the abuse, their 8 attendance policies meant that ‘sickness’ could lead to dismissal, whereas domestic abuse may be 9 treated more sympathetically. Conversely, representatives have a difficult role, if a member discloses
10 to them, in informing the worker of the potential options and outcomes whilst ensuring they do not
11 feel pressured to disclose to others. Mirroring Kulkarni and Ross’s (2016) findings, trust is a key aspect
12 of disclosure that was mentioned by several interviewees. It not only covered trust in managers or 13 human resource professionals, who could be seen as being the route to accessing a policy, but as the 14 quote above suggests, even to trusting their union representative. It is difficult to under-estimate how 15 strongly these aspects influence victims/survivors and prevent them from disclosing their situation.
16 This can lead them to be in breach of organisational rules regarding attendance and it is why it is often
17 only when a crisis occurs that their silence is broken. As a representative of workers in a large
18 Government department conceded, “there is such a stigma and it is so difficult for people to say, isn’t 19 it?” (Interviewee 5).

20
21 As the previous quotes illustrate, the first stage for many of the interviewees was being fully 22 supportive of the employee that they may, if they so wished, disclose to them. This was in order that 23 they could more fully represent their case to HR and to the manager. However, another barrier to 24 overcome to this end could be the stigma of people not believing you. As one representative who had 25 also experienced abuse personally, declared:

26
27
28 “Sometimes when you talk about it to people, you’re aware of how you might sound and 29 you think, You sound like one of these people who’s trying to get attention and making 30 things up” (Interviewee 1).

31
32 Similarly, as another representative reported reflecting also on their own experience of abuse, an 33 additional barrier was ‘victim blaming’:

1
2
3 “We have to raise an awareness...because it’s still very, it’s still a very not talked about
4 subject. And you’ve still got the whole problems of victim blaming, where people without
5 realising say stuff that puts blame on the victim... I've had people ask me questions, “Well
6 why did you stay with him so long?”. “Why didn’t you just walk away?”, “Why don’t you
7 do this?”, “Why don’t you do that?”. And it’s not that simple” (Interviewee 16).
8
9
10
11
12
13

14 In closing this section and returning to some of the reoccurring themes in the literature (Navarro et 15 al., 2014; Adhia et al., 2019), for one senior officer the moral imperative is clear:
16
17

18 “The manager’s need to be trained to understand immediate disclosure, it’s like mental 19 health. Mental health at the moment as you say, the number one reason for absenteeism
20 is the stigma with mental health, a bit like domestic violence, people feel that they’ve done
21 something wrong or it’s a failing, so they don’t disclose and then they end up in a lot of 22 trouble and, near the end of the line we get a disclosure and we’re trying to pull it back”
23 (Interviewee 33).
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38

39 Discussion and conclusion

40
41 Although it has been a huge societal issue for many years, in the context of this study MacGregor et 42 al., (2019) note in their recent review of the extant literature that there has been a proliferation in 43 interest in the workplace impact of domestic abuse in the last decade. Furthermore, the reported
44 increase globally in the incidence of domestic abuse during the Covid-19 lockdown, with more
45 employees at risk whilst working at home, has further highlighted the need for action (Elliott, 2020;
46 Sánchez et al.,2020; United Nations, 2020). Against this backdrop and utilising a research question
47 derived from a review of the current domestic abuse and CSR literature, the focus of the article has 48 been on the ethical arguments unions might utilise to encourage employers to introduce effective
49 domestic abuse policy and procedures. The research question facilitated an investigation into the 50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 specific moral, legal and economic arguments, framed within a model of CSR (Carroll, 2016), that 4 unions put to encourage employers to introduce a domestic abuse policy and to make that policy and
5
6 procedures work effectively in practice.
7
8
9

10
11
12
13
14
15
16 From the discussion it can be argued that the moral case is specifically captured in the narratives of 17 the union respondents with respect to their and employers' duty to victim/survivors to first recognise 18 and then seek ways to ameliorate the stigma of domestic abuse, in order that they may feel able to 19 disclose. Respondents' references to the employer's duty of care for victims/survivors, in terms of 20 health and safety obligations, also had resonance with the legal implications for not introducing
21 appropriate policy highlighted in the literature (Larrieta-Rubin de Celis et al., 2017). Furthermore, a 22 key outcome of the research is the strong business case for why employers should address domestic 23 abuse, all demonstrated through the core, social value of working with the unions.
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33

34 Significantly, and in accord with the literature, respondents reported that members experienced 35 multiple types of domestic abuse including physical, mental, financial, and emotional (TUC, 2014;
36 Wathen et al., 2018). In addition, there was clear evidence, in terms of CSR and specifically in relation
37 to the moral, legal, and business cases (Schwartz and Carroll, 2003; Carroll, 2016; Hocking, 2017), for 38 why employers should address the workplace impact of domestic abuse.
39
40
41
42
43
44

45 Crucially, there are several key issues that arise. Practically, the findings revealed that the drivers
46 should be viewed as non-hierarchical (Carroll, 2016). This inter-relationship was evident in that, for 47 the respondents, the drivers are multi-dependent and of equal value in driving the overall ethical case
48 for addressing the impact of abuse in the workplace. Secondly, in terms of CSR theory and practice, 49 the degree of 'proximity' evidenced in the findings relating to union deliberation with employers and
50 particularly joint action following disclosure, suggests that unions could have some real influence in 51 achieving 'substantive' domestic abuse policy and practice within organisations (Schons and 52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Steinmeier, 2016). Furthermore, utilising Harvey et al.'s (2017) 'dimensions of trade union voice
4 efficacy' in the context of CSR, this research suggests that more senior union officers should be able
5
6 to also negotiate a change a policy with management through 'internal communication'. Unions could 7
8 also use 'external mobilisation' to put pressure on government to mainstream domestic abuse as a 9
10 key people management policy and part of the legal obligations of all employers. The findings of this 11
12 research further suggest that stakeholder 'buy in' from senior management, line managers, 13
14 employees and HR colleagues is central to the success of any CSR initiative, particularly when viewed 15
16 by stakeholders with respect to the key driver of health and wellbeing (Wibberley et al., 2018).
17
18

19
20 In addition, reflecting on the link between union strength and influence and the ability to negotiate
21
22 successfully with employers within the CSR agenda, it is apparent that with sufficient bargaining power
23
24 and justifiable arguments, specific groups within the workplace, in this case employees experiencing 25
26 domestic abuse, can be the focus of effectively negotiated collective agreements (Boodoo, 2020; Snell
27
28 and Gikara, 2020).
29
30

31
32 In terms of recommendations arising out of the research, it can be argued that the discussion above
33
34 offers a strong case for all organisations to introduce an effective domestic abuse policy based on clear 35
36 business, legal and moral arguments. This then leads to the question of how best could this objective
37
38 be achieved? In answer to this it is important to note several key issues. Reflecting further on the 39
40 evidence from the study, few organisations known to the respondents have a specific domestic abuse
41
42 policy. Furthermore, this lack of policy meant that most managers and HR professionals in those 43
44 organisations appeared not to have any specific training in relation to domestic abuse. Even where 45
46 there was a policy, there needed to be more practical advice about what both employees and 47
48 managers can or should do in response to domestic abuse (CIPD/EHRC, 2020). Conversely, 49
50 organisational responses tended to be reactive and ad hoc and, although often positive, it would 51
52 require a huge leap of faith for a victim/survivor of abuse to disclose to anyone when it is unclear from 53
54 the outset how this information will be received. Disclosure is normally triggered by a crisis and the 55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 interviewees' experiences in our study echo those in the wider literature (Reeves and O'Leary-Kelly,
4 2009; CIPD/EHRC, 2020). All of these points need actioning as part of an effective policy.
5
6
7

8 In addition, problems, as reported within our sample, with performance, attendance and absence
9 that are most commonly the result of domestic abuse, would be typically brought to a manager's or a
10 union representative's attention only at that crisis point. Therefore, with the move to more formalised
11 and wide-ranging performance management practices and the increased devolution of responsibility 12 for people management to the line, recognising and addressing the potential workplace impact of 13 domestic abuse is something that should at the least be included in managerial training on 14 performance management (Kulkarni and Ross, 2016; Adhia et al. 2019). Conversely, policies and 15 support that rely on victims/survivors' disclosure are not helpful and should be avoided. As the WHO
16 (2014) recommends, victims/survivors should not in any way be pressured to disclose. All these learning
17 outcomes from the research would, it is argued, positively inform the introduction and practice of the 18 recommended policy for all organisations.
19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32

33 In closing, this research has limitations, in that it is only based on the perspectives and experiences of 34 trade union representatives. Further, it is a relatively small study involving respondents who were 35 more likely to take part because of their having supported members experiencing domestic abuse.
36
37 Conceptually however, it can be argued that, from a critical review of the literature and the 38 subsequent analysis of the research data, there is a clear ethical model by which the unions may 39 potentially articulate the key moral, legal, and business drivers for introducing an effective domestic 40 abuse policy and practice. Furthermore, in resonance with other writers (de Jonge, 2018; Macgregor 41 et al., 2016, 2017), within this model there exist persuasive wellbeing reasons for why that policy
42 should be developed.
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Bibliography

- Adhia A., Gelaye B., Friedman L., Marlow L., Mercy J. and Williams, M. (2019). 'Workplace interventions for intimate partner violence: A systematic review'. Journal of Workplace Behavioral Health, Vol.34 No.3, pp.149-166. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15555240.2019.1609361>
- Atkins, S. (2021) New law ignores economic barriers to escaping domestic abuse. <https://www.socialistparty.org.uk/issue/1132/32474/05-05-2021/new-law-ignores-economic-barriers-to-escaping-domestic-abuse>(accessed 25.4.22)
- Baird, M., McFerran, L. and Wright, I. (2014). 'An equality bargaining breakthrough: Paid domestic violence leave', Journal of Industrial Relations Vol.56, No.2, pp.190–200. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022185613517471>
- Bell, M., Moe, A. and Schweinle, W. (2002). 'Partner violence and work: Not just a "domestic issue"', Academy of Management, Vol 8, pp1-6. <https://doi.org/10.5465/apb.2002.7519496>
- Boodoo, M. (2020). The Influence of Unions on CSR: Is There a Trade-Off Between Employee-Oriented and Non- Employee-Oriented Policies? British Journal of Industrial Relations, Vol. 58 No.4, pp.816–843. <https://doi.org/10.1111/bjir.12530>
- Carroll, A. B. (1998). The four faces of corporate citizenship. Business and Society Review Vol.100 No.101, pp.1–7. <https://doi.org/10.1111/0045-3609.00008>
- Carroll, A. (2016). 'Carroll's pyramid of CSR: taking another look'. International Journal of Corporate Social Responsibility Vol.1, No.3, pp. 1-8 <https://doi.org/10.1186/s40991-016-0004-6>
- Chun, H-M. and Shin, S-Y (2018). 'The Impact of Labor Union Influence on Corporate Social Responsibility Sustainability', MDPI. Vol.10, No.6, pp.1-17. <https://doi.org/10.3390/su10061922>
- CIPD/EHRC (2020). Managing and supporting employee experiencing domestic abuse: A guide for employers, CIPD Publications, London.
- Crane, A., Matten, D., Glozer, S. and Spence, L. (2019). Business ethics: managing corporate citizenship and sustainability in the age of globalization. Oxford University Press, Oxford.
- Dawkins, C. (2010). 'Beyond Wages and Working Conditions: A Conceptualization of Labor Union Social Responsibility'. Journal of Business Ethics Vol.95, pp.129–143. <https://www.jstor.org/stable/40784943>

- 1
2
3 de Jonge, A. (2018). 'Corporate Social Responsibility Through a Feminist Lens: Domestic Violence and the
4
5 Workplace in the 21st Century'. Journal of Business Ethics Vol.148, pp.471–487.
6
7 <https://www.jstor.org/stable/45022454>
8
9
10 Delbard, O. (2011). 'Social partners or full-fledged stakeholders? Trade unions and CSR in Europe' Society and 11
12 Business Review Vol.6, No.3, pp. 260-277. <https://DOI: 10.1108/17465681111171000>
13
14 Donne, E. (2021) 'Domestic Abuse Bill: So much still to fight for' The Socialist newspaper, 31
15
16 March. <https://www.socialistparty.org.uk/articles/32270/31-03-2021/domestic-abuse-bill-so-much-still-> 17
18 to-fight-for. 19
20
21 Elliott. S. (2020). 'Domestic abuse – why staying home isn't safe for everyone and what you can do to help'
22
23 Available at <https://www.tuc.org.uk/blogs/domestic-abuse-why-staying-home-isnt-safe-everyone-and-> 24
25 what-you-can-do-help.(accessed 15.4.2022)
26
27
28 Fitz-Gibbon, K., & Walklate, S. (2017). The efficacy of Clare's law in domestic violence law reform in England and 29
30 Wales. Criminology & criminal justice, 17(3), 284-300. <https://doi.org/10.1177/1748895816671383>
31
32 Flanders, A. (1970). Management and unions: The theory and reform of industrial relations. London: Faber
33
34
35 Freeman I. and Hasnaoui, A. (2011). 'The Meaning of Corporate Social Responsibility: The Vision of Four Nations'.
36
37 Journal of Business Ethics, Vol.100, pp. 419–443 <https://www.jstor.org/stable/41475851>
38
39 Frynas, J. and Stephens, S. (2015). 'Political Corporate Social Responsibility: Reviewing Theories and Setting New 40
41 Agendas'. International Journal of Management Reviews. Vol.17, pp.483–509. <https://DOI:>
42
43 [10.1111/ijmr.12049](https://DOI: 10.1111/ijmr.12049)
44
45
46 Goerke, L. (2022). Trade unions and corporate social responsibility. Annals of Public and Cooperative Economics, 47
48 Vol.93, No.1, pp.177-203. <https://doi.org/10.1111/apce.12313>
49
50 Gregory, A. (2017), 'The edge to him was really, really nasty': abusive tactics used against informal supporters of 51
52 domestic violence survivors, Journal of Gender-Based Violence, Vol.1, No.1, pp.61–
53
54 77. <https://doi.org/10.1332/239868017X14896674831469>
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Gold, M., Rees, C. and Preuss, L. (2015). 'United Kingdom: scepticism and engagement union positions on CSR', Preuss, L., Gold, M. & Rees, C. (Ed.s.) Corporate Social Responsibility and Trade unions: Perspectives across Europe. Routledge: London, pp. 185-201.

Gold, M., Preuss, L. and Rees, C. (2020). 'Moving out of the comfort zone? Trade union revitalisation and corporate social responsibility', Journal of Industrial Relations Vol.62, No.1, pp. 132–
155.<https://doi.org/10.1177/0022185619854473>

Government of Canada (2022) Domestic violence in the workplace – for departments and separate agencies.https://www.canada.ca/en/government/publicservice/wellness-inclusion-diversity-public-service/harassment-violence/domestic-violence-workplace-departments-separate-agencies.html
(Accessed 18/09/22)

Grosser, K. and Moon, J. (2019). 'CSR and Feminist Organization Studies: Towards an Integrated Theorization for the Analysis of Gender Issues'. Journal of Business Ethics, Vol.155, No.2, pp.321-342.<https://doi.org/10.1007/s10551-017-3510-x>

Hart, R. and Heybrock, D. (2017). 'Workplace Violence and Components of a Psychologically Healthy Workplace'.
Benefits Quarterly, Vol.33, No.1, pp.8-12.

Harvey, G., Hodder, A. and Brammer, S. (2017). 'Trade union participation in CSR deliberation: an evaluation'.
Industrial Relations Journal, Vol.48, No.1, pp. 42–55.<https://doi.org/10.1111/irj.12167>

Hodder, A. and Edwards, P. (2015). 'The essence of trade unions: understanding identity, ideology and purpose',
Work, Employment and Society. Vol.29, No.5, pp. 843–854.<https://www.jstor.org/stable/26655093>

Hocking, C. (2017). 'Occupational justice as social justice: The moral claim for inclusion'. Journal of Occupational Science. Vol,24. No.1, pp. 29–42.<https://doi.org/10.1080/14427591.2017.1294016>

ILO (2019) 'Eliminating Violence and Harassment in the World of Work: ILO Convention No. 190', https://www.ilo.org/wcmsp5/groups/public/---dgreports/---dcomm/--- publ/documents/publication/wcms_721160.pdf

- 1
2
3 Katz, M., Lopez Y. and H. LaVan (2017). 'Domestic Violence Spillover into the Workplace: An Examination of the 4
5 Difference Legal and Ethical Requirements'. Business and Society Review, Vol.122, pp.562–
6
7 3.https://doi.org/10.1111/basr.12131
8
9
- 10 King, N., Brooks, J., and Tabari, S. (2018). 'Template analysis in business and management research', Ciesielska, M.
11
12 and Jemielniak, D. (Ed.s.), Qualitative Methodologies In Organization Studies, Springer. pp. 179-206.
13
- 14 Kulkarni, S. and Ross, T.C. (2016). 'Exploring employee intimate partner violence (IPV). disclosures in the 15
16 workplace'. Journal of Workplace Behavioral Health. Vol.31, No.4, pp.204-221 [https://DOI:
17
18 10.1080/15555240.2016.1213637](https://doi.org/10.1080/15555240.2016.1213637)
19
20
- 21 Larrieta-Rubin de Celis, I., Fernández de Bobadilla-Güemez, S. del Mar Alonso-Almeida, M. and Velasco-22
23 Balmaseda, E. (2017). 'Women's occupational health and safety management: An issue for corporate 24
25 social responsibility', Safety Science. Vol. 91, pp.61-70. <https://doi.org/10.1016/j.ssci.2016.07.019>
26
27
- 28 Lewis Silkin (2022). Domestic abuse leave introduced in Northern Ireland 29
30 <https://www.lewissilkin.com/en/insights/domestic-abuse-leave-introduced-in-northern-ireland>
31
- 32 MacGregor, J. C. D., Wathen, C. N., and MacQuarrie, B. J. (2016). 'Domestic violence in the Canadian workplace:
33
34 Are co-workers aware?'. Safety and Health at Work Vol.7, No.3, pp. 244–50.
35
36 <https://doi.org/10.1016/j.shaw.2016.01.003>
37
38
- 39 MacGregor, J. C. D., Wathen, C. N., and MacQuarrie, B. J (2017). 'Resources for domestic violence in the Canadian 40
41 workplace: Results of a pan-Canadian survey'. Journal of Workplace Behavioral Health, Vol.32, No.3, pp.
42
43 190-205. https://DOI: 10.1080/15555240.2017.1349612
44
45
- 46 MacGregor, J. C. D Oliver C L MacQuarrie, B. J and Wathen C N (2019). 'Intimate Partner Violence and Work: A 47
48 Scoping Review of Published Research'. Trauma violence and abuse. Vol.22, No.4, pp.717-727. [https://DOI:
49
50 10.1177/1524838020933861](https://doi.org/10.1177/1524838020933861)
51
- 52 MacGregor, J., Naeemzadah, N., Oliver, C., Javan, T., MacQuarrie, B. and Wathen, C. (2022). 'Women's Experiences
53
54 of the Intersections of Work and Intimate Partner Violence: A Review of Qualitative Research', *Trauma, 55
56 Violence, & Abuse*, Vol.23 No.1, pp.224-240. https://DOI: 10.1177/1524838020933861
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

- MacQuarrie, B. J., Scott, K. L., Lim, D. B., Olszowy, L., Saxton, M. D., MacGregor, J. C. D., & Wathen, C. N. (2019). 'Understanding domestic violence as a workplace problem'. Richardsen, A.M. and Burke, R. (Ed.s), Increasing Occupational Health and Safety in Workplaces. Edward Elgar Publishing, Cheltenham, UK
- Matten, J. and Moon, J. (2008). 'Implicit' and 'Explicit' CSR: A Conceptual Framework for a Comparative Understanding of Corporate Social Responsibility', Academy of Management Review. Vol.33, No.2, pp 404–424. <https://www.jstor.org/stable/20159405>
- McWilliams, A., Siegel, D., and Wright, P. (2006). 'Corporate social responsibility: Strategic implications'. Journal of Management Studies. Vol.43, No.1, pp.1–18. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1467-6486.2006.00580.x>
- Navarro, J., Jasinski, J. and Wick, C (2014). 'Working for Change: Empowering Employees and Employers to "Recognize, Respond, and Refer" for Intimate Partner Abuse'. Journal of Workplace Behavioral Health Vol.29, No.3, pp. 224-239. <https://DOI: 10.1080/15555240.2014.933704>
- O'Doherty, L., A. Taft, R. McNair and K. Hegarty (2016), 'Fractured Identity in the Context of Intimate Partner Violence: Barriers to and Opportunities for Seeking Help in Health Settings', Violence Against Women, Vol.22 No.2, pp.225– 248. <https://doi.org/10.1177/1077801215601248>
- Oliver, R., Alexander, B., Roe, S. and Wlasny, M. (2019). The economic and social costs of domestic abuse Research Report 107 https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/918897/horr107.pdf (accessed 1.4.22)
- O'Leary-Kelly, A., Lean, E., Reeves, C and Randel, J. (2008). Coming into the light: intimate partner violence and its effects at work, National Institute of Justice, University of Arkansas.
- ONS (2018) 'ONS Crime Survey for England and Wales, year ending March 2018' <https://www.ons.gov.uk/peoplepopulationandcommunity/crimeandjustice/bulletins/domesticabuseine nglandandwales/yearendingmarch2018> (accessed 1.4.22)
- Peterson, C., Kearns, M.C., McIntosh, W.L., Estefan, L.F., Nicolaidis, C., McCollister K.E., and Florence, C. (2018). 'Lifetime economic burden of intimate partner violence among U.S. adults', American Journal of Preventive Medicine, Vol.55 No.4, pp.433–444. <https://doi:10.1016/j.amepre.2018.04.049>

- 1
2
3 Preuss, L., Gold, M. and Rees, C. (2015). 'The rise of corporate social responsibility as a challenge for trade unions'
4
5 Preuss, L., Gold, M. and Rees, C. (Eds.) Corporate Social Responsibility and Trade unions: Perspectives
6
7 across Europe. Routledge, London. Pp.1-15.
8
9
10 Reeves, C. and O'Leary-Kelly, A. (2009). Study of the Effects of Intimate Partner Violence on the Workplace.
11
12 Research Report to the U.S. Department of Justice, University of Arkansas.
13
14 Sánchez, O., Vale, C., Rodrigues, L. & Surita, F. (2020) 'Violence against women during the COVID-19 pandemic: An 15
16 integrative review', International Journal of Gynecology & Obstetrics, Vol.151, 17
18 No.2. <https://doi.org/10.1002/ijgo.13365>
19
20
21 Schons, L. and Steinmeier, M. (2016) 'Walk the Talk? How Symbolic and Substantive CSR Actions Affect Firm
22
23 Performance Depending on Stakeholder Proximity'. Corporate Social Responsibility and Environmental 24
25 Management. Vol. 23, pp.358–372. <https://doi.org/10.1002/csr.1381>
26
27
28 Schwartz, M. S. and Carroll, A. B. (2003), 'Corporate Social Responsibility: A Three-Domain Approach', Business
29
30 Ethics Quarterly, Vol. 13, No. 4 pp. 503-530. <https://DOI: 10.5840/beq200313435>
31
32 Sharp, N. (2008). What's yours is mine: the different forms of economic abuse and its impact on women and 33
34 children experiencing domestic violence. London: Refuge.
35
36
37 Sharp-Jeffs, N. (2016). Supporting Survivors of Financial Abuse: Learning from the UK. London; London
38
39 Metropolitan University.
40
41 Showalter, K. (2016). 'Women's employment and domestic violence: A review of the literature'. Aggression and 42
43 Violent Behavior. Vol. 31, pp.37–47. <https://doi.org/10.1016/j.avb.2016.06.017>
44
45
46 Snell, D. and Gikara, V. (2020). 'Unions and corporate social responsibility in a liberal market context: The case of 47
48 Ford's shutdown in Australia', Journal of Industrial Relations, Vol.62 No.5, pp.713–734. [https://DOI:](https://DOI: 10.1177/0022185619896383)
49
50 [10.1177/0022185619896383](https://DOI: 10.1177/0022185619896383)
51
52 Stark, E and Hester, M. (2019). 'Coercive control: Update and review'. Violence Against Women Vol.25, No.1.
53
54 pp.81–104. <https://DOI: 10.1177/1077801218816191>
55
56
57
58
59
60

1

2

3 Swanberg, J., Logan, T. K., & Macke, C. (2005). 'Intimate partner violence, employment, and the workplace:

4

5 Consequences and future directions', Trauma, Violence & Abuse, Vol.6 No.4, pp.286–312.https://DOI:

6

7 10.1037/1076-8998.10.1.3

8

9 TUC (2014). Domestic Violence and the Workplace, a TUC Survey Report http://www.tuc.org.uk/equality-

10

11 issues/gender-equality/violence-against-women/domestic-violence-and-workplace (accessed 15.4.22)

12

13 United Nations (2020). Violence against women and girls: the shadow pandemic. Statement by Phumzile Mlambo-

14

15 Ngcuka, Executive Director of UN Women, United Nations.

16

17 Wathen, C. N., MacGregor, J. C. D., and MacQuarrie, B. J. (2018). 'Relationships Among Intimate Partner Violence,

18

19 Work, and Health'. Journal of Interpersonal Violence. Vol 33, No.14,pp.2268-2290.https://DOI:

20

21 10.1177/0886260515624236.

22

23 Wiberley, G., Bennett, T., Jones, C. and Hollinrake, A. (2018). 'The role of trade unions in supporting victims of

24

25 domestic violence in the workplace'. Industrial Relations Journal. Vol. 49, No. 1, pp. 69-85.

26

27 DOI:10.1111/irj.12204.

28

29 Wilcox, T., Greenwood, M., Pullen, A., O'Leary Kelly, A. and Jones, D. (2020). 'Interfaces of domestic violence and

30

31 organization: Gendered violence and inequality'. Gender Work and Organisation. Vol.28, No.2, pp.701-

32

33 722<https://doi.org/10.1111/gwao.12515>

34

35 Women's Aid (2019). The Economics of abuse: Report Summary. Women's Aid, Bristol.

36

37 https://www.womensaid.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/2019/03/Economics-of-Abuse-Report-Summary-

38

39 2019.pdf

40

41 World Health Organization. (2014). Health care for women subjected to intimate partner violence or sexual

42

43 violence: a clinical handbook. World Health

44

45 Organization. <https://apps.who.int/iris/handle/10665/136101>

46

47

48

49

50

51

52

53

54

55

56

57

58

59

60

Table I. Demographics of the respondents

Interviewee	Union	Sector	Role or area of activity in the union structure
1	GMB (The General Union)	Local government	Project worker
2	TUC (Trades Union Congress)	Various sectors	Regional
3	UCU (University and College Union)	TUC education unit	Education
4	CWU (Communication Workers Union)	Post and telecommunication	Regional
5	PCS (Public and Commercial Services Union)	Government	Shop steward
6	PCS	Government	Branch
7	NEU (National Education Union)	Education	Branch
8	NEU	Education	Branch
9	UCU	Trade union education unit	Education
10	Unite (The Union)	Transport, shipbuilding, and aerospace	Regional

11	Domestic violence support organisation	Voluntary sector	Domestic violence adviser
12	UCU	Post 16 education	Education
13	PCS	Government	Branch
14	TUC	Various	Regional
15	NEU	Schools	Regional
16	PCS	Government	Branch
17	PCS	Various	Regional
18	CWU	Telecommunications	Regional
19	GMB	Local government	Shop steward
20	RCN (Royal College of Nursing)	Health	Branch
21	UNISON (The Public Service Union)	Further Education	Organiser
22	USDAW (Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied workers)	Food retail and distribution	Shop steward
23	UNISON	Local government	Shop steward
24	USDAW	Food production	Shop steward
25	USDAW	Retail	Organiser

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

26	FBU (Fire Brigades Union)	Fire service	Branch
27	Unite	Various	Regional
28	RCM (Royal College of Midwives)	Health	Regional
29	USDAW	Retail	Regional
30	UCU	TUC education unit	Education
31	Unite	Various	Education
32	Unite	Voluntary sector	Organiser
33	PCS	Government	Regional
34	Unite	Food Drink and agriculture	Regional
35	Unite	Logistics	Regional
36	NEU	Schools sector	Area
37	UNISON	Health	Branch
38	UNISON	Local government	Branch
39	UCU	Further education	Education

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60